In this tumultuous trouble, Fulvius Flaccus with his army entered Rome at the gate Capena: from whence he went through the midst of the City, along the street Carina into the Exquilie, and from thence he went forth, and between the gates Exquilina and Collina pitched his tents. Thither the Ædiles of the Commons brought victuals: the Consul and the Senat resorted to him into the camp, where they sat in Council about the State of the Common-weal. And agreed it was, That the Consuls should lie encamped likewise about the gates Collina and Exquilina: that C. Calpurnius, Prætor of the City, should have the keeping of the Capitoll and the Castle, with a guard, and that the Senators keep residence continually in good number within the compass of the Forum, what need soever there should be of their counsell and advice, against all sudden accidents. By this time Annibal was come forward as far as to the river Anio, and within three miles of the City lay encamped, where he kept a standing League. But himself in person with 2000 horsemen advanced forward toward the gate Collina, even as far as to Horculæ in the Temple, and rode all about as near as he wold could, to view the walls, and the situation of the City. Flaccus took foul disdain thereof, and thought it a shamefull indignity, that he should brave it at his pleasure to scornfully without revenge, whereupon he sent out certain of his own Cavalry, and gave commandment, That they should fight the enemies horsemen farther off, and chase them back into their Camp. While they were in skirmish together, the Consuls gave order, that the Numidian horsemen, such as were fled from the enemy, and turned to the Romans (who were at that time to the number of twelve hundred upon the Aventine hill) should pass through the midst of the City to the Exquilie: supposing, that there were none more meet than they, for to fight among the valleys, the garden houses, the sepulchres and hollow waies on every side. Whom, when some from the Castle and the Capitoll, espied riding down the descent of the hill, called Civitas Pupina, they ran crying about the City, The Aventine is taken, The Aventine is taken, Which alarm caused a tumult, and gave such an occasion of fear, and running away, that if the Camp of Annibal had not been without the walls, the fearful multitude doubtless would have abandoned and quit the City. But they took their honies, and got every man up to the terraces and leadsthereof: from whence they pelied with stones and other shot, their own friends instead of enemies, as they rode scattering one from another in the streets. This tumult could not be repressed, nor the error appear, by reason that the waies were so pestered with

A with a number of the country peasants, and of cattell besides, whom sudden fear had driven into the City. Howbeit, the horsemen fought fortunately, and the enemies were removed and set back. And because it was necessary to stay all disorders, and upores that chanced upon small occasions to arise, it was thought good and agreed upon, that all those who had been either Dictators, or born the office of Censors, should have their full power and authority until such time as the enemy was clean departed from about the walls. And that was to good purpose: for all the rest of that day, and the night following, there were divers and sundry garboiles, without any cause or occasion raised, and the same killed and appeared by that means.

The next day Annibal passed over Anio, and brought forth all his whole power into the field. Neither were Flaccus and the Consuls behind hand for their parts, but ready for battell. When both armies stood arranged in order on both sides, amited upon the issue and event of that one fight, which was for no less a prize and reward to the victorious part, than the very City of Rome: there fell such a mighty storm of rain and hail together, and it troubled both hoils, that they could scarce hold their weapons in hand, but were driven to retire themselves for safety into their several Camps, fearing nothing less than their own enemies. The morrow after likewise, when they stood in the same place in battell array, the liketempel parted them alunder. And they were not so soon retired into their Camp, but the day was wonderful fair, and the weather calm again.

The Carthaginians took this for an ominous preface to them of ill luck. And Annibal was cheard (by report) to say, That one while his mind, another while his fortune, would not give him leave to win the City of Rome. There were other occurrences besides, as well small as great that discouraged him and abated his hope. Of more importance was this, that whies helly with his host in arms before the walls of Rome, he understood, there were certain companies with banners displayed sent into Spain for to supply the armies there. Of less reckoning was this: that he was advertised by a certain captive, how the very same plot of ground whereon he was encamped, happened at the same time to be sold: not underfoot, but at the full price, and nothing abated. This he took to be so presumptuous a part, and such a scornfull indignity, namely, that there should be a chapman found at Rome, to make purchase of that piece of land, which he was possessed of, and held in right of arms, that presently he called for the publicke crier and tumpet, and gave commandment unto him, to proclaim port-sale of all the shops of Bankes and money changers at that time about the Forum in Rome. Nevertheless, hereupon he was moved to dislodge and retired his camp backwards from the City to the river Tiberis, six miles from Rome. From whence he took his way to the grove of Feronia, where stood a Temple, in those daies much renowned for wealth and riches. The inhabitants thereof were certain Capenats, who used to bring thither the fift fruits of their corn and revenues yea, and many other oblations besides, according to their store: by means whereof they had adorned and garnished it with much gold and silver. Of all those gifts and offerings was this Temple then robbed and spoiled. But after the departure of Annibal from thence, there were found great heaps of brasse, by reason that the souldiers upon touch and remorie of conscience, had cast in many brazen pieces. The sacking and pillage of this Temple, Æall writers do agree upon, and make no doubt thereof. Cælius saith, That Annibal as he went toward Rome from Erutium, turned thither, and he leteth down the beginning of his journey from Riate Cutia, and from Amitemnum. And that out of Campania, he came into Sannium, and from thence into the country of Peligni, and so passed beside the City Sulmo to the Marcians, and then by the territory of the Albenes into the Marsians land, and from thence he marched to Amitemnum, and so forward to the town Fordi. Neither is there any error or doubt in all this, because the marks and tokens of the voyage of so great an army could not within the memory and compass of so small an age be confounded and worn out. For certain it is, that he passed that way. The only difference lieth herein, whether he came to the City of Rome, or returned from thence into Campania, by that way afore said.

F Now was not Annibal so resolute to defend Capua, but the Romans were as fully bent, and more eager to continue the siege and assault thereof. For he sped himself so fast another way in his voyage back, first out of the Lucans country to the Brutians, and so on still to the streight of Sicily, and to Rhegium, that with his sudden coming thither, he surprised them at unawares, even before they heard of his arrivall. As for Capua, albeit in the time of Fulvius his absence it was no less straightly beleagured, yet it felt the coming again of Flaccus: and besides, there was much marvel there, why Annibal returned not back as well as he. Afterwards, they understood, by conference with some that were without, how they were forsaken and forsook of Annibal, and that the Carthaginians were past all hope to keep and hold Capua still to their own use. There was an Edict moreover of the Pro-Consul, passed by order from the Senat, and the same published and divulged among the enemies, That what Citizen soever of Capua would turn to the Romans before such a certain day he should have a generall pardon. But there was no coming in, nor ranging to the Romans side; for fear of punishment at the Romans hands, more than for any regard of their allegiance to the Carthaginians: because their transgression and trespass in their former revolt was so great, that it might not be abandoned. And as no one man at all privately on his own head came over to the camp of the Romans, so there was no good order taken by publicke council for the benefit and safety of the whole City. The Noblemen had given over managing of state-matters, and could not be brought by any means to assemble in the Senat.

And

And in chief place of government was he, who had not won to himself any honour thereby, but his unworthiness was derogatory to the authority and power of that Magistracy which he bore. For now there was not one of the chief Citizens and Noblemen that would be so much as seen in the Market place or Common Hall of assemblies but shutting themselves within doors in their private houses, they expected every day for the destruction of their country, together with their own undoing and overthrow. The whole charge and care lay upon Postum and Manius Captains of the garrison in the fort there of the Carthaginians, and more careful were they of their own welfare, than fearful for the jeopardy of their friends and Allies. These two wrote letters unto Annibal, entreated not only in plain terms and frankly, but also sharply and bitterly: wherein they laid unto his charge, "That he had not only betrayed Capua into the hands of the enemies, but also I delivered and exposed them and the garrison to the cruel clutches of the Romans to be massacred and executed. That he was gone his waies, and departed into the country of the Bruttias one that turned away his face of purpose, because he would not see with his own eyes the loss of Capua." But I wote the Romans contrarywise could not be withdrawn from the siege of Capua, no, not by the assaulting of the City of Rome: so much more were the Romans resolute enemies, than the Carthaginians constant friends. But if he would return again to Capua, and bend the full force of his war thither, both they and the Citizens also of Capua would be ready to fall forth and encounter the enemies. For why, they passed not over the Alps with intent to war with the Rheginis and Tarentis: no, but where the Roman Legions were, there ought the armies of the Carthaginians to be. Thus at Canine, thus at Therapsimene were the victories at *K*chieved, by affronting and meeting the enemy, by joining camp to camp, and by hazarding the fortune of the battell. To this effect were the letters penned and given to certain Numidians; who for a good reward had offered their service before, for the safe carriage and delivery of them. These fellows presented themselves before Placcus in the Camp, in habit and quality of fugitives unto his side; hoping to spy out some convenient time when they might give him the slip and be gone. Now by occasion of the famine which had continued long in Capua, there was none but might pretend a good and reasonable cause to depart from thence to the adverse part. But behold, there happened a Capuan wench to come into the leaguer (a naughty pack and an harlot, that one of the supposed counterfeiter fugitives afore said kept.) She informed the General of the Romans, that those Numidians, fraudulently and by covin pretended to flee unto his part, and had letters about them unto Annibal. This would the stand to, and be ready to avert to the very face of one of them, who bewrayed & disclosed the plot unto her. At first, when he was brought forth before her, he set a jolly countenance of the matter, & made it very strange & pretending roughly that he knew not the woman; but by little and little he was convicted by manifest truths, and especially when he saw that they called for the rack, and that he was upon the point to be put to torture: and so in the end confessed that all was true; and therewith brought forth the letters. Over and besides, another thing was now revealed; which before was kept close and secret to wit, that there were other Numidians besides, who under the colour of fugitives had gone up and down in the Roman camp; of these there were apprehended not so few as three before and ten; and they together with the new were whipped with rods, had their hands cut off, and sent back again to Capua. This pitious spectacle and sight of so fearful execution killed their courage, and brake the very heart of the Campains. Whereupon the people ran together unto the Council-House, and compelled Levius to assemble a Senat, and openly threatened the Nobles (who a long time had absented themselves from public consultations) that unless they would now repair into the Senat, they would go home to their very houses, and pluck them out by the ears into the street. For fear hereof, the chief Magistrate had a frequent and full assembly of Senators. Whiles all the rest were of opinion to send Embassadors to the Roman Generals, Vibius Pricus (who had been the chief cause and principall author of their first revolt from the Romans) being demanded his advice, spake to the point in this manner.

The Oration
of Vibius Pricus
in the Senat of Capua.

"Theythar talk of Embassadors of peace, and of yielding, little consider and remember either N what they would have done, in case the Romans had been at their devotion and mercy, or what themselves must endure and suffer. For what think ye will become (quoth he) of this present render of ours, in comparison of that whereby in times past we freely gave unto the Romans our selves, and all that we had, for to obtain their aid and succour against the Samnites? And have we so soon forgot, at what time, and in what condition and state we were when we forsook and abandoned the people of Rome? Alas, after our revolve, how we most cruelly and shamefully killed their garrison, who we might have dismissed and sent away with their lives? Moreover, how often we have issued forth against them lying at siege, and how maliciously minded we were unto them, yea, and how we have sallied upon them in their camp? Over and besides, call ye not to remembrance, how we called for Annibal to surprize and defeat them? and (and that which of all other is most fresh in memory) how we sent him from hence to give the assault to Rome? On the contrary side, mark well and call to mind, how maliciously they have attempted and practised all hostility against us: by which ye may well know what account to make of them, and what ye are to trust unto. For when they had a stranger and foreign enemy within Italy, nay, when they had Annibal their enemy: when the wars were so hot, that all was on a light fire: they passed by all other affairs; yea, they let Annibal himself alone, and sent both their Consuls with two compleat Consular armies to besiege and force Capua. This is the

"second year that they keep us entangled round about, penting us up, and pining us with extreme famine and hunger: during which time they themselves as well as we, have endured the utmost extremities and dangers that are, and sustained most grievous and infinite travels: of Attempts being killed and cut in pieces about their rampiers, trenches, and ditches, and finally his divers almost out of their Camp and hold. But to let pass and speak no more of their ordinary matters, seeing it is an old and usual case for them to abide painful toil, and incur many perils, who besiege and assault any Cities or towns of their enemies: See a manifest sign of their boldness and less able harred against Annibal. With puissant power of foot and horse, Annibal both assailed their Camp, yea, and in some part was Master of it. Think ye that in so great danger of theirs they were one jot withdrawn from the siege? He passed over the river Vulturnus and burnt the territory of Capua: yet for all that calamity and loss, which their allies received, did not they one whit nor gave over their enterprise. He commanded to march forward with banners displayed against the very City of Rome: they made as little account of that dangerous respect toward, as of all the rest. After he had passed over the river Anio, he pitched his tents within three miles of the City: nay, he approached at length the walls, and made a brave and valiant under the gates: to be short, he presented unto their eye his resolution, and menaced to make Capua hot for them unless they levied the siege before Capua: and yet they gave not oves but beleaguered as still. The very wild and savage beasts bethey never so fell, bethey made never so much with blind rage and madness against one, yet if another go to their dens, and offer to take away their whelps, they will turn again to succour and help their young ones: but the Romans, notwithstanding Rome was besieged, their wives and children in danger, whose pitious cries and lamentable plaints were heard almost even thither: notwithstanding their altars, their sacred fires, the temples of their gods, the monuments and sepulchers of their Ancestors, were prosaied, abused, and polluted, could not be drawn away from Capua. So eager, so hungry are they to be revenged of us; so thirsty are they to drink our blood, And good reason, happily, they have so to do. For would not we also have done the fensible, if fortune had given us the opportunity? But seeing the will of the immortal gods is otherwise: and considering that I owe nature a death: in my power it is, whiles I am at liberty, whiles I am mine own master, and master of myself, to avoid torments, to shun shameful ignominies and reproaches (whereof the enemy hopeth I shall feel the smart) I end that by one kind of death, which as it is honest, so it is also easie and gentle? Never will I endure to see Ap. Claudius and Q. Fulvius proudly and insolently bearing themselves upon their conquest over us: never will I be led and haled bound with chains through the City of Rome, to make a show, and to serve for a spectacle and gazing stock in their Triumph: and afterwards either in dark prison, or tied openly to a stake, yield my back and side to be tewed, whipped, and mangled: and then lay my neck upon the block, to have my head chopt off with the bloody axe of the Romans. Never will I behold my native country sacked, pillaged, and put to fire and sword, nor the chaste married dames of Capua to be forcibly ravished, the fair and beautiful maidens shamefully deflowered, and the well favoured young boys and freeborns unnaturally abused. They railed Alba in times past from the top to the very foundation, and left neither thick nor stone thereof, Alba I say, from whence they had their off-spring, and were first defended to the end that there might remain no memory at all of their stock and first original. And shall I ever belevee they will spare Capua, & receive into mercy, against which they are more hatefully and mortally bent than against Carthage? Therefore, my masters and friends, as many of you as are minded and resolved to die before ye see these so many miseries and wofull calamities, I have at home a flippet this night well furnished and provided for you all; and when ye have eat meat your fill, and drunk wine to it liberally, the same wassell cup that first will be presented unto me, shall go round about to you all: and that one draught shall deliver your bodies from torments, prelieve your spirits from anguish and contumelious disgrace, keep your eyes from beholding all cruel acts, your ears from hearing all shameful indignities which follow and attend upon conquered perious. There shall beal in readiness certain servitors of purple to make a mighty great fire within the bale court-yard of mine house, and to cast our dead bodies thereinto. This is the only honest way to death; and beleeving us who are free born and gentlemen indeed, In which doing, our enemies will wonder at our vertue and valour: yea, and Annibal himself shall well know that he hath forsaken and betrayed his trust and magnanimous allies.

This Oration of Vibius, there were more men present that heard with applause and good liking than could find in their hearts to put that in execution which they to well allowed & approved. The greater part of the Senat, not despairing, but that the clemency of the people of Rome, which had been tried and seen oftentimes in many wars, might be gained and extended also unto them; concluded, to send Embassadors with commission to yield Capua into the Romans hands. Some seven and twenty Senators there were that accompanied Vibius Pricus home to his house, and supped with him: and after they had done what they could to drink themselves drunk, and to intoxicate their brains with freely taking in their wine, (thereby to withdraw their minds from the sense and apprehension of their imminent harm and misery) drank all the poysoned cup above said. This done, and the banquet ended, they rose from the table, took one another by the hand embraced each other, taking their last leave, bidding a small adieu and farewell, and bewailing together with piteous tears their own misfortune, and the miserable state of their country, some said behind to be burned in one and the same fire for fellowship, others brake company and departed to their own houses. Now, by reason that their sails were filled with milliciding and drinking wine so liberally, the voyen was not so quick of operations; nor so effectual as to hasten their death. And therefore most of them lengthened almost longevy, and continued drawing on a piece of the next day, before they let their last breath; but yet they all had yielded up their ghost before that the gales were over against the enemies.

The day following, the gate of Jupiter which stood next over against the Roman Camp, was by the commandment of the Pro-consul opened. Thence entered one legion and two cohorts of horsemen, under the leading of C. Fulvius the Lieutenant, who after he had left above allover things given aprelis order, that all armor of defence, and weapons of offence (which was to be found in Capua) should be brought forth and presented unto him: placed and disposed as all the gales, warders sufficient to see that no person might possibly go forth, or be let out: thus he laid hold upon the garison of the Carthaginians, and commanded the Senators of Capua in repairs in to the Camp, before the Roman Captain General himself. So soon as they were thither come straight waies they had irons clapped upon them, and were commanded to make tender unto the treasures of all the gold and silver they had. The gold amounted to a pound weight: and the silver to the weight of three thousand and two hundred pound. Five and twenty of the Senators were sent to Cales, eight and twenty to Theruntum, to be kept life in ward. Even those who were known for certain to have principally moved and persuaded the revolt from the Romans. Considering the punishment of the Senators of Capua, Fulvius and Cladius could not agree: Cladius was more irascible and exorable, and might have been long extracted for a pardon. Fulvius was more rigorous, and proceeded to a harder course. Whereupon Appian put over the whole deciding and determination thereof unto the Senate of Rome. Alleging, that it was meet and requisite, that the L^d of the Council should have the examination of the cause: and namely upon these points, Imprimis, whether they had completed and combined in this action, with any of the free burroughs and Cities belonging to the state of the Litines, Jens, whether they had any help and relief from thence in the time of the war, or from any other towns whatsoever: But Fulvius in no case would condescend thereto, nor suffer that the minds of faithfull and loyal allies should be disquieted with doubtfull surmises and suspitions of any crimes: and called in question upon the apprehension and delatory informations of those that never yet made reckoning or conscience, either what they did, or what they said. And therefore he proscribed to suppress that manner of proceeding, and crush that Inquisition for ever after this communication they departed afunder: and Appian made no doubt but that howsoever his Solleges fared and took on, giving out for shew and bitter words, he would yet take paine and stay for the letters from Rome, concerning to weighly a business as this was. But Fulvius, because of his discontent, brake up his keeping of fate in his royall pavilion, and sent his officers and ordinary train out of the way, because he would not be hindered and empeached by them, in the course of his designment: and commanded the Colonels and Captains of the Allies to give warning unto two thousand chosen men of arms, for to be in readiness and present themselves at a third sound of the trumpet. With this power of horsemen he set forward by night, and marched to Theruntum: and by break of day entered the gate, and kept his way on into the market-place. At the first entrance of the horsemen, the people ran together from all parts: then he caused the chief Magistrate (a Sidicin) to be called, and charged him to produce his prisoners the Capuans, whom he had in custody. When they were all brought forth, they were first whipped with rods, and then beheaded. From thence he rode upon the spur to Cales: where so soon as he was set on the Tribunal seat, in place of judgement, and the Capuan prisoners likewise presented in place and bound to the stake; there came a horseman in post from Rome, and when he had delivered letters from C. Calphurnius the Consul, and the people of Rome unto Fulvius: there ran a rumour from the Tribunal through all the assembly, that the whole process against the Capuans was to be put off and reserved until the censure and doom of the Lords of the Senate. And Fulvius supposing it to be no less indeed, after he took the letters, never brakethem up, but bestowed them in his bosome, and gave commandment to the Crier, to charge the Lictor or executioner to do his office, according to law. Thus they also that were at Cales were executed and suffered death. Then he read the letters, and the order set down by the Senate: but it was roole late now, to say that which was done already and past, and which indeed was hastened with all speed that might be, for fear it might have been crossed and prevented.

Now as Fulvius was arising from the bench, Taurus Jubellius, a Capuan, passing amidst the throng, called by name aloud upon Fulvius. Whereat Flaccus wondering what the man meant, fathim down again upon his seat, and demanded what he would: Mary (quoth he) command me also to be killed, that thou maist boast and glory another day, that thou hast done to death, a better man by far, and much more valiant than thy self. Surely (quoth Flaccus) this fellow is lunatick and goes well in his wits: and again, were I minded to take his life from him, I am inhibited by virtue of the act of the Senate. "Then (quoth Jubellius) since that my country is forced and lost, my kinsfolk and friends made away: seeing also that I have with mine own hand murdered my wife and children, because they should suffer no villanous indignity: and may not my self so much as die this death which my countrymen here have suffered before my face, I will seek by virtue and manhood to ease my self of this life, so tedious, so irksome, and odious unto me: and with that, he drew forth the skein which he had hid under his garment, and stabbed himself in the breast quite through his body, and there at the feet of the L^d General fell down ready to dye in the place. Forasmuch as both the execution of the Capuans, and also the most part of other matters were performed according to the will of Flaccus alone: some there be that write how Appian Cladius died about the time that Capua was yielded. And that this very time Taurus neither came to Alis of his own accord, nor killed himself: but that as he was a binding to the stake, because the words which he uttered could not be heard for the confused noise of the people, therefore Flaccus commanded silence, and then Taurus spake those words before rehearsed, namely, That himself a slight valiant and hardy man was put to death by a meaner person than himself, and much inferior to him in valour and virtue. Whereat by the commandment of the Pro-Consul the crier pronounced and said: Go to Sergeant, let this brave and valiant man have the more store of rods bestowed upon him; let him have good flourishing, lay on load, and let the lathes surely on, and let him be the first that you proceed against; let him have the law so the full, some there be that have written, how the act of the Senat was read before he proceeded to the beheading: but because there was this branch or clause within the act, That if he thought to good, he should relieve the whole deciding of the matter unto the Senat: he confirmed it thus, that it was put to his discretion for to weigh and consider what was more profitable to the Common-weal. This done, he returned from Cales to Capua. Atella and Caluvia were both surrendered into his hands: where they also who were the chief heads of those states suffered the like punishment. Thus there were about four score of the Senators put to death: and to the number well-near of three hundred Capuans (born of noble blood): committed to prison. Others of them were bestowed in sale custody within divers Cities of the Latines, and came to sundry unhappy ends. The multitude besides of the Capitan Citizens were sold outright.

It remained now to put to question and debate, what was to be done with the City and the Territory thereof belonging. And some were of mind, that a City so exceeding mighty, so near a neighbour, and so dangerous to Rome, should be utterly ravished and destroyed. But the consideration of a present commodity and gain took place and prevailed. For in regard of the territory and land lying about it (which was well known to be the most fertile soil in all Italy), and yielded all manner of fruit: the City was saved: wherinto those husbandmen that tilled the grounds might retire themselves and dwell. And for the peopling and inhabiting thereof, there was a multitude referred of the Inhabitants which were there already, namely of Libertines and enfran himself bondslaves, Merchants factors, retailers, artisans, and craftsmen who kept there still and remained. But the whole territory and all publick edifices were seized to the use of the people of Rome. Moreover, order was taken, that Capua should be inhabited only and replenished with people like a City: but no form of Common-weal, no Corporation, no Senat, no assembly of Commons, nor Magistrate of their own should be allowed there. For without a common Council of State, without magistracy and government, without intelligences and reciprocal commerce, as in the body of a Commonalty, they supposed, that they would never agree together in any complot, but be far unmeet to contrive a conspiracy and compass alteration. As for a Provost or Governor to minister law, and execute justice among them, they purposed to send them one yearly from Rome. Thus were the affairs ordered and composed at Capua, by a good policy and commendable course every way. For those that were most in fault and guilty were punished with rigour, and that speedily. The number of Citizens were scattered and dispersed sundry waies, without all hope to return again. The bare houses and walls that had not offended they were spared, and neither burned nor pulled down. And besides, the commodity and gain that accrued unto the Romans by this manner of proceeding, they won some name of clemency and mercy among their Confederates and Allies: in that they saved a most noble and wealthy City, at the ruins whereof all Campania and as many States as bordered about Campania, would have grieved much, and groaned again. By this means also the enemy was constrained now to come in, and could not otherwise chuse, how powerful and mighty the Romans were to be chafte and punish their faithless associates, yea, and how feeble Annibal was, and not able to defend and maintain those whom he had received into his protection.

The Roman Pro-Consuls after they had finished and performed their charge at Capua assigned unto Cladius Nero six thousand footmen out of those two Legions which he had before Capua, and three hundred horsemen which he had chosen himself: all of Latine Allies as many foot in number, and 800 horse besides. This army Nero embarked at Puteoli, and transported into Spain. When he was arrived at Tarazona, after he had there landed his soldiers, and laid up his ships in dock, and stowed with all his mariners (to make the greater number) he marched to the river Turdania, where he received the forces of T. Fomtinus, and L. Martinius, and from thence advanced toward the enemies.

Asdrubal the son of Amilcar lay encamped at a place called the Black Stones, in the Ausetans country: it lieth between the towns Iliturgis and Medissa. Now Nero kept the narrow straits of the forest there. Asdrubal, because he would not be pent up in so strait a room, sent an herald or messenger of peace to him, who should make promise in his name, that if Nero would permit him to pass peaceably from thence, he would withdraw all his forces out of Spain. The Roman Captain took this message joyfully: and Asdrubal requested, That they might empair the best day, and devise together how the Romans would set down conditions and articles in writing, ting, as touching the rendry and delivery of the fortresses in every City, and likewise of prefixing some day, by which time the garrisons should be removed and displaced, and the Carthaginians have away all their bag and baggage without fraud and coyn. Asdrubal having obtained his request, presently commanded, that in the very evening, and all night, long the heaviest and most cumbersome part of his whole army should escape what way soever they could out of the gullet of the fortress. But he gave especial direction, that they should not over any of them that night go forth, because their small number was not only fitter to deceive the enemy, and not so soon to be discovered, but also might more easily pass through those narrow and difficult passages. So the morrow they came to an interview and part: where the time was spent of purpose in much needless talk, and drawing of books, more than came was: whereupon the day being foregone, the business was put off unto the next day. And the night ensuing between himself and Asdrubal more time to send others away. And yet could not they make an end that day neither. Thus there passed certain daies, employed in open show about dispute and reasoning of the articles and conditions of agreement, and the nights were bestowed in letting out the Carthaginians closely out of their Camp. Now, after that the greater part of his host was gone away, clear, then he began to wrangle and jar, yea, and to go from some others that he had voluntarily made, and ever they were further and further off from agreement. For Asdrubal the less that he feared, the less also was to be trusted. And by this time in manner all his loyalty were gone out of the fortress, and the next morning, not only the fortress, but all the plains about were overcast, and covered with a thick and foggy mist. Which Asdrubal perceiving, he sent a messenger to Nero, requesting to defer their farther conference and communication to the morrow: pretending, that the present day was a festival holy-day among the Carthaginians, and therefore they made scruple upon it to follow any other business but serve God. All this while there was no fraud so much as once suspected. Asdrubal had no sooner obtained respite for that day, but forthwith he and all his Cavalry, together with some part of his host, without any noise or stir recovered without any harm a place of security. By the fourth hour of the day the sun had dispatched and scattered the mist, and cleared the sky, and then the Romans might discover the Camp of their enemies empty, and no creature left therein. Then at length, Claudius perceiving that Asdrubal had shewed him a Carthaginian trick, and that he was at length thus over-raught by his falshood and cunning practice, began to make out after him, minding to bid him battell. But the enemy would none of that, and fell off. Howbeit there passed some small skirmishes between the reward of the Carthaginians, and the forlorn hope and vancouriers of the Romans. Amidst these affairs (the States of Spain) neither they who revolted after the overthrow of the Romans returned again unto them; nor any new fell away, more than before.

At Rome, the Senate and people after the recovery of Cephus, took as great care for Spain now, as for Italy it self. And agreed they were in general, that the army there should be strengthened with new forces, and a General chither sent: but who should be the man was not yet concluded. Forasmuch as they were to take some extraordinary care in the chusing of one to be sent thither, where two singular and renowned warriors were slain within the compass of thirty daies, and to succeed in the room of either slain. Whiles one nominated one, and some another, at length they grew to this point, that the people should hold a solemn assembly (as it were, purchased) for election of a Pro-Consul to go over into Spain. And the Consuls accordingly proclaimed a set day for the said assembly. At first there was great expectation that those persons who took themselves worthy of so great command should put forth themselves, and prefer their own names beforehand. But when this expectation failed and came to nothing, every man began afresh to reticcate and renew the former grief, and mourn again for the losses received, and to find the want and miss of so valorous Captains whom they had lost. Whereupon the whole City being sad and pensive, and in manner destitute of all good counsell, and not relying what to do in this hard case, came yet down into Mars field upon the day appointed for the election. Every mans eye was upon the Magistrates, and beheld the countenances of these great men and Rulers, how they looked one upon another, grieving and grumbling, that the State was at so low an ebb, and the Common-weal grown to so desperate a case, that no man durst be seen to take upon him the government and Province of Spain. Then all of a sudden, P. Cornelius (his son that was slain in Spain, a young Gentleman, not fully four and twenty years old) shewed himself, and said, That he would undertake that charge upon him: and therewith stepped up into an higher place from whence he might be seen, and there he stood. Upon whom when all men had cast their eyes, and viewed him well, in a general accord and favourable affection unto the man, they wished unto him straightwaies a happy and fortunate government. And when the assembly was willing to give their suffrages, and go to a scrutiny, there was not one Century from the first to the last, nor one person from the highest to the lowest, but gave their voice with P. Scipio for to take a voyage into Spain. But after the thing was passed, and their passionate heat of affection once allayed, they were on a sudden, driven into a still silence and deep dump, to think what a strange and new deed they had done. And that which they thought themselves most of, was this, that favour had carried them away in this action more than the due consideration and regard of his age. Some there were that had in deed and honest and ominous fortune also of that family, and the name of him that was of two mournfull bowles was fo-

A go into those Provinces where he must fight amongst the Sepulchres both of father and uncle. When Scipio perceived, that presently upon the election passed in so hasty a fit, the peopleness to be happy and pensive: he called them to an open audience, and there before them all discoursed of his young age, of the government committed unto him, and of the future war that he was to manage: and that with so noble courage and haughty spirit, that he renewed afresh and kindled again the former zeal and heat that was so cooled: and possessed mens minds with more assured hope than usually mans faithfull promise, or reason grounded upon the confidence of precedents partly, or any earthly thing is wont to afford and warrant. For Scipio was a rare and wonderful man, not only in regard of those true virtues inherent in him: but also for that he had framed himself even from his young and tender years, by artificial means, to the better setting out of those inbred parts and qualities of his own: making shew and semblant before the multitude, that the most things which he did, were either represented unto him by night-visions and apparitions, or else suggested, as it were, by revelation from the gods above: were it that he was superstitiously given, and his mind wholly possessed therewith, or that by his policy he might effect his designments, and have his commandments performed with more expedition, as if they were directions delivered from the Oracles and the very mouth of the gods. Over and besides that, he made this overture to credit and reputation, and prepared mens minds in this sort from his very first beginning. From the very time that he once put on his mans gown, there was no day went over his head; but before he began his own private business, or entered any publick affairs, he would go into the Capitoll: and so soon as he was entered into the Temple, there sit him down, and alone by himself bestow a good time in some secret Ile and corner thereof. This ordinary manner of his, which he continued all his life long, (were it of purpose considerately, or by chance unadvisedly) made divers men beleieve verily, that it was a truth indeed, which was commonly supposed and reported. That the man had a god to his father, which deep and secret imagination of the people, resembled and renewed again the like fame (in all the world) to that which were before and was bruited abroad of Alexander the great, and for the vanity and fabulous speech of folk, was the very fame and all one in every respect: namely, that his mother conceived him by a mighty great serpent: for that very often in her bed-chamber there was seen some such prodigious and wonderful thing; and ever as any body came in, it would wind away of a sudden, and vanish out of sight. These strange and miraculous conceits he would never himself elevate and discredit as toies and vanities, but rather cherish and encrease the opinion thereof, by a certain cunning cast of his own, in that he would neither deny and disavow any such matter, nor yet affirm plainly and verifie the same. Many other devices he had of like sort, partly true indeed, partly feigned and counterfeit, which caused men beyond all measure to have this young man in wonderful admiration. Upon the strong and grounded presumption whereof, the City at that time conferred upon him (far unmeet, I wot, in regard of his unripe years) so great a government, and a world, with all of weighty and important affairs.

Besides the forces which remained in Spain of the old army, and those which were transported over from Puteoli with Claudius Nero, he had a supplement also of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horsemen: and to assist in the conduct of his wars, he had as coadjutor appointed unto him M. Junius Syllanus the Pro-Prator. Thus with a fleet of thirty ships, (and Gallies there were all of five banks of oars) he took the seas, and set sail from the mouth of Lybie, and coasting along the Tuscan seas under the Alps, and through the gulph of Gallia, he doubled at length the point and cape of Pyrene, and disembarked at Emporia a City of Greeks: (for defended they are also from Phocæa) and there he set his people a land. From thence, having taken order that his ships should follow after, he marched by land to Taraco, which he appointed for the Rendezvous, where all his allies and confederates (for at the wonder and fame of his landings, there flocked Embassadors unto him from all parts of the Province) should meet together at a general Diet. There he commanded that the ships should be bestowed in their docks, save only three Gallies (of three ranks) which came from Majissa, and upon cruetie and kindness accompanied him from home, and those were sent back again. Then he gave audience to the Embassadors, who hung in doubtfull suspense by reason of the variety and of sundry changes and chances that lately had happened, and to them he began to return answer, and give them their several dispatches: but with such a spirit and boldness (upon confidence that he had in his own rare virtues) that he let not fall in all his speech one word that might move quarrell, and favoured of rigour, and yet whatsoever he spake, it carried an exceeding majesty with it, and a singular credit. Being departed from Taraco, he visited both the States of the Allies, and also the standing wintering camps of the army: where he highly commended the soldiers, for that notwithstanding they had received two shrewd blows, upon two so great defeats one in the neck of another, yet they held the Province still and kept the field; and not suffering the enemies to reap and taste the fruit of their fortunate victories, and kept them out of all the countries lying within Iberus, and defended faithfully all their confederates according to the trust reposed in them. Marius he had in his train alwaies about him: whom he so highly honoured, that it was very well seen, he feared nothing less than that any other man should eclipse or shadow his glory. Then Syllanus succeeded in place of Nero, and the new soldiers were brought into the standing winter leaguers, and Scipio having reviewed all the Cities and the States that he was to survey, and performed all other affairs that were then to be done, retired and withdrew himself to Taraco.

The same of Scipio was no less prized among the enemies, than it was with his own Citizens and loving allies: and a certain preface was without of the future event; which carried (as good hap was) the greater fear and dread with it, as there was less reason that could be rendered and given thereof. They had broken themselves; but their writings harboured far distant and remote wonder. Asdrubal the son of Gisgon sent as far as to the Ocean sea side unto Adaga into the midland parts, and especially above the forest and chafe of Castilla; And Asdrubal the son of Amilior wintered nearest unto Iberia about Saguntum.

In the very end of that summer, when Cepio was won, and Scipio come into Spain, the Carthaginian Armado, which was sent for out of Sicily to Tarentum, for to intercept the Romans and encompass the same for coming to the Roman garrison that held the Castle of Tarentum had newly stopped all the passages from the sea to the said Castles: but by their long abode in those parts, and keeping the seas so tightly, they had caused a greater dearth and scarcity of victuals among their own friends than their enemies; for stores could not by the help of those Carthaginian ships so much come as along the river that was possessed by friends not from the open ports, for to furnish the townmead of Tarentum. At this time it felt comforted and spent in maintenance of that gable of sea-men, sailors, and mariners, mingled of all sorts of people, so as the garrison of the Castle being but few in number there was hardly to be sustained by the provision they had beforehand, without the help of any new brought in unto them: whereas the Tarentines and the Navy could not have sufficient conveyed unto them by reason whereof, at length the Armado had leave to depart thence with more thanks of the City, than they had for their first bringing thither. And yet victuals were not much cheaper, because when the help by sea was gone, there could no corn at all be brought from other parts abroad.

At the end of the very same summer, when Maximilian was come to the City out of Sicily his own Province, C. Calpurnius the Pretor assembled the Senate for his sake in the Temple of Bellona. Where, after he had discoursed of the acts by him achieved, and complained after a mild and modest sort, laying open his griefs, not so much in the behalf of himself as of his soldiers: in that when he had performed and accomplished his charge and commission in his Province, he could not have licence to bring home his army with him: he demanded that he might be allowed to ride in triumph into the City: but he could not obtain it. This matter was much abused and debated, pro & contra. Whether it were less meet and convenient to deny him, implying he was now present in whole name while he was absent for the fortune of such and good speed of all. If he fails under his conduct and government, there was a solemn procession decreed; and sacrifices done to the honour of the immortal gods: or to graue him triumph (as if he was wonderfully finished) whom the Senate had commanded to make over his army to his successor which surely they would never have decreed, but that the war remained still within the Province, and especially seeing the army it self was away, the best witness simply, whether he had deserved a triumph or no. At length a middle and indifferent course between both was agreed upon, namely that he should enter the City on a petty triumph. And the Tribunes of the Common, by the approbation first of the Senate, proposed unto the people, that M. Minucius should the same day that he came into the City retain still his full authority and government: The day before he entered the City, he rode in triumph upon the mount Albanus, and from thence, in a ovine wife he felt a rich booty before him into the City. There was carried in this pomp the counterfeits of the City Syracuse won, crosbrows, brakes, standing lions, and all other warlike instruments besides, the ornaments testifying long and consequential peace, and the great wealth and treasure of the Kings: and divers vessels of silver and brass curiously wrought: other household furniture also, rich hangings of taplry, and garments of great price: many goodly images and right noble statues, wherewith Syracuse was adorned and beautified, even with the best and principal Cities of Greece. In token also of victory over the Carthaginians, there were eight Elephants brought in a show. And that which was not the least sight and spectacle to behold, Sophis the Syracusan, and Marius the Spaniard went afore with crowns of gold upon their heads. The one of them was the guide when Syracuse was entered in the night season and the other betrayed Nafus and the garrison there. Both these were enfranchised Citizens of Rome, and had fifty acres of land a piece granted unto them for ever. Sophis had his land laid out in the territory of Syracuse, which either belonged to the Kings, or to the enemies of the people of Rome; and a dwelling house (chafe where he would in Syracuse of all those that were seized upon by right of conquest). As for Marius and the Spaniards that with him fled from the enemies, and fled unto the Romans, they had assigned unto them a City to inhabit, and land to occupy in Sicily, which sometime belonged to them that had revolted from the people of Rome. And order was given to M. C. C. C. to appoint them the said City and land: wherefore he thought good, within the same territory there were allotted and set out four hundred acres of land unto Deligatus, by whose means Marius was allured and induced to leave the adverse part and turn to the Romans.

After that Maximilian was departed out of Sicily the Navy of the Carthaginians disbarked eight thousand footmen, and seven thousand Numidian horsemen, unto them they yielded the Murgantine land, and Hybla, together with Adagella and other small parts of bare account, took example by them and followed after. The Numidians with him, Clupian Amirius ranged over all Sicily and fired the towns and villages belonging to the associates of the people of Rome. Over and besides all this the Roman army there, being discontented and angry, partly for that together with their General, nerall, they were not licensed to go out of the Province: and partly for that they were forbidden and debarr'd, for wintering in any good towns: demeaned themselves slackly and lazily in their military service: in such sort, as if there had been a head to lead them, as they had a heart to move them, they would have mutined and rebelled. Among these troubles and difficulties, M. Cornelius the Pretor, both appeased and mitigated the stomachs of the soldiers, as well by comfortable words, as by rebukes and checks: and also brought under his obedience and subjection, all those Cities which had revolted. Of which he according to the former act of the Senate, allotted Murgantia to the Spaniards, unto whom both a City and land to it was by order afore said due. Both the Consuls who had the government of the Province Apulia, seeing there was less cause of fear and terror now from the Carthaginians and Amiboli, were commanded to cast lots between them for the Provinces of Apulia and Macedonia, so Macedonia befell unto Sulpicius, and he succeeded there instead of Levinus. Ennius was sent for home to Rome, about the election of the Consuls: And when he held the solemn assembly of the people, for the choice and creation of the Consuls, The Century of the younger Citizens, which had the prerogative to give their first voice, declared T. Manlius Torquatus, and T. Otacilius for Consuls, Manlius being there present in place, when the multitude came about him to congratulate with God give you joy, &c. (for that there was no doubt, but the whole body of the people would approve this choice of the first Century) came with a great company about him to the tribunal seat of estate where the Consul sat: and made request unto him, that he would give him the hearing of some few words, and command

C that prerogative century which had given their voices to be called back again to a new hearing. And when every man was attentive, and expected what he should demand, he alleged for his excuse a pair of ill eyes. "For a shameless Pilot of a ship he is, and as impudent a General or an Ar" (quoth he) who having to do all by other mens eyes, would require to have the goods and lives of other men to be put into their hands. And therefore may it please your honour to command this Century of the younger sort to give their voices anew, and in creating Consuls, to remember the war that is in Italy, to consider of the troublesome state of the Commonwealth, and to think of this, That scarcely yet mens ears have had any rest, since they rejoyced and rung again with the noises and alarms, that the enemies raised within their few months, when they lay in siege near unto the walls of Rome. But after those words, when the said Century cried D with one accord, that they were of the same mind still, and would nominate the same Consuls again, and none other: then Torquatus, "Neither (quoth he) shall I be able, if I were Consul to bear with your fashions and conditions, nor you again endure my rule and commandment: To the scrutiny therefore once again, and think how the Carthaginians war within Italy, and what is the General of the enemies. Then the Century moved as well by the authority and reverence of the mans person, as by the applause and admiration of the people, who would at his vertue, besought the Consul to call forth and cite a Century of the elder bands: for that they would willingly conl with more ancient men than themselves, and by their sage advice and good direction nominate the Consuls. When those elders were called to this Century, there was some time allowed for to commune apart secretly with them, within the place called in, called Coile.

E These ancients said unto them, that they were to consult of three persons, whereof two already were full of honourable dignities, which they had born to wit, Q. Fabius and M. Marcellus. But verily (say they) in case ye would have some Coi, to be chosen, for to be opposed against the Carthaginians, ye have M. Valerius Maximus, a notable man, one who hath performed singular good service, and achieved many noble deeds, both by sea and land against King Philip. So when they had three propounded unto them, the elder were dismissed, and the younger entered into a second scrutiny: and declared for Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus (glittering then in the prime of his glory, for the late subduing and conquest of Sicily) and M. Valerius, who was absent. This freedom and choice of the prerogative Century, all the rest followed after, and by their suffrages confirmed. "Let them mock on now and scoff hereat all they that have nothing in admiration but antiquity and things done in elder time. For mine own part, if there be any such City and Commonwealth at all, consisting of wife men and Philosophers, as some great Clerks have imagined in their fantasies, than found in effects: I dare be bold to think & say, that in it there could not possibly be either rulers and Magistrates more grave and temperate in their desire of dignity and government, or a people better mannered, nurtured, and instructed. But that it should be thought an unlikely matter and scarce credible, that a Century of younger persons were willing to consult with the elder, and be advised by them to whom they should give their voices, for to becrated the chief Magistrates: it is the corruption of this our age that is the cause: wherein we see how little reverence and authority even parents themselves have, and of how slender and bare account they be amongst their own natural children.

After this followed the Election of Pretors, wherein were created P. Manlius Volfo, and L. G. Manlius Acidinus, C. Lelivius, and L. Cincius Alimentus. When this Election was finished it fortuned that news came, how T. Otacilius (whom the people, as it seemed, would have chosen in his absence to march T. Manlius in the Consulship, but that the ordinary course of the election was disturbed and stopped) departed this life in Sicily. The Apolliniae games in the former year had been exhibited: and when Calpurnius the Pretor put up a bill, and moved the Senate that they might be celebrated again that year also, there passed a decree, That they should be vowed to continue from time to time for ever.

"many Sicilians in the towns and villages near unto the City, backbiters and slanderers of him: H
 "the for his own part he was so far off from hating; but that they might freely for all him
 "divulgate and publish abroad in Rome all those crimes which were devised and spoken against "him by his adversaries, that were ignorant that they pretended some fair pretence, to charge the "Consul with any matters, in the absence of his Collegue, he would straightwaies give them au"dience in the Senate; but so soon verily as my brother Consul is come home, I will not, quoth he,
 "I assure you, suffer any one matter to be debated here, before that those Sicilians be sent for into
 "the Senate house. And I understand that M. Cornelius hath taken general search like a murther
 "over all Sicily, to the end there might come a chamber to Rome with complaints of some: he also
 "with letters full of untruths hath buzzed into all mens ears, and born the whole City in hand, I
 "that the war continueth still in Sicily, and all to diminish and abridge my glory. The Consul "having that day won the commendation and name of one that knew how to rule and govern his "affairs, dismissed the Senate: and it seemed that that would be a general vacation out of law
 "matters only; but of all other things as it was his holiday still, until the other Consul came unto
 "the City. This rest and idleness (as the wonted manner is) let the Commons having nothing else "to do, talking: and now their tongues walked apart, ceasing not to spread rumours, That by "this long and continuall war, not only the lands and territory about the City of Rome (especially "where Ardea had marched with his rebel army) were wasted, but also Italy was in a manner
 "despoiled and laid desolate, by reason of so many murtherers and levies complaining, that whole
 "armies were defeated and put to the sword at Canus in defence of the Common wealth: and "that there were two Consuls created, both martial men, and warlike, over-fierce and eager of "fight, such a time of peace and quietness were able to find occasions of war: so little was it to "be looked for at their hands, that in time of war they would seek for peace, and suffer the City to "have any breathing time and intermission. These speeches rumoured among the common people "were interrupted and staid by occasion of a late-fire that began in sundry places together about
 "the Forum in the night of that day, which was immediately before the festival daies of Minerva, "called Quinquagesima. At one and the self-same time the seven merchants shops and ware-houses, "which afterwards were turned into five; and the shops of the Bankers and money-changers which "now are called Nova, (or the new-shops) were on fire. Divers private mens houses also the fire "caught for, as then there were no stately Halls and Palaces of the City there built. Likewise the "fire took hold of the common prison, called Latinia, the Fifth market hall likewise, and the roy-
 "all gallery or walking-place, hardly could the Chapel of Vesta be saved, and that by the good help
 "and pains-taking especially of thirteen bondslaves: whose bondage was bought out at the Cities "charges, and they made freemen. The fire continued one night and a day: and no man made
 "doubt, but it came by mans hand, and was the practice of some lewd persons: for that the fires
 "began in many places at once, and those far distant asunder. Whereupon the Consul by the advice "and direction of the Senat, made proclamation in a solemn assembly of the people, that whoe-
 "ever would come forth and give notice by whose means that fire was procured, he should be well "rewarded: if he were a free-man, with a piece of money; if Bond, with freedom. In hope of "which recompence, a certain slave belonging to the Calpurnii the Campans, (his name was Man"lius) was induced to bewray the matters whom he served, and five other young Gentlemen of *Ca-
 "pua* whose fathers had lost their heads by the commandment of Q. Fulvius: Those he appeached
 "to have made the said fires: and he gave them a warning besides, that they intended to do more "mischief about the City, if they were let alone, and not apprehended; so they were attached, and "their household servants. At the first, these persons made light account both of the informer, and "the information they made, and elevated the credit that was given thereto: alleging, that the day "before the party himself being chastised and scourged by his Masters, ran away, and so upon an "anger and giddy fit, deviled: (by occasion of this misfortune which was meer casual) to frame
 "an accusation against his masters. But when the matter was averred to their teeth in open place, "and that they, by whose ministry the feat was done, were in the midst of the Forum put to N
 "the rack for to utter a truth; then they all made confession of the fact. So as well the Masters that "were the fathers thereof, as the servants that were privy and accessory thereto, had their desires,
 "and suffered for it. The informer who disclosed the villany, was made free, and had 20000 sasses
 "for his labour.

 Recl.

"As the Consul Latinus passed by Capua in his journey [homewards,] there flocked about "him a number of Campans, and besought him with tears, that they might have leave to go "to Rome, and present themselves before the Senate, there to make suit (it haply there was any "pity and commiseration in them) not to destroy them utterly, nor suffer Q. Flaccus to consume the "name and generation of the Campans off the face of the earth. "Now Flaccus for his part "declared flatly that he bore them any private grudge by malice; but only hated the Campans as "the common enemies to the state, and so he would do ever so long as he knew them to live.
 "As they were to the people of Rome for there was not a nation upon earth, nor a people un"der heaven more spitefully & deadly bent against the Roman name than they were. And that "was the cause (saith he) that he penned them up within their walls, for whatsoever of them than"ked any way to make an escape, they ranged about the country like brute and savage beasts, pen"ning, tearing, and killing whosoever came in their way. Some of them were fled to the adjacent Ade "unto Ardea but others are gone to Rome to set fire on the City, and there (quoth he) that the Con"sul

"A still fired the market place half burned, and the very prints and tokens remaining fresh of the
 "the Campans mischievous practices. There should he see that they minded to have done violence
 "upon the Chapel of Vesta, and to have put out those eternal fires, and utterly defaced the fatal "place of the Roman Empire, bestowed and laid up fire in the most secret place of the Chap"pel. Neither thought he it was safer for the City to permit the Campans to come within the "walls thereof. Then Ardea having caused the Captains to take a corporal oath, and swear un"der pain of death, that they would make return to Capua before five daies were expired, after they had "their answer and dispatch from the Senate, commanded them to come after him to Rome, "attended thus as he was with his company, he encountered the Sicilians also, who came forth to "meet him; and with this multitude he entered the City, accompanied (I say) with the Campans
 "and Sicilians, both vanquished and subdued by war; as accusers of two most famous persons, "Marcellus and Fulvius, who had conquered two most noble and renowned Cities, Syracuse, and "Capua."

"But both the Consul treated and consulted first with the Senate, about the state of the Common"wealth, and the government of the Provinces. There Levinus related in what terms stood Ma"cedonia and Greece: the Ætolians also, with the Acarnanians and Locrians: likewise what acts
 "he had uttered in those parts both by sea and land: and how he had repulsed Philip back into "Macedonia, when he began to make war upon the Ætolians, who now was retired and gone "into the utmost parts of his Kingdom: so as the legion might be withdrawn from thence, for
 "C that the Armado was sufficient to keep the King forth of Italy. Thus much spake he of himself, "and of the Province whereof he had been governor. Then both Consuls in common, propo"sed unto the Senat, concerning the Province, And the L. decreed that one of the Consuls should "take the charge of Italy, and of the war with Ardea: and the other should have under his "hand the Armado, whereof T. Octavius was the Admiral: and together with L. Cincius the Praetor "govern the Province of Sicily. They were allowed the two armies which were in Tuscan and "in France, consisting of four legions: whereof two of the former year, that were of Citizens
 "should be sent into Tuscan, and those two which the Consul Sulpicius had conducted, should be "led into France. Moreover that he should have the government of France, and the leading of the "Legions thereto, whom that Consul would appoint, whosolet it was to have Italy for his Province.
 "D Into Tuscan was C. Calpurnius sent, with Commission after the term of the Pratorship expired, "to have his full jurisdiction to continue for a year. Likewise to Q. Fulvius was signified the "keeping of Capua, and his rule prorogued for another year. The armies, as well of Citizens as of "Allies, were by commandment of the Senat abridged and made less: so that for two legions there "should be but one, and that consisting of five thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen:
 "that they should be discharged of soldiery who had served longest: that of Allies there should "be less seven thousand foot, and three hundred horse: with the same respect and consideration "of service in dismissing the old soldiers. As for Cn. Fulvius the Consul of the former year, he "ruled the same Province of Apulia still, without any alteration of his forces: only his govern"ment was continued unto him another year. And P. Sulpicius his Collegue, was commanded
 "E to send away all his army, only the mariners and sailors excepted. Likewise order was given that "so soon as the new Consul was arrived and landed in the Province of Sicily, the army there,
 "which was commanded by M. Cornelius, should be sent out of Sicily. Unto L. Cincius the Praetor
 "were assigned the soldiers that remained after the defeat at Canus, for to keep Sicily in order,
 "and those arose to two legions. And as many legions were appointed for P. Manlius Volsus the "Praetor, for to go into Sardinia, even those whereof L. Cornelius had the leading in the same Pro"vince the former year. As for the legions of Citizens, the Consuls were enjoined to levy and "enroll them so, as they entertained no soldier of all those who had served in the army, either of "M. Claudius, or M. Valerius, or Fulvius: nor exceeded the number that year of one and twenty leg"ions of the Romans. When these Acts were passed in the Senate-house, the Consuls cast lots for "their several Provinces, Sicily and the Armado fell to Marcellus: Italy and the war against Ar"dea, to Levinus.

"This lot that fell to Marcellus so struck the Sicilians dead, (who stood in the presence of the "Consuls, looking for the event of the lottery) as if Syracuse had been lost again: in such sort, as "their pitiful lamentations, and their wofull plaints, for the present turned all mens eyes up"on them, and none after minifred cause of much speech and talk. For they went about to "all the Senators from one to another, in poor and vile array, protesting, "That if Marcellus came "amongst them again as L. Deputy, they would not only forsake every man his own country "where he was born, but also abandon the whole Island of Sicily: complaining that without any "desert of their parts, heretofore he had been cruelly bent against them, and his hatred was irre"concilable: and what would he now do in his choler, and knowing that his Sicilians came to
 "G Rome of purpose to make complaints of him? The Island were better (say they) to be on a light
 "fire to burn with Etna: or to be all a very sea, than thus to be exposed as a prey unto a mor-
 "tall enemy, for to be devoured. These grievous moans and pious complaints of the Sicilians
 "first carried to the houses of the Nobles and great men of the City, and there taken up and much "talked of by many, whiles some pitied the Sicilians, others envied Marcellus, spread abroad at "length so far, until they came to the Council-Table. And the Consuls were dealt withal, to "propose unto the Senate, that they might exchange their Provinces one for another. Then *Mar-called them up and said, "That in case audience had been given to the Sicilians already in these assemblies, peradventure he would deliver his opinion to another purpose; but now, lest any man might say, that they were bribed for fear, and did not speak what he said, he complains of their would of him, at whose command, and approbation, he should have been within a while he was for his party ready to make change of his Province in this College, were as well content, and made no greater trouble of the matter. Only he sought about the Senate would not prejudice his cause. For it was the first (though he had been heard, and in just, extordirectly, and without calling lots to give my College to the other side, as it was known, and much greater wrong than I could have done. So for that time, the State having made an should be taken from me and transferred upon him. So for that time, the State having made an overture unto Marcellus, what they would have done, rather than by any decree prejudiced the matter, brake up. And the Consuls, having seen them, they privately made exchange one with the other. See the fortune and fatal destiny of Marcellus, that healed him, as it were, to be matched with Annibal, and to fall into his hands; so that the same man, who of all the Romans, was the first that vanquished Annibal in fight, and won the honour from him, should now in the midst of prosperity and happy success of war, be the last Roman General, that was slain by Annibal; and yielded the glory of giving him the overthrow. After the Province was thus inexchangeably joined, the Sicilians were brought into the Senate, where they made a long speech as touching the perpetual and continuing faithfulness unto the end of K. Hieron, towards the people of Rome, and all to carry favour and gain thanks unto the whole nation of Sicily, Remains, that Hieronymus fight, and after him, Hippocrates and Epicles, as for other things, so especially for their revolt-from the Romans, and turning to Annibal, were odious and hateful unto them. For which cause and nothing else, Hieronymus was by the hands of the chiefs of their young gallantry, as it were, by a public decree of the State made away and killed, and the nobles of their young gentlemen, to the number of seventy, conspired to murder Hippocrates and Epicles, who being disappointed and put by the effecting of their design, through the delay of Marcellus, who at the time before appointed, came not with his power to Syracuse, were appeached, their intended plot revealed, and they all by those tyrants put to death. And yet to speak a truth, Marcellus did not reveal, and he that gave the first occasion of the tyrannizing of Hippocrates and Epicles, in that most cruelly he sacked and rifled the Leontines. But from that time forward, the Nobles of Syracuse never ceased to come in unto Marcellus, and promised to deliver the City into his hands, whenever he pleased. But he, forsooth, at first, stood upon these terms, that he would rather force it by assault; but afterwards, seeing he could not effect that his purpose, nor without his help, he wrought all the devices he could, both by sea and land, he made those of one Sopho a coppersmith, & Marius a Spaniard to have them to work and contrive the betraying of the City, rather than of the principal of the Syracusan Nobility, who had so often offered that service, and never yet would it be accepted: so altho' not, because he might pretend some colourable cause of justice, to proceed in all rigor against the most ancient allies of the people of Rome, for to massacre them, and make spoil of all that they had. Set safe that Hieronymus had not revolted and gone to Annibal, but the whole people and Senate of Syracuse. Suppose, that the Syracusians in general, by public consent had shut the gates against Marcellus, & not their Tyrants Hippocrates and Epicides, when they had the Syracusians sure enough under their own hands? Say they had watted against the people Rome with as spiteful and cankered malice as the Carthaginians do, and ever did: what greater hostility could Marcellus possibly have exercised against them more than he hath, unless he would destroy and raze the City to the very ground? Surely he hath left nothing in Syracuse, but the bare walls, the naked and empty houses of the City, the temples and chapels of the gods defaced & broke open for the gods themselves, with all their rich & gorgeous ornaments are carried away. Many a man is spoiled and robbed of his goods, in such sort, as having nothing left him but the bare soil, they are not able when all is gone, with his leavings to maintain themselves, and sustain their wives and children. They were humble petitioners, therefore, to and suppliant suiters unto the LL. of the Senate, to take order, that restitution might be made unto their rightful owners, if not of all (for that is impossible) yet of so much at least, as was to be found, and might be truly owned again.

After these and such like complaints, Livius the Consul commanded them to go forth of the Council-house, to the end that the LL. might be consulted with, and deliver their opinions concerning their demands. Nay, many (quoth Marcellus) let them stay still rather, that I may answer to their very faces: seeing my LL. our cause and condition is so hard, who war and fight for you, that we must have those to inform against us, and be our accusers, whom we have conquered and subdued by martial arms: Let it even be so, that two Cities, to wit, Capua and Syracuse, won this year, may convert judicially both their conquerors, the one Fulvius, the other Marcellus. When the Embassadors were brought back again into the Senate-house, then began Marcellus the Consul, and spake in this wise.

"I am not so far overleken, and forgetful, my Lords, either of the majesty of the people of Rome, or of this place of command which I now hold, that I would plead mine own cause, as Consul as I am, against the Grecians, my accusers, in case the question were of any crime or fault of mine own. But all the controversy to be discussed, standeth not upon these terms, to examine what I have done, whom the right of war will justify and bear out, howsoever I have proceeded

"I proceeded against enemies: but what these men have deserved to suffer. If they were not enemies, nor so to be reputed, then it mattered not, and it had been all one, either now or in the life time of King Hiero, to have forced Syracuse. But if it appear, that they have revolted, that they have evil intreated our Embassadors, threatened to use violent hands, and to run upon us with sword and force of arms, that they have manned their walls, and shut their gates upon us, that they have maintained the army of the Carthaginians against us: who can be grieved and offended, if they have suffered as enemies, who suck not first to offer all hostility whatsoever?
 Rejected I the Nobles of Syracuse when they would have delivered the City into my hands?
 And made I more account of Sopho, and Marius the Spaniard, and thought them worthy to be trusted in so important a matter? Ye are not, I am sure, the meanest of the Syracusians, that thus reproach others with benefices of state? Who was it of all you here, that promised to open me the gates? that undertook to receive my armed soldiers into the City? Nay, my ye here and scurle them in your heart, who have so done; and even in this place cannot forbear to give them hard-terms, and revile them: so unlike it is, that you your-selves ever meant to have done any such things. Even this abject condition and base calling of theirs, my LL. which these men twit them with, is a manifest token, and a most evident argument, that I refused none, that was willing to do good service unto our State and Common-wealth. At the very first, before I laid siege unto Syracuse, I assailed by all means to have peace: or while sending Embassadors unto them, afterwards going in person to parley with them. Afterwards, seeing that without all reverence of Embassadors, they thamed not to offer them abuse: without regard of my self, they deigned to me no answer when I came to the gates, and conferred with their chief Nobility: after much travail, toil, and infinite pains, sustained both by Land and Sea, at length by mere force and hot assault, I became Master and Lord of Syracuse. Now as touching that which hath befallen unto them, since they were overcome, and lost their City, I would suppose they had more reason, and juster cause to make their moan, and complain unto Annibal and the Carthaginians, those that ate likewise conquered, than before the Senate of the people of Rome their Conqueror. For mine own part, my LL. if I had ever meant to deny and disavow the spoiling and seeking of Syracuse, and not to stand to it when I had done, I would never have been so ill advised, as to beauty and adorn the City of Rome with the spoils thereof. And what I have given or forgiven unto any particular person, I am assured that I may well justly and lawfully the same, both by the law of war, and also by the desert of every one. Now, my LL. whether ye will approve and ratify my doings or no, it concerneth and toucheth the Common-wealth rather than my self. My part I have done, and discharged my duty faithfully. It much importeth now the State, that by revelling (as it were) and dismissing mine actions, ye make not your other Generals from henceforth, to be more slack and backward in the like employment. To conclude my LL. since that ye have heard both my self and the Sicilians (speak our minds face to face) we will all together go out of this Temple, that in my absence the Senate may more frankly speak to the point, and deliver their opinions. Thus the Sicilians were dismissed, and he himself went forth into the Capitol, for to take a levy of soldiers.

"The other Consul in the mean time, put to question the demands of the Sicilians before the LL.
 Much canvassing a long while, and discussing there was of the matter, and divers opinions passed; Many of the Senators following T. Manlius Torquatus the head and principal man, that maintained a side, were of this mind, "That they should have made war against the tyrants, the common Enemies as well to the Syracusians, as to the State of Rome. And as for the City, it was to be recovered, rather recovered and received, than won by force: and being so received, it was to be re-established in her own ancient laws and freedom, and not after it was so wearied with miserable servitude, to be scourged and afflicted with war upon it. But between the Warring of the tyrants of the one side, and the Roman General of the other, a most beautiful and noble City, standing in the midst (as a prize and reward for the winner) is undone by the means; even that City which sometime had been the garnier (as it were) and the Treasure-house of the people of Rome: by the unlimitless liberality and bounty whereof, by whose rich presents and goodly gifts our City many a time and oft, yea, and but of late days in this Punic war, hath been relieved and adorned. If King Hiero should arise again from the dead and come among us, Hiero (I say) the most faithful maintainer of the Roman State, with what face could we sit upon him, either Syracuse or Rome? When he should see of one side, his own native country, half rased and wholly spoiled; and on the other side, coming to Rome, in the very entering of the City, and hard at the gate, should behold the spoils of his own City? Notwithstanding these and such like speeches cast out among them, to procure ill will and hatred to the Consul, and to move pity and compassion to the Sicilians, yet the LL. of the Senate in favour of Marcellus, agreed upon a milder decree, and enacted, That whatsoever he had done, either during the war, or after conquest, should be ratified and allowed for good: for the time to come, the Senate would take order and provide for the good of the Syracusians, and give the Consul Livius a special charge, to have regard of the welfare of that City, so far forth, as might not be prejudicial to the State of Rome.
 Then were two Senators sent into the Capitol to the Consul, to request him to repair again unto the assembly of the Senate: and after the Sicilians also were admitted into the place, their act and decree aforesaid was openly read. The Embassadors had good words given them, and were dismissed: whereupon they fell down prostrate at the feet of Marcellus the Consul, beseeching him him to pardon that which they had spoken, either to show well, or to save their calamity; and yet to give both them in particular, and the City of Capua in general, unto his sacerdotal protection. After that, the Consul with gracious words besought them to depart.

When the Sicilians had their dispatch, the Campanians had likewise given them in the Senate; and as their speech was more lamentable, so the Senate was heavier, and harder to be dissuaded; so neither could they themselves deny, but that they deserved condign punishment: nor Tyrants had they any, upon whose they might lay the blame. But they thought they had suffered enough for their sins already, in that so many of their Senators died by poison, and so many lost their heads. Some few of their nobility and but a few remained yet alive, who as they were not touched in conscience, nor to fault, so to lay blame upon themselves, to the Conquerors in his furious wrath, adjudged them not worthy of death: they therefore made humble suit for themselves, for their wives and children, to obtain freedom, and to enjoy some part of their own goods, being as they were, meer citizens of Rome, and most of them by affinity and near kinsed, upon mutual and equal marriages, linked in alliance and blood to the Romans. After that they also were called to vote of the Senate house: for a while, there grew some question and doubt, whether Q. Fulvius should be sent for from Capua (for presently upon the taking of the City, Clodius the Consul died), that this matter might be argued and discussed in presence of the General himself, like as the other had been reasoned of and debated between M. Atilius, and the Sicilians. But afterwards when they saw in the Senate house M. Atilius, and Q. Fulvius, the brother of Flaccus, both his kinsmen, as likewise Q. Minucius, and L. Pomponius Philo, kinsmen unto Clodius, who had been present in all actions, and were eyewitnesses of every thing; and besides, were unwilling that either Fulvius should be called away from Capua, or the Campanians longer delayed: M. Atilius, Q. Fulvius, who of all them that had been at the taking of Capua, was of greatest authority and reputation, being demanded his opinion, spake in this wise.

I take it (quoth he) when Capua was newly won, I was one of the Consuls with thee; when question was asked, and enquiry made, Whether any one Campanian had deserved word of us and our Common-wealth, and found it was but two women only to wit, Phile Oppia, born in Ardea, but dwelling then at Capua, and Reveria Clovia, sometime a common trumpet and courier, were well willed unto us. The former of these two daily sacrificed for the welfare, life, and victory of the Romans; the other, secretly sustained the poor and needy Roman families with food and victuals. As for all other Campanians, from the highest to the lowest, they were no better affected unto us, than the Carthaginians. And even those, who were beleagued by Antiochus Rex, suffered death, not because they were more faulty than others, but for that they were of greater mark and calling, than the meanly. Now, that the Senate should decide the fault of any Campanian, who are so antient and dear to Rome, without a grant from the people, I do not know it can be. For in our former times the like case was of the Sarracens that rebelled; and then M. Annius, Tribune of the Commons, first put up a bill, and the Commons afterwards passed it, namely, That the Senate might have power and authority, to give their opinion, and determine of the Sarracens. Therefore I am of mind, that we deal with the Tribunes of the Commons, that one or more of them propose a bill unto the Commons, by virtue whereof we may be authorised to let down laws order for the Campanians. Then L. Atilius, Tribune of the Commons, by leave and advice of the Senate, proposed unto the Commons a bill in this form and manner. Whereas the Campanians, Ardeans, Calatians, and Sabellians, who have yielded themselves unto Fulvius the Proconsul, to sit at the pleasure and disposal of the people of Rome: all such alie, which they have surrendered together with themselves, as well their territory, as their City, as all might, both sacred and profane, their necessary implements, and all other things whatsoever, I demand your will and pleasure. Q. Quirinus, who shall be done with the premises? The Commons also deliberation, gave their voices to the said bill in this form. Our will and pleasure is, that whatsoever ye the Senators, who now are in Council, or the most part of you think good and determine, shall stand for just and lawful. Upon this grant or Act of the Commons, the Senate by a decree awarded unto Oppia and Clovia, first their own goods and liberty; and moreover if they were desirous to crave further reward at the Senates hand, they were left to repair unto Rome. For every family and several house of the Campanians, there were special acts and decrees made, all which to repeat and rehearse, would not quit the labour. Some had their goods confiscated: themselves, their Children and Wives were to be sold, excepting those their Daughters which were wedded, before that they came under the subjection of this people of Rome. Others were to be clapt up in Prison, until further order were taken for them hereafter. Moreover, of some Campanians they made distinction by valuation of their wealth, whether their goods were to be confiscated or no. All their heads and cattail which were taken, save Horses; all their bond-slaves, but under fourteen years of age and upward, all moveable goods also, which were not annexed, and fastned to the soil, they awarded for to be restored to the true owners. All Campanians, Astellians, Calatians, Sabellians, excepting those, who either themselves, or whose parents took part and sided with the enemies, they judged to be free; provided always, that none of them were either Free-citizens of Rome, or of Latium. Item, it was enacted, that none of them who had been at Capua while the gates were shut, should remain either in the City, or territory of Capua, within a certain day prescribed: but should have a place set out unto them for to dwell in, on the farther side of Tyber, so it were not upon the very bank close unto

A. Tyber. As for those that during the time of war had been neither at Capua nor in any other City of Campania, which revolted from the people of Rome, they should be removed to inhabit on this side the River Tyber between it and Rome; but such as were turned and passed to the Romans side, before that Annibal came unto Capua, they should be transplanted on the hither side of Pulturnus the River: provided, that none of them should possess either house or Land within fifteen miles of the Sea. As concerning them who were displaced and confined to inhabit beyond the Tyber, neither they nor their heirs and successors for ever, should purchase and hold house or Land in any place, but in the territory either of Veii, Sutrinum, or Neptunum: but so, as they exceeded not the space of five hundred Acres of ground. As touching the goods and chattels of all the Senators, of such as had born Magistracy in Capua, Ardeans, or Calatians, they awarded that sale should be made thereof in Capua. As for those that were free born, and whose bodies were to be sold, they should be sent to Rome, and there, set a sale. Finally, the Images and Statues of Bras, which were said to have been won and taken from the enemies, whether they were sacred or profane, they referred to the College of the Priests and Prelates, to determine thereof at their discretion. Thus they gave the Campanians their dispatch, and sent them away much worse paid for their decrees, than they were when they came first to Rome. And now they complained no more of the cruel proceedings of Q. Fulvius against them, but blamed the iniquity and unjust dealing of the very Gods, and their own cursed fortune together.

After the Sicilians and Campanians were dismissed, there was a muster taken: and when an army was levied and enrolled, there began some question and reasoning about the mariners and Rowers to furnish the Gallies. For the accomplishment whereof, when the Consuls could neither raise men enough, nor yet find money at that time in the Chamber of the City, for to presse and hire them, and pay their wages withal: they published an edict, that private men according to the rate and proportion in the Subsidy book, out of all orders, degrees, and companies, should as aforesaid find Rowers at their own charges, and maintain them with meat and money for thirty dayes. Upon which Edict and Proclamation, all men lo grumbled and muttered, and were to highly discontented and angered, that they wanted an head and Captain, rather then matter and occasion of a mutiny and insurrection: giving out, "That the Consuls had taken a course, and were in the very train to plague, undo, and destroy the Commons of Rome, like as they had already the Sicilians and the Campanians. For thus many years they have been pillaged, cleaned spent and consumed with exaction of tributes, and had nothing left them but the bare ground, and the same lying waste and untilld. As for their Houses upon their Lands, the enemies had burned: their servants and bonds, such as should husband and till their grounds, the Common-wealth had bereaved them of: one whiles buying them up to the war, for some little piece of money: other whiles levying and pressing them to the Seas to be Gallies-slaves, for a thing of nothing. A man could not so soon get one brail farthing, or single silver denier before-hand, but it went by and by either for Gallies-pay, or for yearly Tribute. And to give that now which they had not, they might never be brought by any force or for any mans commandment whatsoever. Let them sell and make an hand of their goods, imprison and punish their bodies too, when all is gone besides; seeing there is nothing left them to ransom and redeem the same."

Again. These and such like words were not only muttered in buggermugger, but uttered also and given out in broad terms even in the market-place and before the Consuls, by the multitude that flocked and gathered together in exceeding great numbers: in such sort, as the Consuls were not able with all that ever they could do, to appease the mutiny, neither by sharp rebukes, nor fair words and comfortable speeches. Then they said, that they would give and allow them three dayes respite for to think and consider of these matters: which they themselves bestowed wholly and employed in taking a view and survey of their goods, and making dispatch and ridance thereof out of the way. The next day the Consuls called the Senate together to consult about the supply of Rowers and Gallies-slaves: where, after much debating and arguing, that the Commons had good reason to make denial; at length the drift of all their speech was this, "That whether it were right or wrong, the burden much on privat mens shoulders, there was no remedy: for seeing there was no money in the common chest, how should Mariners and Rowers else be gotten and levied? And without Armadoes, how possibly should either Sicily be held still in possession, or Philip be kept out of Italy? or the Sea coasts of Italy remain in safety and security? In these distresses and difficulties the Council being perplexed, and to seek for remedy, and whiles every mans wits were in the wan and so confounded, as if they were benumbed and stone cold: Then Levinus the Consul, As the Magistrate (quoth he) goeth before the Senate in a place of honor, and the Senat likewise before the common people in worth and dignity: so they ought in all difficulties and hard occurrences to undergo the weightiest burdens first, and be the Foremen and Leaders in all dangerous adventures whatsoever. For if a man would enjoy his inferiors to bear some grievous and heavy load, let him first take it up himself, and impose the same upon his own train and company: all the rest then, will be more willing and obedient to follow after, and do the semblable. And never will they grutch at any yolk or charges, when they see their Leaders and Rulers take more upon themselves, than they are well able to wield and sustain. To the end therefore that the people of Rome may be provided and furnished of a fleet rigged and trimmed, as our desire is, and that private persons may not think much, nor refuse to find Rowers thereunto: let us first that are here command our own selves: let us,

The speech of Levinus the

"I say, that be Senators, bring abroad in common all the gold, all the silver, all the braſe coin that we have, ſo as every man referſerving only for himſelf, his wife and children: and a little tablet or Jewel for his ſon, as a pendant to hang about his neck. Alſo let all them that have wives or daughters, retain ſtill one ounce weight of gold, and one pound of ſilver: And as many as have born office of State, and ſit in the Ivory Chair, keep ſtill the trappings and caparition of their Horſe, and two pound weight a piece, the oge of gold, the other of ſilver: for to have a Salt-cellar, and a little bowl or cup, to ſacrifice and offer unto the Gods withal: As for the reſt of the Senators, let us leave them but one pound weight of ſilver, and no gold at all, and five thouſand Aſſes in coin, to every houſholder a piece. "All other gold, ſilver, and braſe money be ſold, let us forthwith bring abroad, and preſent unto the Triumvirs or publick Bankers, beſides that we make of each any decree of Senat: to the end, that our good example in this voluntary benevolence and contribution, and our eſtimate endeavour to help the Common-weal, may ſtir up and provoke the hearts and affections, firſt of thoſe that are calling Gentlemen and Knights of Rome, and then forward the reſt of the commons, to imitate and follow us with ſome emulation. This is the only means which we that are Conſuls have thought upon and deviſed, after much talk and conference together: Set to therefore, my maſters, in the name of God, and lead the way: God will bleſs your good beginnings. So long as the City ſtandeth on foot, and holdeth up the head, no man need fear to live private here: but it ſhall do well enough. Go the weal publick to wreck once, and decay, let no man ever think to ſave his own. All the whole houſe liked ſo well of theſe motions, that not only they gave their accord and conſent thereto, but over and beſides, yielded beſides thanks unto the Conſuls for their good advice and counſel. When the Senat was diſmiſſed, every man for himſelf brought forth his gold, his ſilver, and braſe money, and laid all together in common: and that with ſuch ſpeed, ſtriving a vie who could go before another, and have his name entered firſt in the publick Roles and Registers: as neither the ſorſaid Triumvirs were able to receive it ſalt enough, as it was tendered unto them; nor the ordinary Clerks and Notaries to ſet it down in writing, and take note thereof accordingly. This conſent and agreement of the Senators, the Knights and Gentlemen of Rome in their place and calling ſeconded; and the commons for their parts were not behind. So without any constraint of law, without edict, without any exhortation made by the Magiſtrates, the common-weal wanted neither Rowers for to ſuſtain the armadoes, nor money to pay the Rowers. And thus when all things were provided neceſſary for the wars, the Conſuls went forth to their ſeveral Provinces.

Never was there any time of this war, wherein Carthaginians and Romans together, had more trial of the alternative and variable change of fortune: never hung they more in equal balance, between fair hope and fearful danger. The Romans, in theſe Provinces taſted both of ſweet and ſour. In Spain on the one ſide, they ſped ill and loſt: in Sicily on the other ſide, they ſped well and won: ſo as their ſorrow was interlaced ſtill and mingled with joy. Alſo in Italy, the loſſe of Tarentum turned to their woe and damage: but the keeping of the Caſtle there with the garriſon, beyond all their hope and expectation, brought them joy and comfort for their ſorrow. Alſo, their ſuddain fright and fear, for the ſiege and aſſault of the City of Rome, was ſalved and cured again within a few dayes after, by the forcing and winning of Capua: and all that heavineſſe and mourning turned into mirth and gladneſſe. The affairs alſo beyond Sea, were checked with interchangeable turns and courſes. Philip became their enemy in an ill time, and when they had little need thereof. Contrary-wiſe, the Aetolians and Attalus the King of Aſia the leſt, proved to be their new friends and loving allies: whereby even then fortune, ſeemed to ſmile on the Romans, and by that overture, promiſed as it were, unto them the Empire of the Eaſt. Scemably the Carthaginians, as they loſt Capua, ſo they won Tarentum, and made a ſaving game of it. In like manner, as they took no ſmall pride and glory, in coming to the walls of Rome without reſiſtance; ſo they were danted and diſmaid again, that this their enterpriſe took no better effect in the end: and held themſelves much diſgraced and diſhonoured, that whiles they ſet themſelves before one gate of Rome, there was an army of Romans led forth at another, and ſent into Spain. And even in Spain alſo, the greater hope men had there, that upon the death of two ſo noble and valiant Generals, and the deſeat of two ſo puſſant armies, the war was come to a final end, and the Romans driven from thence for ever: the more ſpight it was, and the greater grief and vexation they conceived again, when by the valour of L. Marcius a tumultuary Captain, choſen in haſt they knew not how, thoſe former victories turned to vanities, and came to juſt nothing. Thus fortune was indifferent, and all things doubtful and wavering in ſuſpenſe, both on the one ſide: and the other. Their hope all one as it was at firſt; their fear, the ſame ſtill, neither more nor leſſe: So as between hope and fear, they tared; as if the war at this time were new to begin.

Annibal above all other things, was vexed to the heart, that Capua being more hotly and eagerly aſſaulted by the Romans, than manfully and fairly defended by him, had diverted and turned away the hearts of many States of Italy from him. For neither was he able to hold them all with ſufficient garriſons, unleſs he would diſmember into many ſmall portions, and mangle by piece-meal his army: which to do then, was no good policy: nor he thought it ſafe and good, to withdraw his garriſons from thence, & leave the fidelity of his allies at liberty, either to depend upon ſickle hope, or to ſway with ſuddain fear. And (as he was by nature covetous and cruel Ally minded) be reſolved at length upon this courſe, to make ſpoil of thoſe Cities which he was not able to keep, and ſo to leave them waſt and empty for the enemy. This deſignment was not ſo diſhoneſt and ſhameful in the firſt enterpriſe, but it proved as bad and hurtful to himſelf in the effect and conclusion. For he loſt the hearts clean, not only of thoſe that were the parties grieved, and ſuffered theſe indignities, but alſo of all others beſides. The preſent calamity and loſs touched but ſome few: but the precedent and example reached to many more. Neither was the Roman Conſul behind hand for his part, to ſolicit and ſound thoſe Cities, from whence he ſaw ſome light appear, and any hope to gain them unto him.

There were in Salapia two noble men above the reſt, Dafius and Blafius. Dafius was friend to Annibal, Blafius (ſo far as he might with ſafety) affected and favoured the Romans. And by enticement of ſecret meſſengers, had put Marcellus in ſome good hope of betraying the City; but without the help of Dafius the plot could not be compaſſed and effected. Wherefore, after much musing and long deliberation, after many ſtays and delays, at length he reſolved (for want rather of better counſel, than upon any hope to ſpeed) to addreſs himſelf to Dafius, and acquaint him with the matter. But Dafius not only milking utterly and abhorring the thing, but alſo carrying a ſecret enmity to the party himſelf, the only eye-ſore and concurrent that he had, ſtriving to be greater than he, diſcloſed all to Annibal. Whereupon, both were ſent for, and convened preſumptuſly before him. As Annibal was fitting upon the Tribunal ſeat, giving audience and diſpatch to certain other matters; and that he might upon the better attend unto Blafius and the action intended againſt him: whiles the plaintive and defendant ſtood apart by themſelves from the reſt of the people a good way, Blafius went in hand again with Dafius, and ſolicited him for to deliver the City to the Romans. With that Dafius (as if the matter had been too too apparent) cried out and ſaid, That he baſhed not to break unto him and move him, even in the preſence and ſight of Annibal, for to praſtice treaſon and berray the City. Annibal and all they that were there preſent, gave little credit unto Dafius: and the more audacious the thing it ſelf was, the leſſe likelihood it carried with it of a truth. Every man ſuppoſed verily, it was nothing but emulation, envy, and enkindred malice, that cauſed Dafius to charge upon him that crime, which becauſe there was no witneſs to the contrary, he might untruly devile and more freely enforce againſt him. And ſo for that time they were both diſcharged the court. But Blafius never gave over to follow ſtill this bold enterpriſe, but beat ſtill upon this one point, ſhewing how good and commodious the thing would be, both to themſelves in private, and to their country in common, until he had wrought him ſo, and won him to grant, that the Carthaginian garriſon, (and thoſe were Numidians) together with the City Salapia, ſhould be rendered unto Marcellus. But without much bloudſhed they could not poſſibly be thus betrayed and delivered: for they were the moſt hardy and valiant horſemen by far, of all the Carthaginian army. Wherefore, albeit they were taken on a ſuddain unprovided, and had no uſe of Horſes within the City, yet with ſuch weapons, as in ſuch a ſuddain tumult and uprore they could catch and come by, firſt they aſſayed and gave the venture to break through and eſcape away: and when they ſaw that they could by no means ſave themſelves and get forth, they fought it out to the laſt manfully, even unto death: ſo as there were not of them above fifty left alive, and came into the hands of the enemies. And ſurely, the loſs of this corner of Horſemen, was a greater damage unto Annibal, than the forgoing of Salapia: for never from that day forward, had Annibal the upper hand in cavalry, which was the only ſervice whereby ever before he moſt prevailed.

Much about the ſame time the Caſtle of Tarentum was ſtreightly diſtreſſed for want of victuals, and hardly could endure and hold out any longer. The only hope that the Roman garriſon had, which lay there, and the Captain thereof M. Livius the Conſtable of the Caſtle, was in the proviſion ſent out of Sicily. For the late convoy whereof, along the coaſt of Italy, there rid at anchor a ſleet whereof of twenty ſail bore Rhegium. The Admiral of this fleet appointed to wait theſe victuals from time to time, was one Decius Quintinus, a man of obſcure birth and baſe parentage, howbeit, for many worthy acts and feats of arms, much renowned in martial glory.

At the firſt he had the charge but of five ſhips, whereof two of the greateſt, which were three banked Gallies, were allowed him by Marcellus: after words, upon his good ſervice, when he had born himſelf bravely in many conflicts, he had three more committed unto him, and thoſe were of five banks of oars, until at laſt himſelf, by calling upon the confederate Cities, as Rhegium, Velia, and Paſturn, for the ſhips due by covenant unto the people of Rome, he had made a pretty Armado, as is above ſaid, of twenty ſail. As this fleet had diſanchored and was gone from Rhegium, Democritus with the like Armado for number of Tarentin ſhips, encountered almoſt five leagues from the City of Tarentum, at a port called Sacripotum. It fortuned at that time, that the Roman Admiral, little looking for any battel, came forth under ſail only, but about Crotona and Sibaris, he had furniſhed his ſhips with Rowers alſo, and ſo his fleet for the ſignals and talenſe of the Veſſels, was well appointed, and ſufficiently armed and manned. And even then it happened at one time, that both the boiſterous wind lay, and the enemies alſo were within kenning, ſo as they had ſerice time enough to fit their ſeckling, to make ready their Rowers, and to let in order their fighting men, againſt a ſkirmiſh that was ſo near toward. There was no lightly teen a greater conflict, fought more hotly and fiercely between two royal Armadoes that affronted one another, than between theſe ſmall fleets. For why, the battel was for a greater matter, than all the ships came to. The Tarentines maintained the fight more eagerly, because they were desirous to recover their Castle out of the Romans hands; as they had done their City, after one hundred years almost; during which time, they had been out of the possession thereof: hoping thereby, if they could be masters of the Sea once by some fortunate and victorious battle, to cut off and intercept all hopes of victuals from the enemies. The Romans on the other side desired themselves as fully satisfied, by keeping the possession of the Castle, all the world might see, that Tarentum was not lost by fate, alone through valour, but betrayed by fraud and treachery. So they joined the battle from both parts, and ran almost one against another, with the beaks and stems of their prows, and neither side allowing again forward, not suffering their enemy to part or go aside from them, until they were dashed and grappled their ships together by the means of iron hooks like hands. And sooner they buckled, in hot and furious fight, (as it were) foot to foot, at hand strokes with swordfight, they but also they coped together, while the prows and hind-decks were driven about with contrary parts of the adverse part. So meet and so thick withal stood the ships; and within to perrow a room, that scarce one dart light into the water in vain, and did no harm. With their beak-barges they sailed one another, as it had been on land fight, and so close they were, that the fouldiers might pass out of one ship into another, as they fought. Howbeit, two ships there were above all the rest, that maintained a notable fight, and in the vanguard and forefront of the battle, invetted one another most furiously. In that of the Romans was Quintus himself in person, and in the other of the Tarentines, was one Nico, surnamed Pere, a man not only odious unto the Romans, for the publick quarrel between both states, but also maliciously bent, upon a private spite against him, as bending with that faction, which had betrayed Tarentum to Annibal. This Nico applying Quintus both fighting and also encouraging his men withal, charged him at unawares, and ran him quite through with a pike: who was not so soon slain forward headlong upon the forehead, in armour and all, but the Tarentin following the train of his victory, and seeing the ship disordered and rumbled for the loss of their leader, justly came forward, and boarded her; laid about him manfully, and put by the enemies out of his way, until the Tarentines were masters of the prow and fore-castle. While the Romans had much ado (so thrumpled they were and thrust together) to defend and keep the poop and hind-deck: with that, another gally of the enemies appeared on a sudden, and charged the hind-part. So the Roman ship in the midst between both, was boarded on every side, and taken. Whereupon all the rest were greatly terrified, (seeing the Admirall ship was won by the enemy) and they fled on all hands: Some were sunk in the deep Sea, some made halt with their oars, and (guided to the land, but soon were a prize and prey to the Tarentines and Metapontins. But of the Hallus and Caricks, which were fraught with victual, and followed after, very few there were that fell into the hands of the enemies: the rest basting and turning their sails cross this wayes and that wayes, according to the inconsistency of the wind, recovered the main Sea.

But about Tarentum at the same time, their fortune was nothing so good. For whereas there were out of the Town upon a four thousand men a foraging, for to purvey corn, Livius, Constable of the Castle and Captain of the garrison, spying his time (as he wailed ever for all opportunities) made out of the said Castle 2000 armed fouldiers, under the leading of C. Porcius a valorous and industrious man: who set upon the Tarentines stragling out of order, and dispersed in wandering wife over the fields; and after he had followed a long time the execution, killing them here and there as he encountered them; the rest, which were but few left of so many, he chased to the Town: for they made halt in great fear thither, and were let in at the gates standing half shut, for fear lest the same random the Town should have been lost. So the Tarentines and Romans, when they had made the reckoning, put up all on even hand. For the Romans were, winners by land, the Tarentines at Sea: and both of them disappointed alike of their hope of corn, which was presented to their eyes, but they never tasted thereof.

At the same time Livius the Consul, after a good part of the year was gone about, arrived in Sicily, greatly expected and looked for, as well by the old allies as the new: and the first thing of all other and most important, he supposed, was together with this new peace, to settle and compose the State of Syracusa, so much disordered and out of frame. After that, he led his legions to Aggrigentum, where only there remained the reliques of war; which City was kept by a strong garrison of Carthaginians. There fortune favoured his first designs. Hanno chanced to be the General over the Carthaginians, but he wholly relied and repoled all his hope in Mutinus and the Numidians. This Mutinus had ranged all over Sicily at his pleasure, and raised bodies out of the territories and Lands of the Roman allies, and by no force or policy could be intercepted of his passage back to Aggrigentum, nor yet be pinned within the City, but that he would live forth whenever he listed. This glory of his, because now it checked (as it were) the fame and honour of the General, turned the man strength to displeasure and danger: so as, what good service soever was achieved, it was never well taken by Hanno, nor joyfully accepted, in regard of the person, who was a prick at wayes in his eye. Whereupon in the end he gave away the Captainship of Mutinus from himself, and bestowed it upon his own son: thinking, that together with his government and command, he should lose all his authority and reputation also among the Numidians. But it fell out far otherwise. For the more that he was in disgrace and disfavour with Hanno, the greater grew the old favour and love of the Numidians toward him.

A Neither could he himself endure any longer the unworthy wrong and indignity offered unto him: and therefore in revenge he presently dispatched certain secret messengers unto Livius, with credence, that he would betray and deliver Aggrigentum into his hands. By the mediation of these intercourers, there passed sufficient security and assurance between them: and the matter being considered, the manner also of contriving the plot, was agreed upon. Whereas therefore the Numidians were possessed, and had the guard of that gate that openeth toward the Sea: after they had either driven out the old warders from thence, or killed them, they let in the Romans at the same gate into the City, who were sent of purpose, according to the former agreement. And when they marched up into the midst of the City, even to the market place, with banner displayed, and with great tumult and noise; Hanno (supposing it was nothing else, but a seditious uprising of the Numidians (like as they had done sometimes before) came forth as to appease and stay a mutiny and commotion. But discovering a greater multitude starved off than the Numidians were; and hearing withal the Romans to shout, with the manner whereof his ears had been well acquainted before time, he took him to his heels ere he came within the dart-shot. And being let out at a back postern gate, taking with him Epicles, he recovered with some few other the Sea side, where, a good hap was, they light upon a small bark or pinasse: and so leaving Sicily to the enemies, for which there had been much strife so many years together, they passed over into Africa. The multitude besides both of Carthaginians and Sicilians, without any skirmish either begun or intended, fled like blind men they will not winker: and finding all wayes made up, and no passage forth, they were miserably slain and hewn in pieces about the gates. Livius being possessed of the Town, caused all the chief men and rulers of the City, to be beaten with rods, and to loile their heads: all the rest together with the pillage he sold in port-sale, and the money that was raised thereof, he sent to Rome.

When the news of this misfortune of the Agrigentins was blown over Sicily, all at once turned Roman, and Annibal lost all. For in short space there were 20 Towns betrayed and yielded, six forced by assault, and to the number of 40 voluntarily surrendered to the devotion and protection of the Romans. The principal noble men of which States, after that the Consuls had either rewarded or punished according to their several demerits, and compelled the Sicilians generally to lay by arms and weapons, and to take themselves to the plough, for to ear, till, and sow their grounds: to the end that the Land might bring forth fruit, not only to sustain and maintain the natural inhabitants thereof, but also to ease the price of corn and victuals in the City of Rome, and throughout all Italy, like as it had done many times before: he transported over with him into Italy a rabble and damned crew of unruly people from Aggrigentum. Some four thousand the worse of them, a confused multitude of all sorts, a very much maim and sink, dunghill of vile and wretched persons, most of them Outlaws, Bankrupts, and notorious malefactors, in danger of death by the laws of their Cities where they lived. And being fed their countries, some for one fact, some for another, they chanced all upon like fortune to tort themselves (as commonly birds of a feather will fly together,) and at Aggrigentum, they made choice like outlaws, to live by robbing and spoiling: and this was their only protection and trade. Livius thought it no good policy to leave behind him these good fellows in an Island, which began but now upon new peace to knit and unite again: for fear lest they would minister matter of innovation and change; and besides, there was some good use of them among the Kings, for to forage and rove about the Brutians country: for such they stood in need of, and had laid for a company which were acquainted with thieving and stealing. And to this year made an end of the war in Sicily.

P. Scipio L. Deputy and General in Spain, having in the prime and beginning of Spring put his ships to Sea and set them afloat, and by an edict summoned all the aids of the allies to repair to the Rendevous at Taraco; gave order and commandment, that as well the ships of war as of charge and burden, should from thence let forward, and shew themselves at the mouth of the River Iberus. And after he had given direction and charge, that the legions from out of their winter harbors, should there meet together, himself accompanied with five thousand of his allies put himself on his journey to his main army. Being thither come, he thought it good to make some speech to the old fouldiers especially, as many as remained alive after to great defeats and overthrow, and when he had alsembled them all together to an audience, in this wise he spake unto them. "Never was there new General before my self, that could by good right, and in regard of desert, render thanks unto his fouldiers before he had employed them, and made trial of their good service. But as for me, before I ever came within sight of this Province, before I entered my government and law the camp, fortune hath obliged me, and made me beholden unto you. First, for your kindness and zealous affection to my father and to mine uncle, both while they lived, and when they were dead. Secondly, in that when the possession of this Province was lost, after to great foils and overthrow, ye have by your virtue and valour recovered the same again, and kept it entire to the behoof of the people of Rome, and myself, the next successor in place of sovereign rule and command. But so much as our rule and purpose and present resolution is, by the leave, favour, and power of the Gods, not so much to hold the possession our selves and abide in Spain, but to dispossesse the Carthaginians, that they may have no footing nor abode at all there: and since the thing that we go about, is not to stand keeping the bank of Iberus, for to stop the passage of the enemy: but to give the attempt to pass over our selves by force: yea, and therewithal to transport the war over with us

to his fouldiers,

"other munition and furniture for war: wherewith we shall both furnish our selves, and discomfort the enemy. Gain we shall over and besides, not only right fair and beneficial, but also a most rich and wealthy City: yes, and more than that, of right great importance and consequence, in regard of a goodly and surpassing commodious haven, by means wherof, we may be provided both from Sea and Land, of all things needful and requisite for the wars. Which, as they will be of great moment to us that shall have them, so they will be the greater loss to the enemy that shall forgo them. This is their Cattle for strength, their garner for corn, their treasury for money, their armour, their arsenal, and in one word, their very store-house of all things whatsoever. Hither is the direct passage and freight out of Africa, here is the only port and harbor for shipping, between the Islands of Cadiz, or Gibralter, and the mountains Pyrenæ: from whence all Spain overlooketh (as it were), and commandeth Africa. But knowing that you are well appointed already, and prepared to the service, I will say no more but this: Now, for the honour of the Romans, let us go courageously to it, with all our might and main assault new Carthage. And when they all with one accord cried unto him, so to do indeed, and that no other thing was first to be done; then he advanced before Carthage, then he gave commandment to assail it at once, by Land and Sea. Mago the Captain of the Carthaginians on the other side, when he saw preparation made by Water and Land to give the assault, for his part ordered his forces and disposed them in this manner. To make head against the Romans on that side where they lay encamped, he opposed two thousand Townsmen, with a guard of five hundred soldiers he kept the citadel: other five hundred he placed upon a little hill belonging to the City, which looketh to the East: all the other multitude whatsoever, he appointed to make resistance in other places, where any outcries, shouts, or sudden alarms should be given. Then having set open a gate, he senteth those forth, whom he had arranged in that street which leadeth directly to the camp of the enemies. The Romans (according as they were commanded by their Leader himself) in the beginning gave ground a little and retired, to the end, that during the time of skirmish and conflict, they might be neerer to the supply of succours, which were to be sent to second them behind. And verily at the first they stood to it stoutly on both parts, and there was no odds perceived. But afterwards, the Romans being still freshly reinforced from out of the camp, not only discomfited the enemies, and put them to flight, but pressed on them so hard, as they fled disordered and out of array, that if Scipio had not founded the retreat, it seemed, that they would have intermingled themselves pell-mell with those that ran away, and rushed into the City with them. Within the City throughout there was no less fear than in the battell. Many courts of guard and other places were abandoned, the curtain of the walls was left naked, and every man made what shift he could to leap down and escape. Which when Scipio perceived (who now was turned to a mount, which they call Mercurius Tenuis), and namely, that the walls were void of all the defendants, he commanded all his soldiers to issue forth of the camp, to set forward to the assault, and to bring ladders to scale. Himself in person, defended with the shields of a tall lusty young man going before him (for by this time they let fire again from the walls a mighty volley of shot of all sorts) approached the City. There he exhorted, encouraged, and commanded them to do what was requisite in this service. And that which made most to enkindle the courages of the soldiers, he was there personally as an eye-witness and beholder of each mans valour or cowardise. Whereupon they stuck not to run upon the very shot, and to receive many a wound: and now nothing could keep them back; neither the strength of the walls, nor the armed men that stood thereupon, but they scaled striving who could mount upon the walls first. At the same time, that part of the City, also which the Sea beat upon, began to be assailed by the ships. But from thence, it should seem, they made more ado with houting and hurrying, than effected ought by any forcible assault. For whilst they came close to the walls with their ships, whilst they put forth their ladders and their soldiers; whilst every man laboured to gain the Land, the neerer way he could, what with their striving and half-making, they hindered one another. And by that time Mago had filled the walls full of armed men, who let fire arrows, javelins, darts, and all kind of shot, wherof they had gathered together exceeding great store. But neither men, nor arrows and darts, nor any things else defended the wall so much as the very wall it self. For few ladders they had that could reach up to the top: and the longer any of them were, the more weak also they were. Whereupon, by reason that they who were climbed up to the highest rounds, could not gain the parapet and discharge the ladders, and yet some or other still clambered up after, the ladders being overcharged with the weight, broke in pieces. Some again there were, that notwithstanding the ladders under them held still and stood unbroken, yet when they looked down from on high, their eyes dazzled, and were overcast with a mist, that they lost their sight, and fell from the top to the ground. Thus when ladders here, and men there, came tumbling down, and the enemies upon their good speed grew to be more hardy and hardy, the retreat was founded, which gave to the besieged within the Town not hope only of present rest and intermission of so great labour and toil, but also assured them in manner, for the time to come, that the City was tenable against all escalades, although it were invested therewith round about. And as for battels and mounts to be raised and planted against it, they were not only difficult and hard to be performed, but also would ask some long time: and Minister in the mean while, space sufficient for the other Generals of their own to come to the rescue. But scarce was the first assault fully ceased, when Scipio commanded other fresh and unfoiled soldiers, to take the ladders of them that were wearied already and wounded, and

A with greater violence to give a new Camifado. Himself, so soon as he understood that it was ebb and low water, having been advertised by certain fishermen of Taraco (who sometimes with light boats used to row, and otherwhiles when their vessels touched the ground, to wade all over the lake upon firm ground) that men might easily passe to the walls on foot: thither to that place he brought all his soldiers to the assault. It was now almost noon-tide of the day; and besides that the water of it self naturally full with the ebb into the Sea, there was a good rood northern wind arose, which drove the water out of the lake (which now was well full) after the tide, and discovered such shallows, that whereas in some places thereof they went up to the navel, in some again they waded scarce knee deep. Which albeit Scipio knew well to be an ordinary thing in natural reason, and therefore with good forecast had made provision accordingly to take that advantage, yet he turned it to a miraculous and prodigious accident, attributing all to the immediate handy-work of the Gods: as who to give passage and footing to the Romans, had turned back the course and current of the Sea, discharged lakes of their water, and opened ways unto them, that never before were troden with the sole of mans foot: and therewith he willed his soldiers to follow Nepenne, the guide and Leader of the way, and to passe boldly through the mids of the lake close to the very walls. On the Land side the assailants had exceeding trouble in standing under the walls: for not only they were hindered by reason that the curtain was so high; but also as they went, they lay open and under their shot, and were wounded both ways, so as their flanks and sides were more annoyed as they approached under, than their faces and forefront of their bodies. But on the other part, as they went quietly and easily through the mear to the wall, so they climbed forward as securely to the very top thereof. For neither was it strongly fortified with bulwarks, nor raised to any height by industry and art of man, as being supported by natural situation of the place, and the standing lake besides, strong enough and sufficiently defended: nor any guard of armed men were there in watch and ward, opposed against the assailants: whilst every man was busy, and wholly intended to help there, from whence some danger was seen. The Romans being thus entered the City over the walls without any skirmish, marched from thence with what speed they could, unto that gate, about which all the fight and hot skirmish was already begun: for there not only all their minds were bent and united, but also their eyes and ears were occupied and possessed; whilst some fought, others looked on and encouraged the fighters: in such sort, that there was none of them all once perceived or knew, that the City was taken and surprised behind them, before the darts flew about their ears and light upon their back parts, and until they had the enemies both before and behind. Then not only the walls were taken (when the defendants upon a twofold fear, were driven to abandon them) but also the gate from withinfort and without, began to be broken down: and anon, after continual running and beating against it, the leaves thereof perforce flew aspees, because there might be nothing to impeach or let them in their entrance: then the armed soldiers brake in most furiously. Many already had scaled the walls, and got over, but they turned and betook themselves every where to massacre and make havoc of the Townsmen. But the main battel, which entered in at the gate with their Captains, orderly by companies and ranks in their array, marched forward through the midst of the City to the market place. From whence Scipio might see the enemies flee two ways, some to the fortresses upon the hill aforesaid, which standeth to the East, and was kept with a guard of five hundred soldiers: others into the citadel, into which Mago himself, with all the armed men in a manner, who were driven from the walls, had retired and fled for to save himself. Whereupon he sent a part of his forces to win the said Hill, and himself in person led the rest to the Castle. And as the force upon the Hill was taken at the first assault and onset given, so Mago, after he had a while made some means to defend the Castle, seeing all places full of enemies, (warning every where, and no other hope, yielded himself, the citadel, and the garrison. Until the Castle was surrendered and given up, there was nothing but murdering and killing all over the City, and not one (pared that seemed to be fourteen years old and upward, if they came in their way. But then, upon the found of Trumpet the execution ceased, and the Conquerors fell to seizure and pillage, which of all sorts rose to a mighty thing. Of free born, such as were of male sex, there were taken prisoners 20000. Then, so many of them as he found to be natural citizens of Carthage, he dismissed and let go free, and restored unto them not only the City, but also their own goods, which the first fury and rage of warriors had left untouched. There were of Artificers and handicraftsmen, some two thousand: those by an edict he pronounced to be bond, and adjudged them as confiscate, to serve the Common-weal of the people of Rome: yet with some hope, that shortly they might obtain their freedom again, in case they performed good service, and showed themselves diligent in all ministries and offices of war. The rest of the multitude of inhabitants, such as were able and young lusty men, as also the stout and sturdy bondmen, he awarded them to the ships, for to furnish up the number of Gallies, flaves and Rowers, and with the eight ships of war, which he took captive in the haven, he increased his own Armado. Besides all this multitude, there were also the hostages of the Spaniards above written, of whom he took as great care, and as good regard, as if they had been the children of Allies and associates. A mighty deal of warlike artillery and ordinance was there found and seized on. Of Catapults of the greatest size 120, of a lesser sort 281. Ballists some greater, some small, of them 33, of these 52. Of Scorpions and Cross-bows to shoot quarrels as well great as small, and likewise of defensive armour, and offensive weapons, a huge deal, and a marvellous quantity. Military ensigns 74. Of gold and silver there was a mighty mass brought into the General's Golden cup or beller there were 6; every one weighing almost one pound. Of silver tried, wrought, and alloyed, 8500 pound weight: And much plate and vessels of silver. All this C. Flaminius the Treasurer, received either by Weight or tale. Of wheate there was 40000 Modii, of barley 50000. Of barkes and ships of burden, there were in the haven won by force, and taken, 155. Some were fraught with corn, armour, brasse besides, and iron, fall-cloth, and hemp; for spars for cables and ropes, also with timber for ships' weights. Carriage to the Town it self, in so great sort of wealth and warlike provision, was the least of all others.

That day Scipio, having committed the charge of guarding and keeping the City unto Calpurn and the mariners, brought back the legions into the camp, and commanded the soldiers to refresh their bodies with food and rest, wearied as they were, and over-laboured in one day with all manner of toil and work that belongeth to war; for he as who, had both fought a battle in the field, and also taken to great pains, and undergone so much hazard and danger in assaulting and forcing the City; yea, and after it was won, had fought with disadvantage of ground, with those that were fled into the Cattle.

The next day, after he had called both soldiers and mariners together, first he rendered laud and praise; yea, and thanks unto the immortal Gods; who in one day had not only made him Lord of the most mighty and wealthy City in all Spain, but also had laid up for him there against his coming, all the riches well-need of Affricke and Spain, whereby as the enemies now had nothing left them; to he and his had all things plentiful. Then he commended the vertue and valour of his soldiers; whom neither the falling out of the enemies could fright, nor the mighty height of the walls scare, nor the blind and twisted fowles of the lake could once dismay; nor the situation of the Cattle seated upon a high little terrace, nor yet the Cattle it self, which strongly built and fortified, was able to daunt and make afraid, but that they would pass over all and break through wall. And therefore albeit every one of them deserved at his hands all rewards, yet the principal honour of a mural crown and garland, belonged properly unto him that first scaled and mounted over the wall. Come he forth therefore (quoth he) and shew himself, who taketh himself worthy of that gift, and let him claim his due. Whereupon there were two that put in for it, and demanded the same, Q. Terentius, a Centurion of the fourth Legion; and Seas Diginius, a Servitor at the Sea. Neither of these parties themselves in hotly about the matter, as the love and hatred of them set all the whole army divided into legionary soldiers, and servitors at Sea, in a heat of contention; to labour for him that belonged to their side, and was a member as it were of their body. C. Lelium, Admiral of the fleet, went with the Sailors and Seamen, L. Scaenipius Tudilianus was altogether for the legionary Land-soldiers. This debate was like to breed a scab, and so raise a very mutiny in the host. Whenupon Scipio, pronounced that he would appoint as Delegates three Commissioners, to sit upon the state; who should take the disposition of witnesses, and give their verdict accordingly, whether of these two persons entered over the wall first into the Town. Now because C. Lelium and Adrianus were Advocates to the one party and the other; he therefore adjoynd unto them a third person; one P. Cornelianus to go as an indifferent Mediator between them; two and gave order and commandment, that those other three commissioners above said should sit together, and hear and determine the controversy. When as the matter grew to a greater heat of contention, by reason that men of worth in worth and were acquainted with the action, and had their hand in it; who were not so much Advocates to plead, but moderators and Judges to bear down a side; C. Lelium rising out from the court, came to the Tribunal seat unto Scipio; and informed him that the manner of proceeding in this matter in question, was without all good order, modesty and reverence, and troubled, that they were like to go together by the ears, and try it out by blows. But, be it, quoth he, rather to blows be so done, yet it is a most shameful example and detestable precedent; that the honour and quarter of either virtue, should be carried by fraudulent coven and ungodly perjury. For, quoth he, the legionary soldiers stand of the one hand; the Sea-servitors on the other; and every of them to swear on both sides all the oaths of God, and to swear either which their will and affection leadeth them N to say, which in their conscience they know to be true. By which sort of forswearing and perjury, they will not only bring a curse and vengeance upon themselves and their own lives; but also upon the ensignes, standards, and very Eagles; yea, and their religious Military Oath and Sacrament. Thus much I thought good to give you counsel and admonition of aforehand; and that by the advice of P. Cornelianus and M. Scaenipius, Scipio stood his highly praised Adrianus, called the soldiers to an assembly, and there with a loud voice pronounced, and made his state own lively, but formed upon certain relation; that Q. Terentius, and Seas Diginius should sit well both together, and therefore I award his well to the one as to the other; a mural garland, and a crown and testimony of their singular vertue. Then he rewarded the rest, all according to every mans desert and valorous service. But above all other, he honoured C. Lelium Admiral of the fleet; not only in matching him equally with himself in all common medals, parts and qualities; but also in presenting him with a coronet of beaten gold, and thirty Oxen. Then he gave commandment that the hostages of the Cities and States of Spain should be called forth. Where number were of them, I am ashamed and loth to set down in writing; for almost as I find in some Chronicles, that they were upon some three hundred, in others 725. The like variety there is of other matters, amongstundry writers; One writeth that the Punick garrión were ten thousand; another 7000, and

A and a third comes with his two thousand, and no more. I meet with one Record which reporteth, that there were 10000 taken prisoners; and another, that there were above 20000. Of Scorpions, or Grosbores, great and small, I should say there were gained some 60, if I would take for mine author Strabo, a greek writer: but if I follow Valerius Antius and go by him I should tell you a tale of six thousand of the greater sort, and thirteen thousand of the smaller. See how little rule they had of their tongues to over-reach, or flay of their pens to set down so loud lies upon record. Nay, they are not well agreed to much as upon this point, who were the great Captains and Commanders. Most of them say, that Lelium was L. Admiral; there be again that would have M. Junius Syllanus to be the man, and Arrius was Captain of the Punick garrión, and yielded to the Romans, if ye list to believe Valerius Antius; but by the testimony and credit of others, it was Mago. Moreover, the records accord not about the number of ships that were taken; nor of the weight of gold and silver, nor yet of the sum of money that was raised of the pillage. To conclude, if we must needs believe some one or other, the mean between is the best, and carrieth most likelihood of the truth.

But to return again to Scipio: "When he had called forth the hostages into his presence, first he had them all in general to be of good cheer: for why? they were now in the hands of the people of Rome, who ever desired to bind men unto them by favours and good turns more than to awe them with fear and dread; and who have forraín nations knit and joynd in faithful amity, rather than held in subjection by heavy servitude. Then after he had taken the names in writing of these several Cities, he also reviewed the number of the prisoners, and counted just how many belonged to every State. Which done, he dispatched messengers home into their countries, willing their parents and friends to come and receive every man their own, if haply any Embassadors of their Cities were present, he restored unto them their own hostages without delay: for all the rest, he gave express charge to C. Flaminius the Treasurer to see unto them in all kind, courteous, and liberal usage. Whiles he was busie in taking this order, there hapned to come from among the hostages, even out of the midst of the company, an aged gentleman, the wife of Mandunius, brother to Indibilis, a Prince and great Lord of the Illegies. She shed tears, and fell down prostrate at the feet of the L. General; and withall began to beseech him most instantely, to give a more special charge, concerning the custody of the women; and to recommend them to their keepers; for to be guarded with a careless eye, and to be kept and attended on more tenderly. Why? quoth Scipio, I warrant these good woman, that shall want for nothing that is meet for them. Then replied this Dame again, We stand not so much (quoth she) upon these terms; for a little thing, God wot, may serve and content them in this poor estate and low condition: my care is for another matter, when I consider and behold the young and tender age of these maidens here, As for my self, I am now past date, and without danger of that injury, which our sex is subject and exposed unto. Now there stood about her the daughters of Indibilis, virgins in the fresh prime and flower of their age; and passing fair and beautiful withall: besides some other Ladies as nobly born as they: who all honoured her as their natural mother that bare them. Then Scipio, "I would (quoth he) in the ordinary course as well of mine own discipline as of that which is established by the people of Rome, have a respective consideration, that no good thing amongst us should suffer abuse, which elsewhere in any place of the world is held inviolable: this would I do, I say, for mine own credit, and for the honour of Rome: but to have some special eye that way, your own vertue also and worthiness bindeth me: who in the midst of these your calamities and miseries have not forgot your womanly carriage and the honour of you self. And thereupon he delivered them over to the custody of a man of approved honesty and integrity, commanding him to guard them with no less reverence, modesty, and continency, than if they were the wives or mothers of their nearest friends that gave them entertainment. After this there was presented unto him by his followers a damoel and virgin of five years, taken also prisoner: but his well-favoured and surpassing in beauty, that where-soever he went every man's eye was upon her; in admiration of so rare and perfect a creature. Scipio having enquired of her country where she was born, and like wife of what parents she was descended: among other things learned, that she was espoused and affianced to a young Prince of the Celtiberians, whose name was Allodius. Forthwith he sent home to her parents and forefathers house, for to repair unto him; and in the mean time he understood that her husband that should be was wonderfully enamoured of her, and ready to die for his love. So soon as the young Gentleman was come, Scipio entreated into a more familiar speech with him, than he did either with the father or mother of the maiden; and in these words he entertained him: "I am a young man (quoth he) as well as your self. Come on therefore; let us young men both devile and commune together more freely, and not be too nice, coy, and bashful one to the other. After that your espoused wife, taken captive by my soldiers, was brought unto me, and that I heard of the exceeding fame and affection that you cast upon her; I believed it well for her singular beauty, despite of no less. Now forasmuch as myself, it might be allowed to me the pastimes of youth, (I mean no otherwise than in honest and lawful love) and were not called away by the Common-weal, & employed wholly in other affairs of state, I would think to be pardoned and held excused if I had an extraordinary liking to a spouse of mine own and loved her extremely. I meet therefore needs favour and tender your love, which is the thing I can, considering that I may not the other in any wife, Your sweet heart and best beloved I have entertained as well and as respectfully, as she should have A⁵⁵ (As it were) by stealth, it chanced that one of the Cities of Spain was surprized; that the insolent and foolish young man bearing himself proudly, prodigally, and jocularly beyond all measure, would seem to make up the measure of so small a catch that he had got, with a great show of a brave victory; but when he shall here once that there are three Generals coming toward him, and three victorious armies of enemies, he will soon pull in his horns: he will then tell us another tale, when presently he shall call to remembrance with grief of every vain in his heart, the death of a father, of uncle, and other progenitors. These and such like speeches they gave out among the people and common folk, knowing in their own conscience what a blow they had caught, and how much their strength was decayed by the loss of new Carthage.

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Flamm upon the seven and twentieth Book.

Cneus Fulvius the Pro-Consul was slain, and with his army utterly defeated by Annibal at Herdonea. But Cl. Marcel, the Consul had better fortune in a battell against him before Numidum. From whence Annibal dislodged and departed by night. Marcellus pursued after him, and ever as he fell off, followed him hard still, until he gave him battell. In the former fight Annibal had the better, but Marcellus in the later. Fab. Max. the Father being Consul, had the Tarentins yield up into him by treason. In Spain, Scipio fought a battell with Adrubal the son of Amilcar, at Betula, and won the field. Among other there was a boy taken prisoner of royal blood, and of incomparable beauty: whom he sent with rich gifts unto Mafinilla his uncle by the mother. Claudius Marcellus and T. Quintus Cripinus the Consuls, who chanced to go out of their Camps to discover, at Ephesus, the country, were forelaide by an ambush of Annibal, and enriv-pred, where Marcellus was slain: Cripinus fled. This book containeth a list of the wars and exploits achieved by P. Sulpicius the Prator, against Philip and the Acheans. The Consols held a solemn Jurvey and numbering of the Citizens, and purged the City. In which Jurvey there were found of Roman Citizens 137 108. By which account it was seen, how many the people of Rome had lost, by the adverse fortune of Jo. many battels, Adrubal, who with an army had pursued over the Alps for to join with Annibal, was slain, and with him 50000 men besides, by the conduct of M. Livius the Consul, but not without the great goodservice of Cl. Nero the other Consul: who being appointed to make head against Annibal, left the Camp Jo, as the enemy was not ware thereof, and with an elect power of hardy men, surprised and entold Adrubal above, and so defeated him.

The seven and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

THus stood the affairs in Spain, In Italy the Consul Marcellus having recovered Salapia by composition, with by force two towns from the Samnites, Maronea and Meles. Where there were slain three thousand of Annibal his souldiers, who had been left there in garri- son. Some good portion of the pillage was shared among the souldiers. Of wheat be- sides there was found there 240 000 measures called Modii, and of barley 120000. But the joy from hence was not so great as the loss and damage received within few daies after, nor far from the City Herdona. Cn. Fulvius the Pro-Consul lay there encamped upon hope to regain that City, which after the defeat at Cannib, had revolted from the Romans: a town neither lea- ded in a place of surety, nor yet well furnished and manned for defence. The Captain thereof (Cn. Fulvius afore said) was by nature ever negligent, but grown much more careless now, pre- suming upon a vain hope that he had of them within, in that he perceived how the townsmen already began to fall in their devotion and faithful allegiance to the Carthaginians, especially, after they heard, that upon the loss of Salapia, Annibal was departed out of those parts into the Brutians country. Annibal had intelligence of all this brought unto him from Herdona by secret messengers, which, as is caused him to have a careful eye to the saving and keeping of a friend City, so it misinted good hope unto him for to surprize his enemy at unawares and un- provided. Whereupon with his army lightly appointed, he took long journies and made haste to Herdona, so as he prevented almost the fame and bruit of his coming. And to strike the more retour into his enemy, he thither marched in battell array. The Roman Generall, as adventures and bold as he every way, but foolish at all so polittick, nor so strong, brought his forces forth in more haste than good speed, and gave him battell. His fifth legion, and the left wing or corner of Cavalry began the skirmish, and charged hoyle. But Annibal had given his horse- men direction, that when the Infantry was in the midst of skirmish, with mind & eye wholly oc- cupied that way, they should weave about and fetch a compass, and whiles some of them assailed and the Dictator, it could not pass and be performed. For the Century System of the younger sort.

The winning of Carthage I have set down in this year, having the warrant of many writers: and ver

As this be would needs have to be carried by the most fresh practice of the newest and latest custom, affirming. That by prescription of the time, either of our fathers or grandfathers daies, above was no Flamin of Imper, usurped this privilege. The Tribunes, who were moderate in this question, gave their judgement thus. That if a thing were longer, and discontinued through the simple negligence of some Flamin, it was worst for themselves, and they deemed it no reason, that it should hurt or prejudice the whole priesthood. Whereupon, the Prator himself forced not greatly upon the point, nor stood much with him, and so they admitted the Flamin into the house with great content of the Nobles, as well as of the Compages. And all men thus conceived of it. That the Flamin had obtained the thing, rather in regard of his sanctimony and holiness of life than in the right of his sacerdotal dignity.

The Consul before that they went into their Provinces, enrolled two legions of Citizens, for to supply and make up sufficiently the defect of all the other forces. The old City army Flamin committed unto C. Fulvius Flaccus his Lieutenant, (and brother he was besides to the Consul) for to be led into Herruria: with direction, that the Legions already in Herruria should be brought to Rome. And Fabius the Consul caused the residue of the army of Flamin to be sought up and rallied, which arose to the number of 336: and commanded his son Q. Maximus to lead them into Sicily, unto M. Valerius the Pro-Consul, and of him to receive the charge of two Legions, and the thirty galliaces aforesaid, bearing five ranks of oars. The withdrawal of these Legions out of the Island, nothing diminished nor abridged the garrisons of that Province, either in strength or show. For besides the two old legions, well and sufficiently filled and furnished, he had a great power, as well horse as foot, of Numidians, such as were fled from the adversity unto the Romans: and took up and levied besides for new souldiers, even those Sicilians also, who had been of the army of Epicides and the Carthaginians, men of approved valour, and skilful warriors. These forraign aids, when he had put to each of the Roman legions, he kept still the form of two compleat armies. With the one he gave order to L. Cincius to defend that part of the Island which had been the Realm of King Hiero: with the other he maintained the rest of the Island, divided sometimes by the confines of the Roman and Punick dominions. There was a fleet also rigged and trimmed, consisting of seventy ships, for to guard and defend all the maritime coasts, along the tract of the sea side. Himself in person, with the horsemen of Mutines, rode about all the Province, for to visit the lands and grounds, and to take note which were tilled and well husbanded, which lay forelet and untilled, and to commend or chastise and rebuke the landlords and owners thereof accordingly. The care and regard of corn, thus far forth did good, that the Province was able both to send good store to Rome, and also to convey unto Canaan sufficient to maintain the army that was so lie in standing Camp that summer about Tarentum.

But the souldiers who were transported over into Sicily (and for the better part they were Latines and other Associates) were like to cause a great rising and commotion: whereby we may see, that of small occasions and beginnings, oftentimes arise great matters of important consequence. For the Latines and Allies in all their Diets and Councils at home, began to mutter and grumble. That now for ten years space they were with continual multerings and payments of souldiers wages consumed and spent, that there was not a year in manner went over their heads, but it cost them some great loss and overthrow in battell. Many were slain in the wars, other died of diseases. So that a Citizen of theirs, if he were taken and prest once by the Romans, for to be a souldier was more sure to perish, than if he were taken prisoner by the Carthaginians: For the enemy sent their captives hack again gratis, and without ranome, home into their country: the Romans posted and packed them away out of Italy, as confined to a place of banishment (to speak truly) rather than appointed to serve in warfare. For to see how the souldiers, remaining after the field of Cannae, have continued there, and waxen old these eight years assiduously, and no doubt share were they like to lay their bones before that the enemy (who never so flourished, nor was so strong as now) would depart from thence. In case then that old souldiers should returne into their country, and new fill be chosen, within a while there would be none left behind. And therefore best it were for them, before they were come to extrem poverty and desolation, presently to deny the people of Rome that, whilst somewhat is left, which shortly they must be driven to do of very necessity when all is gone. And if the Romans see their Allies thus agree together, and take this course they will then verily bethink themselves, and grow to some terms of making peace with the Carthaginians. For otherwise be sure, as long as Antioch had a day to live, they will never be clear of wars. These and such like speeches passed in their Diets above said. There were at that time three Colonies of the people of Rome: and whilst they Embassages from them all were at Rome, twelve of them denied the Consuls flatly, and said they were not able any longer to find either men or money. And those were these, Ardea, Veii, Sutrinum, Circus, Alba, Corfili, Suffes, Sora, Seis, Colas, Narnia, Interamna. The Consuls amazed at this strange and unexpected accident, being desirous to drive them out of that mind, and to scare them from so detestable a resolution, supposed they should prevail more by chastising and rebuking, than by fair and gentle dealing: and therefore told them again: That they had presumed to speak that unto the Consuls, which they again were abashed should not find in their hearts to deliver and relate in the Senat-house. For surely (say they) this is not a result of souldierly and war service, but a very meere revolting from the people and no better than an open rebellion. Therefore they were left to return again speedily to the several Colonies, and to consult with the Ambassadors & Consuls, while the mae was made, and yet all Wholes as men who had rather let all time words fly, rather adu desired to attend and comply to his own desires, and to tell him, and put them in saying that they themselves were better Company nor Tarantini, but their Romans, whom defended, and of that Race: from thence the Colonies into the lands that were won by to breed male, and multiply, and to diminish them. That whatsoever duties children owe to their parents, the like they owed unto the Romans, if there remained in them any blood and natural affection, any remembrance of their ancient native country, and to ex hort them to consider better of the matter, and to lay their heads together anew, forasmuch as the determinations of them tended to betray the State and Empire of Rome, and to deliver the victory of all unto Antibal. When the Consuls one after another had dealt and been in hand with them a long time in this manner, as they could offer more message to bring home, nor their Senat made answer again, That neither they knew what other message to bring home, nor their Senat what new counsel to take: since that they had not any more men to be mulctured for soldiers, nor money to be paid for wages: the Consuls seeing them to flout, and obstinately bent, made rela tion thereof before the Senat, whereupon every man was stricken into so great fear and trouble of mind, that many of them gave out, that the Empire of Rome was come to an end. The likewise they, will the rest of the Colonies do, and surely all our confederates and allies are combined and agreed to betray the City of Rome unto Antibal. But the Consuls comforted the Senat, and bad them be of good cheer, saying, That all the other Colonies besides would continue loyal, and fast in their duty and allegiance: and even those also which had failed in their obedience, if there might be Ambassadors sent among them, to rebuke and chastise them, and not to speak them fair and attract them by way of prayer, would so doubt have a respective reverence of the ma jesty of the Roman Empire. Now when the L.L. of the Senat had committed the ordering of this matter wholly unto them for to manage and handle, according as they should think good for the weal publicke: after they had thoroughly bound the hearts and minds of all the rest of the Colo nies, they called and cited all the Ambassadors, and demanded of them whether their soldiers were in readiness, according to the capitulations of the covenant. Then M. Scatulus, of Fregella made answer in the behal of eighteen of them, That not only their soldiers were ready ac cording to the form of the covenant, but also more were ready, more they would allow, and whatsoever else the people of Rome should upon them, and wished them to perform, the time which they strain themselves to do to the utmost, as far as they had people, force, and a purse good enough: and as for their hearts, they were much better than their ability. The Consuls after they had made a short speech unto them by way of a preamble, saying, that they thought it not sufficient for their desert to be commended from the Senat only, unless all the L.L. generally in the Senat-house gave them condition, thanks with one voice, and common accord, would them to follow after them thither. The Senat having thenceforth them in as honourable terms as they could possibly devise, and entertained them with most gracious words, gave order to the Consuls to bring them forth also in the face of the whole people of the City: and before them, among other singular favours and kindnesses which they had shewed both unto them and also un to their ancestors, to make rehearse of this late good desert of others, which they afforded un to the Common-wealth: to the end, that now also, after so many ages and lives of men past they should not be forgotten and buried in silence, nor defrauded of their just praise and due com pensation. And these were they that remained true hearted and fast unto the City of Rome:

The Signins, Nolans, and Norbans: the Sacriculans, Brundisins, and Pregellans: the Lucernis, Venusinis, and Adrians: the Firmins and inhabitants of Ariminum: And from the other five side the Pontians, Petans, and Cossans: and of mid-landers, the Beneventans, Efferisins, Spoleitans, Placentins, and the inhabitants of Criminum. Upon the aid and succour of these Colonies, the Roman State at this time rested and stood maintained, and these all were highly thanked both in the Senat, and in the assembly of the people. As for the other twelve Colonies, which N had refused to do their obedience, the L.L. of the Senat gave express commandment, that they should not be so much as once named or named: and that the Consuls should neither give them their dispatch, nor retain them till, nor so much as speak unto them. This silent kind of rebuke without word giving, seemed to stand most with the majesty and grandeur of the people of Rome.

Whilſt the Conſuls were diligent in providing and making ready all other things requiſite and meet for the war, it was thought good to bring abroad the vicinia gold: to wit, the twentieth part of all their tributes and revenues which had been laid up and reſerved apart in a more ſecret cloſet of the City chamber, againſt an hard winter, as they ſay to ſerve for what need ſhould the Common-wealth ſhould ſtand in. So there was taken forth four thouſand pound weight of gold; whereof three hundred pound was given to the two Conſuls aſſeſs, and ſo likewiſe to M. Marcellus and P. Sulpicius the Pro-Conſuls; and to L. Volumnius the Praetor, unto whole lot the Province of France belied. And Fabius the Conſul had in addition beſides himſelf above the reſt of one hundred pound weight of gold for to be ſcarried into the Ciſle of Tarentum. The reſt of the gold they diſburſed for to make ready payment down upon the nail unto them that undertook to provide apparel for the army in Spain, which to their own fame, and the honour of their General, ſerved therein the wars.

Moreover, it was thought good, that before the Comus departed into their Province the prodigious colons should be purged and expire. On the Acra mount there were smitten with fire from heaven the Image of Jupiter, and a tree standing near unto the Temple: likewise like at Alaba, the wall at Copna, and the Church of Fortune: and at Sinuffe the wall and gate of the town. There, I say were, blasted with lightnings and smitten with thunderbolts. There were some also brought down, that the water at Alba ran blood, and at Rome within the sanctuary of the chapel of Fortuna a little image that stood upon her coronet, fell off its own accord from the head of the goddess into her hands. And at Prætorium it was for certain reported and known of a truth, that an Oxe spake, and that a Vulvite or Gripse fell into a shop in the market place, when it was full of people. And at Sinuffe also was an Infant born of doubtful sex, between male and female, (which the common folk call Androgynis; as for the most part greek names, admit more easie composition of two words than the Latine) and there it rained milk, and a man-child was born with an Elephants head. These strange and fearful signs were expiate, and satisfaction made for them with greater sacrifices: and a solemn procession in all the Churches and Chappels, with prayers and supplications was proclaimed for one day. Besides, a decree was granted, that C. Hofpitiæ the Pretor should vow and let out the games and plaies of Apollo, in such manner as of late years they had been vowed and let forth.

A BOUT the same time Q. Fabius the Consul held an assembly for the creation of Censors, and elected Censors were M. Cornelius, Cethegus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, who neither of them had ever had been Consul. And by a grant of commission from the Senat, there was a bill preferred unto the Commons, and the same passed, that these Censors should let, and to farm let the territory of Capua. The review of the Senat and choice of new Senators was hindered and staid, by reason of a contention between the two Censors, who should be the president of the Senat. Now the choosing of him lay in Sempronius's hand. Howbeit Cornelius alleged, that the custom and tradition of fore-fathers should be followed, namely to elect him for President, who of all them that were now living had born first the office of Consul. And that was T. Manlius Torquatus. Sempronius replied again, and said, that the gods had given him by lot the first place, so that he had granted him free liberty to choose whom he would. And therefore would elect Q. Fabius Max. whom at that time he was able to prove to be the principal man of all the City, without exception, and take Annilius himself for the Judge. After much variance and contending of words, at length Sempronius by relenting and permission of his Collegue elected Q. Fabius Max. the chief Senator. Then the Senat was changed; and new Senators chosen, and eight were overpassed and left out, among whom was L. Caecilius Metellus, he that gave the infamous and shameful countess, to abandon Italy after the defeat at Cannae. In noting likewise and disgracing the Knights and Gentlemen, the same clause was considered of, and took effect, but very few there were of them that were touched with this infamy. But all those horsemen belonged to the Cannian legions who were in Sicily (and no small number there was of them) had their horses taken from them: And to aggravate this hardship there was note of disgrace, they were plagued also with time of long warfare: for so many of them as had served with horse allowed by the City, should not reckon upon the years passed already, but were to follow warfare ten years forward, and find themselves horses. Moreover, these Censors after diligent search and survey found out and met with a great number of those that ought to have served on horseback: and look how many of them were sixteen years old and upward at the beginning of the war, and had not been employed in the war, those all they disfranchised, and made Ætuli, or contributaries. After this, they bargained by the great for the repairing and re-edifying again of those edifices which had been consumed by fire about the Forum, (or market place) namely the seven shops, the [fish] shambles, and the Kings Hall, or royall gallery:

(11) Thus when all things were finished which were to be done at Rome, the Consul ſent forward to the ſea, and ſix Fabius went before to Capua; and ſome few daies after Fabius followed; who beſought both his own Collegue by word of mouth moſt earnestly, and alſo Marcellus by ſpecial letters, to make ſlip war upon Annibal, and to keep him occupied, while he afflied Tarentum which Ciſſius were once taken from the enemy, he were then driven out of all, & having no place to put his head in, nor which he might make account to ſtand ſaſt and truly unto him, he ſhould have no reaſon at all once to ſtay in Italy. He diſpatched alſo a meſſenger to Rhegium unto the Captain of the fort and garrifon, which by Levinus the Conſul was there placed againſt the Bruttii; and thoſe were eight thouſand men. The greateſt part of them were of theſe good fellows, and that damned crew, where we ſake before, who ſued to live by robbing and ſtealing, and were brought thither from Agratino out of Sicily, unto whom there were adjoynd many of the Bruttii alſo negatives from thence, and aſſo as themſelves every way, both for audaciousneſſe, and alſo for needineſſe to let upon any bold adventure whatſoever. This power of men he commanded ſhould be led to waſſe and ſpoil the Brittans country firſt, and then to lie againſt the City of Cincſonia, and to aſſault it. They having performed this ſervice, not only willingly & cheerfully, but alſo with greedineſſe: having alſo chafed away and riſſed the huſbandmen and peafants of the country, aſſailed the City with a forcible means. Marcellus ſtirred up and provoked by thoſe letters of the Conſul; and having a good opinion of his own, that of all the Roman Captains there was not one ſo able to march Annibal as himſelf; left his wintering ſtanding Camp, ſo ſoon as ever there was forrage and graſſ in the country, took the field, and encountered Annibal ſoon after.

them to sue for the same condition of yielding and surrendering themselves, which was granted them by the Carthians.

Q. Fabius the Consul, won by assault a Town in the Salernitan country called Metapontum. The Citizens were taken there 4000, and some good store of other pillage. From thence he went to Tarentum, and in the very mouth of the haven, lay against the City. Those ships which Livius had for to wait the convoy of victuals, he partly charged with engines, and other ordnance to be used in the assault. To his own ships, he partly furnished with artillery, with horses, and shot of all sorts: the assault being likewise, and not the Gallies only which were guided by oars to the end, that ships of burden likewise, and Ladders unto the walls, and others aloof from out of the ships, wound and hurt those that defended the City. These ships were ordered and appointed from the open Sea to assault the City. And clear was the Sea of all danger from the Punick Navy, which it was fear unto Corymbus, at what time as Publius minded to, assail the Scyllians. In this mean while, the assistants of Caulonia, a little before the coming of Annibal, for fear lest they should be surprised betook themselves to a little hill, which as it was (for the present danger) a place of safety, so it wanted all things else. Fabius as he lay at siege about Tarentum, was much helped to the achieving of a matter of great importance, by a trifling thing to speak of, and of small moment in itself. The Tarentines had a garrison of the Brutians, for the love of a woman, who had a brother that served in the army of Fabius the Consul. He being certified by letters from his sister, of this new acquaintance that she had with that forainer and stranger, so wealthy and so honorable a person among his countrymen, conceived some hope by means of his sister, that her lover might be brought to any thing, and wrought as they would have, so acquainted the Consul with his conceived hope. And this seemed to him by imagination. Whereupon the young man was sent to Tarentum in habit and quality of a fugitive, and by the mediation of his sister, grew into some favour with the Captain thereof, and at last practised secretly to understand and sound his mind, and afterwards seeing the weakness and inconstancy of the man, he prevailed with him to touch, through the flattering speeches and allurement of the woman, as to betray the keeping and guard of that place whereof he had the charge. After that the manner how, and the time when this plot should be put in execution, was agreed upon, the said soldier left what was done already, and in what sort every thing was to be done. Fabius at the first watch after he had L given a token and watchword to them in the Castle, and to those likewise that had the keeping of the haven himself, for a complaint about the said haven and lay as closely as he could to that part of the City which heath to the East. Then all at once the trumpets sounded from the Castle, from the haven and ships, which in the open Sea did neer at hand. Great shouting there was, and much ado on foot purpose from all these quarters, whereas indeed there was least danger or none at all. In the mean season the Consul kept his men in, whereupon Demetrius, who had before- time been Admiral of the Armado, and whose chance it was to have the guarding of that place, against which the Consul lay close, feeling all thereabout quiet enough, and no stirring at all, and hearing all other parts to ring again and resound with such alarms as otherwise it seemed the City was taken and won, and fearing lest if he sat still and bestirred not himself, the Consul would make some Cambrado, and give the assay to enter the City with banner displayed: withdrew his guard toward the Castle, from whence was heard the greatest and most terrible noise. Fabius, when he perceived once by guessing at the time, as also by the silence it self in that place (for where but a while before they kept much ado, raising up one another, and calling to army, there now all was hush, and not a word that the guards were had away from thence, he commanded that the ladders should be brought to that side of the wall, where the brother & broker both of the traitors, had brought word that the cohorts of the Brutians were quartered and kept their guard. Thus on that part was the wall won by the means of the Brutii, who were ready to help and take them up, and to they got over into the City. Then was the next gate broken open, that the army might come by companies under their several colours. Whereupon they set up a shout, and all in the night of that day, they marched as far as into the market place, and met with none to make head against them, and caused all them that fought at the Castle and the haven, to turn upon them. These, in the very entrance of the market place, began a great skirmish, rather fought hotly than maintained thoroughly. For the Tarentin soldiers were nothing comparable to the Romans, either in courage or heart, or goodness of armour, in skill and knowledge of war, or in lustiness and strength of body. And therefore when they had only shot their darts, even before they came to hand-to-hand, they turned back and slunk away through the lanes of the City, where with they were well acquainted, some to their own homes, and some to their friends houses. Two of their Captains, Nico and Demetrius, fought manfully, and were slain. Philomenes, who was the principal head that wrought the revolt unto Annibal, fled out of the skirmish as fast as ever his horse would carry him: but a while after his empty horse was seen & known wandering astray in the City, but his body could never be found. It was commonly believed, that he slung himself headlong from his horse back, into a certain open pit. As for Caristales, Captain of the Punick garrison, he cast away his armour and weapon, and as he was coming to the Consul with a godly tale, recounting and remembering his fathers friendship and intertainment to the Romans, there hapned a soldier to meet him and strike off his head. Then by some or other in every place, the Carthaginians and Tarentines both went to wrack, and were killed without mercy and regard, as well unarmed as armed. Yea, there were many of the Brutians also fell upon the edge of the sword, were it that they were mistaken, or for an old grudge and in-bred hatred; or to suppress and extinguish the bruit and rumor that went of betraying the Town: to the end that Tarentum might seem the rather won by assault and force of arms. Then from murder and laughter, they fell to sack and spoil the City. There were taken prisoners by report thirty thousand head of slaves: a mighty male of silver tried and coined: of gold 87000 pound weight. Images and painted tables or pictures, so many, as very neer amounted to the number of the ornaments of Syracusa. But Fabius of a braver mind, obtained from that kind of prize and pillage, which Marcellus forbore not. For when his Scribe or Secretary asked him, what his pleasure was, should be done with the images (and the Statues they were of the Gods, of a mighty biggess and proportion, portraied every one in their own habit like warriors) Mary (q.d. he) let the Tarentines have their angry Gods still among them, for me. After this, the wall which divided the City from the Castle, was dismantled, rased down, and laid even with the ground.

Whiles these things hapned at Tarentum, Annibal (after they had yielded themselves unto him that besieged Caulonia) hearing of the siege and assault of Tarentum, went night and day and made all the hat he could, with a running march, to rescue & succour the City: but hearing by the way that it was forced and gone, "Ah," see well q.d. he, the Romans also are not without their Annibal. In good faith, so was Tarentum won, and so lost again, by treachery and treason. But because he would not be thought to turn back & flee, in the very same place where he made false, he sat down, and encamped almost five miles from the City: and after he had abode there some few daies, he retired himself to Metapontum. From thence he suborned two Metapontines, and sent them to Fabius at Tarentum, with letters devised from certain principal men of that City, wherein they promised to betray Metapontum and the Punick garrison into the Consul his hands, upon assurance made unto them, that all former treacheries & offences should be forgiven and forgotten. Fabius supposing all was truth and plain-dealing, appointed a certain day when he would come to Metapontum, and sent his letters also to thole principal citizens, which letters were brought unto Annibal: whereat he was right glad and took great contentment that his fraud proved so well, and that Fabius also might be entrapped, caught, and overtaken by his wily fetches as well as others: and thereupon laid an ambush for him in the way not far from Metapontum. As Fabius (before he should go out of Tarentum) attended to know what the birds signified, he observed once or twice that they approved not his journey. And when he killed a sacrifice, thereby to know the will of the Gods, the Soothsayer, or bowel-priest gave him warning, to take heed of the deceit of his enemies, and beware of waile-laying. This Metapontines, seeing that he came not at the day appointed, were sent again to hasten him forward, and to encourage him to come: who were all suddenly at once apprehended, and for fear of further torture, disclosed the practice of the ambush.

In the beginning of that summer wherein these occurrences hapned, after that Scipio had bestowed the whole winter, in winning and reconciling the hearts of the barbarous people, partly with gifts and rewards, and partly with enlarging and sending back their hostages, and the prisoners: there came unto him one Edeso, a noble and famous Captain of the Spaniards. His wife and children were in custody with the Romans: but besides that occasion which brought him to Scipio, there was another cause, even a general inclination of all their minds, that chanced I wot not how, which withdrew and estranged whole Spain from the Carthaginian Empire, unto the Roman. The same reason moved Indubilis also and Mandonius, the greatest LL, and Princes no doubt of all Spain, to leave Asdrubal, and with all the power they could make of their followers and vassals, to depart into the mountains standing just over his camp, from whence they might from hill to hill continually retire themselves in safety to the Romans. Asdrubal perceiving the pillage of his enemies to grow and increase full more and more by little and little, and his own to diminish; and fore-seeing, that unless he made some hardy adventure and prevailed that way, all would be naught, and fall to the ground, as it was beginning already to reel, determined to put it to a battail with all speed possible. Scipio also was sharpset, and the more desirous of fight, as well for the good hope, which the success of his former affairs confirmed and increased: as also because, before the armies of his enemies should joyn together, he was more willing to fight with one General and one army, than with all them joyntly at once: and yet he had well amended and increased his forces politically for purpose, against the work, in case he should be driven to fight with many of them together. For, seeing there was no use of ships, because all the Rivers and Seas along Spain, were cleared of the Carthaginian navy, he withdrew his fleet up into the harbor at Taracena, and joynted his sea-servitors to his Land-fouldiers. For armour he had store enough, which was either taken in the pillage of Carthago, or newly made after the winning of the Town, by so many Artificers and Craftmen that he kept there hard and close at work. With this power, Scipio in the beginning of spring departed from Taracena (for now by this time was Lutius returned from Rome, without whole company he was not willing to enterprise any service of great moment and importance) and led forward against the enemies. As he journeyed peaceably all over the country, and passed through the territories and confines of every City and State, his Allies were ready to entertain and accompany him. Indubilis also and Mandonius among the rest, with all their power met him. Then Indubilis in the name of them both spake, not like a forthright barbarian foolishly & inconsiderately, but rather with a modest kind of gravity more like one that executed his revolt and running from the adversary part upon confidence and necessity, than made it boast of catching and embracing the vantage there of upon the first opportunity presented. I know full well (quoth he) that the very hands of a fugitive revolt, as it is odious and detestable to old Allies, so it is suspicious to new. And I cannot greatly blame the manner of men in so doing, in case it be not the bare name, but the double dealing that causeth the hatred. Then he reckoned up his own good turns and services done unto the Carthaginians on the one side; and recounted their covetousness and pride on the other side, together with their injurious dealings with himself and his people. And therefore, quoth he, this body of mine only hath conversed among them until this day, but my heart and affection hath long been with them, where I believe verily, that right, justice and religion is regarded and maintained for even to do we lie as suppliants in humble manner to the Gods also, when we can no longer endure the violence and wrongful outrages of men: Beseeching Scipio this one thing withal, that this his favouring from the enemy, and ranging with him; he would neither blame and condemn presently as a transgression, nor honor and commend as a good desert of his but as he should find both him and the rest, by good proof from that day forward; even so to make reckoning of them accordingly, and not otherwise. Scipio made answer again, That in truth he would do so: neither would he take them for fugitives and runaways; who judged that they were not bound in conscience to maintain the society and alliance with them as good and lawful, who made no count at all to oblige inviolable, any promise or duty to God or man. Then were their two wives and children brought forth into their sight, and delivered unto them; whom they received, and shed tears abundantly for joy; and so for that day they were had to their lodgings. The morrow after, faith was plighted and contracted between them; and the same confirmed by covenant; and they were dismissed to bring their forces; and to shew them before him: and so they quartered and lodged in the same camp with the Romans; until by their guidance and direction they came unto the enemy. The army of the Carthaginians next unto them was under the conduct of Asdrubal, near unto the City Hasdra. Before his camp, he kept certain standing guards of horsemen. Upon them the light-armed forlorn hope of virgins and darters of the Roman host which went before the battail to skirmish, likewise they of the forefront and vanguard, charged forcibly with their shottoyes to contemptuously, and in scornful wise, even presently upon their travail in journey, and before they had chosen a piece of ground to encamp in, that it was soon seen what heart there was in both parts. For the Cavalry of the enemies fearfully fled; and were driven into the camp: but the Romans advanced with banners displayed, hard to the very gates; and so forth that day they the Asdrubals were only up and provoked to a fight, and then the Romans pitched their tents. Asdrubal in the night retired his army to a mount, which in the top had a broad plain. Behind this hill there ran a river, the fore-front thereof, and the sides all about the skirts were compassed as it were, with a steep bank standing plumb upright. There lay under this hill top another plain, lower than the other, which also was enclosed round about with the like bank, as difficult for ascent as the former. The next day Asdrubal, after he saw the enemies standing arranged before their camp, sent down his Numidian horsemen, the light-armed slanders also of the Balears; and likewise the Africans. Then Scipio rode about all the regiments, ensigns, and ranks of his army, marshalled as they stood in battail wife, and shewed unto them their enemies; how they displayed afore-hand to fight on equal and even ground; how they taking the vantage of the hills, braved and shewed themselves presuming and trusting upon the place, and not upon their own valour and strength of arms. Howbeit (quoth he) Carthage had higher walls, and yet the Roman souldiers were able to scale and get over: neither hills nor Cattle, no, nor the very Sea, stood in their way when, nor stopped them of their entry. And as for these high places which the enemies are possessed of, they haply may serve their turns well, when they shall take their flight and leap from off the steep banks and run down-hill apace and so get away. But I trow, I shall debar them there, and lay a block in their way on every side. Whereupon he commanded two squadrons, the one to keep the freights of the valley, through which the river runneth: the other to beset the passage that leadeth from the City into the fields, and crosseth overthwart N the hill side above said. Himself led the light appointed vanguarders, who the day before had discomfited the guards and wards of the enemies; to wound the light-armed souldiers, that were quartered in the netter brow of the hill. And first they passed through the rough, and were not impeached nor hindered otherwise than by the difficult passages. But afterward, when they were come within shot, at the very first they were welcomed with a mighty volley of all sorts, pouring (as it were) like hail upon them. Himself answered them again, and recharged upon them, letting drive and discharging the stones which lay strewed all over the grounds; and were such in manner all, as might be welded and stung from them with ease. And not only the souldiers, but larkies and horie-boyes, & such as followed the camp, were intermingled amongst the armed companies. And albeit the ascent up the hill was hard, and they were pelted and almost overwhelmed with darts and stones, yet being so injured as they were to dimes wals and resolute withal; they mounted top first to the top; and so soon as they had got the even ground, where they might have sure footing, they found the enemy, (who was light and nimble, and able to run to and fro, and to save himself, and shift well when he was far off all the time that they skirmished aloof and plaid upon one another with light shot) now that they came to close fight, and to hand-strokes, not able to stand his ground: and so they drove him from his place, and with great slaughter chased him and driven him back to the very battel, that stood upon the higher hill. Then Scipio having given commandment to them, for to follow on the train of their victory, and to enter up still upon the main battel with the enemies, parted the rest of his forces, together with Lelius, willing him to coast along and wheel about on the right hand of the mount, until he found some way of easier ascent himself on the left hand, fetched no long circuit and compass, until he came cross overthwart the flank of the enemies. Hereupon first began their battel to be disordered, whiles they were desirous to turn their wings, and to oppose their ranks and squadrons against the noises and shouts which rang every where about them. In this tumultuous trouble, Lelius also was got up; and while the enemies drew backward and gave ground, because they would not be charged behind on their back, the vanguard of their part was displayed and lay open: and so the Romans even of the middle battel also, had a lane and spacious room to get up and enter upon them: who never had been able to have gained the ground, and won the plain above, (considering the disadvantage of the steep bank) so long as the ranks had stood unbroken, and the Elephants were opposed against them before the Ensigns, in the forefront. Down went the enemies now on every side, and were piteously killed and Scipio, who with his left wing encountered the right, charged and plaid especially upon the naked sides of the enemies. And so by this means they had no way left them to flee and escape clear. For the Roman guards on both hands, as well on the left as the right, had beset all the passages. And as for the gate of the camp, the General himself, and the other Captains and officers of the Camp, had taken it up as they fled that way: besides the combersome trouble of the Elephants, whom being now affrighted, they feared no less then their enemies. So there died of them 8000. Asdrubal, who before the conflict, had made sure work with all the money, and taken it with him, sent the Elephants before, and having rallied as many as he could, of them that fled and escaped out of the camp, he made haste along the river Tagus, toward the mountain Pyrenaeus. Scipio being now master of the enemies camp, after he had given to the souldiers all the pillage and spoil, but only the prisoners, such as were freemen: when he came to take the number of the captives, found they were ten thousand footmen, and two thousand horse. Of which number, as many as were Spaniards he let at liberty and sent them home without ransom. But as for all the Africans, he commanded the Treasurer to make money of them. Then the whole multitude of the Spaniards, was well those that before had yielded themselves, as they then were taken prisoners the day before, saluted him with great content and general voice, by the name and title of King. Whereupon Scipio, after silence made by the crier, said: That he took the name of L. General of Commander, to be the greatest of all other names, by which his own souldiers used to call him. As for the title of King, howsoever in other places it was great and honorable, at Rome surely was odious and intolerable. For his own part, the mind indeed he carried of a King, and if they deemed it to be the highest honour that can fall to the nature of man, let them judge so in their own hearts secretly, and please themselves with that title: only he wished them to forbear the word and term thereof. These very Spaniards, as barbarous as they were, perceived by this speech how haughty and magnanimous he was, who in the height of spirit contemned that as a base thing, whereas in admiration only of the very title, all mortal men besides are amazed and astounded. After all this, he bestowed upon the Princes and great Potentats of the Spaniards, sundry gifts. And of the horses, whereof he had taken in the field and camp great store, he gave Indibilis the choice of three hundred where he would. When the treasurer was selling the Africans, according to the General his commandment, he hapned upon a young sprigling and stripling, of rare and singular beauty: and hearing that he was of royal blood, he sent him to Scipio. And when Scipio demanded of him who he was, and what country-man, and wherefore at those years he was in camp among rude souldiers: I am (saith he) a Numidian born, (and with that his eyes stood full of water) and in my country they call me Mafanissa. Being left and orphan and fatherless, I was brought up with my grand-father by the mother side, Gala, the King of the Numidians. And with my uncle by the mother. Mafanissa, who was lately come with a power of horsemen to aid the Carthaginians, it was my hap to fall over into Spain. And never to this day, have I been in any battel, by reason that Mafanissa would not in regard of my tender age, suffer me in any hand to go to the wars. Howbeit that very day when the battail was fought with the Romans, unware to my said uncle, I secretly got an horse under me, and armour upon my back, and went forth into the field; where my horse chanced to fall, and cast me down headlong on the ground; and so it was my fortune to be taken by the Romans. Scipio gave order that this Numidian youth should be kept safe, and so proceeded to finish matters that were brought before him, as he sat upon the Tribunal in martial court. And after he was come back from thence into his royal pavilion, he called the party again before him, and asked him, whether he were willing to return again to Mafanissa. Whereat the tears gushing out of his eyes for joy, yes, full fain (quoth he) and with all my heart. Then after he had given the young gentleman a ring of gold, a coat embroidered with purple stud-wife, with a Spanish souldiers cape, a golden clasp or button, & a brave cowl, with all the furniture & caparison thereto belonging he sent him away, and commanded certain horsemen to safe-conduct and accompany him so far as he would himself. Then Scipio fell to consult about the war. Some there were that advised him, presently to pursue Asdrubal, but he supposing that to be a dangerous course, for fear lest Mago and the other African souldiers should joyne their forces to his, he sent only a good guard to keep the passage of the hill Pyrenaeus, and imploied the rest of the summer, in receiving homage and fealty of other States of Spain.

yet in the end turned rather to long and tedious battles, than to hard and bloody battles. For in this place there was not only some going in motions, in all the high streets, thorough-ways, and from ways throughout the City: but also Q. Lucretius, Praetor of the City, was commanded to propound unto the people, that the Plebeians should be vowed for ever against a set and determin'd day. Himself there was the man that vowed them, and exhibited them up on the third day before the Nemi or Yppis, and the same day ever after was observed and kept holiday for that purpose.

As for the rumor of the Arentins revolt increased daily greater, so the L. of the Senat were careful about every day more than other. Letters therefore were sent unto Hofilius, that he should without delay take pledges of the Arentines: and C. Terentius Varro was sent with commission, to receive the said hostages at his hands, and to bring them to Rome. He was no sooner come, but Hofilius presently commanded the three legions, which lay in camp before the town, should enter the City with banners displayed, and there he put sufficient guards in places convenient. Then having called and summoned the Senators to appear in the market place, he demanded of them hostages. And when the Senat requested but two days respite to consider of the matter, he made proclamation, that either they should deliver them presently, or else the next day he would seize upon all the Senators children every one. Then he commanded the Colonels, the Captains of the Alibey, and the Centurions, to ward the Gates, that none might go forth of the City by night. But this was hardly and negligently executed: for seven principal Senators before the walls were let at the gates, escaped forth with their children before night. The morning by break of day, when the Senat began to be cited into the Common Hall, these parties were missed, and their goods confiscated, and sold in port-sale. Of the rest of the Senators, their children were taken hostages to the number of 120 and were delivered to C. Terentius, for to be conveyed to Rome: who when he was come into the Senat, made such relation of the matter, that the suspicion of their revolt was much more pregnant than before. And therefore, as if some insurrection had like presently to grow from Tarentum, C. Terentius himself was commanded to conduct it one of the two legions about the City of Tarentum, and there to lie in garrison with it, for to keep the town in order. And it was thought meet that C. Hofilius with the army besides, should survey and visit the whole Province, and so be careful and circumspect, that no occasion nor opportunity might be given unto them, that were inclined to seek alteration and to rebel. C. Terentius so soon as he was come to Tarentum with the legion, when he called unto the Magistrate for the keys of the gates, and they made answer that they were but mislaid aside and could not be found, supposing that they were rather cautiously laid out of the way for the notice, then lost by negligence, caused other keys and locks to be made, and for upon every gate and took as great heed and care as he could, to have all under his own hand. He gave especial warning also to Hofilius as touching the Tuscans, and told him, that he should never hope to rest in security, that they would not rebel, unless he took order with them beforehand, that they possibly could not rebel.

After this, there was much debate and contention in the Senat about the Tarentines, even before Fabius, whilst himself excused and defended them whom he had conquered and subdued by force and arms: but others were mightily offended with them, yea, and most of them gave out plainly, that they were full as faulty as the Campains, and deserved no less punishment. And so there was an act of the Senat granted according to the opinion and advice of M. Atilius: that the town should be held with a garrison, and all the Tarentines kept from stirring out of the City: and that the matter should further be debated and decided at another time, when the state of Italy stood in better terms of peace and quietness. And the like contention and variance was among the L. of the Senat touching M. Livius Constat and Captain of the Castle of Tarentum, whilst some were of mind to condemn him as in great fault, because through his carelessness and sloth, Tarentum the City was betrayed to the enemy: others again awarded him good consideration and reward, for that he kept the fort so well by the space of five years, and by his means especially and by none else Tarentum was recovered. But long were of opinion between these and said, that the diffusing and determination of that matter pertained properly to the Censors and not to the Senat: of which judgement Fabius also himself was. And this moreover he said, withal, that he must needs confess, that true it was, which Livius his friends in the Senat flood to much upon, and treated so often; namely, that he was the only means that Tarentum was recovered: for in good faith, quoth he, it never could have been regained if it had not once been lost before. Q. Quinctius Crispinus one of the Consuls, went to his army which Q. Fulvius Flaccus had, with a new supply into the Lucans country. But Marcellus still was laid behind, upon occasion of new scruples of conscience, and sundry objects that troubled his mind, and kept a hammering in his head one after another. Amongst which, this was one, that having vowed in the Gauls war, at Clasidium, a Temple to Honor and Virtus, the dedication of the said Church was hindered by the Bishops, who said, that one Chappel, by right and according to their ceremonies, served but for one Saint, and could not be consecrated unto more. For in case it should be blasted and smitten by fire from heaven, or otherwise some prodigious token hap therein, hardly could the right expiation and purging thereof be performed, because it might not be known, to which of the saints or gods the sacrifice should be done: for by order one sacrifice could not serve twain, unless there were some particular and especial gods named. So there was said to be another Chappel

A bulle to Virtus and great hast there was made for the rearing thereof, and yet it was not his fortune ever to dedicate those chappels. So at length he set forward and put himself on his journey with his supply, unto the army which he had left the year before at Venusia.

When Crispinus minded to assault Laeri in the country of the Brutians, because there went a great name of Fabius for the assailing and winning of Tarentum, he sent for all kind of artillery and engines out of Staiy, and ships also were brought from thence, for to batter that part of the City that lieth to the Sea side. But the enterprise went not forward, because Annibal had removed, with all his forces to Lacinium. And besides, the news went that his colleague had already brought out his forces from Venusia, with whom he was desirous to joyn. And therefore he returned out of the Brutians country into Apulia: and so between Venusia and Brutia, the Consuls encamped severally, within three miles one from the other. Annibal likewise was retired into the same country, considering that the war was turned from Laeri. There the Consuls (hot men of nature both) almost every day led forth their men into the field, not doubting but that Annibal once met them (having two Consular armies joyned together) to make a dispatch of the war once for all. Annibal because the year before, he had twice affronted Marcellus, and both given and taken the foil: like as he had great reason, as well to fear as to hope, if he were to encounter and fight with him alone: so he thought verily, that he was never able to make his part good with both the Consuls together. And therefore laying off his Lyons skin, he took himself wholly to his old Foxes coat, and sought all means and opportunities to lay a train for to entrap him. Howbeit there passed some light skirmishes between both their camps, with variety of fortune and interchangeable success. By which, the Consuls thinking that they should hold out and keep the enemies play, during the summer season, and yet nevertheless be able to assault Laeri, wrote unto L. Cincius, that he should take the Seas, and cross over with his fleet out of Staiy to the City of Laeri. And to the end that the Town might be likewise assailed from the Land side, they commanded part of the army which lay in garrison at Tarentum, to be conducted thither. Annibal having intelligence afore-hand of these things, by certain Thurons, sent forth certain of his forces to bely the wayes from Tarentum. And there under the side of the Perellian mount, he bestowed secretly in ambush two thousand horse, and three thousand foot. Upon whom the Romans (marching without their espials sent afore them) chanced to light, and were slain to the number of two thousand, and upon twelve hundred taken alive: the rest were scattered and fled over the fields and forests back to Tarentum. Now there was a little hill between both the camps of the Carthaginians and Romans, and the same all overgrown with wood, which at first was possessed and kept, neither by one nor other: because the Romans knew not the situation of that side which lay toward the enemies camp: and Annibal supposed verily that it was a place fitter for to lay an ambush, than to encamp in: and therefore he sent by night for that purpose, certain troops of Numidians, and bestowed them closely in the midst of the wood, and not one of them stirred all the day long out of their standings, for fear lest either their armour or themselves might be espied afar off. In the Roman camp, every man generally was of mind, and let not to say, that the said hill was to be seized and fortified for their use, with a good fortress built upon it, for fear lest if they were first gained by Annibal, they should have the enemy as it were over their heads ready to annoy them. And Marcellus himself was of the same opinion: whereupon, Why go not we out selves in person (quoth he, to his colleague) with some few horsemen, to view and consider the place, where our eyes shall be our judges: and seeing the ground once, we shall resolve more certainly what course to take? Crispinus liked well of the motion: and so they went forward accompanied with two hundred and twenty horsemen of which forty were Fregellans, he rest all Tuscans. There followed after them, M. Marcellus, the Consul his son, and Aulus Manlius, two Colonels: also L. Aremius and M. Atilius, two Captains of the allies. Some Authors have set down in writing, that Marcellus the Col. sacrificed that day: and when the first beast was killed, the liver was found without an head: howbeit in the second, all things appeared that were wont to be seen. But in the head of that liver there shewed I wot not how, a kind of extraordinary preference: which the Soothsayer had no liking to, because after those inward things which seemed before short, unperfect, and misliking: now those again were seen too well fed and overgrown. But the Consul Marcellus was so hot and desirous to fight with Annibal, that he thought himself never encamped near enough unto him. And even then also as he went forth out of the camp, he gave order to his soldiers to be ready at a short warning, and have their eye upon the place: that presently, if he liked the hill, for which they went to view, they should dislodge, truss up bag and baggage and follow presently. Now there was a little flat and plain ground before the camp, from whence the way that led unto the said hill, was on every side very open and evident to the eye: where there lay a scout or spie, set of purpose to discover any of the enemies gone far from the camp, stragling and ranging abroad, either for fowle or forage, that they might be intercepted: and nor for any hope of so great effect as fell out. This fellow gave a sign unto the Numidians, that all at once they should arise out of their lurking & starting holes. And they that from the top & ridge of the hill, were to rifle & shew themselves affront, never appeared & made head, before that they had set a compass about, for to shut up the passage at the back of the Romans. And then from all parts they began to start up & with a main shout charged & ran upon them. The Consul now were in that valley, from whence they neither could possibly get up to the pitch of the hill, possessed aforehand by the enemy nor had any place of safe retreat behind, for that they were environed & hemmed in above all others by many degrees, C. Claudius Nero excelled and was the chief Patagon. But a H companion with him in the government, they were life wife to each other. As Scipio had to doubt, they deemed him a singular man and a brave Captain: but yet more to value the other, for his quality and occasions of this was required, or to be matched with such an enemy as Antibal was. And therefore they thought good to join with him of his colleague, Alibi, wife, and prudent man, who might temper and qualify that fierce nature and disposition of his. Now M. Livius, many years ago had been upon his Consulship, condemned by the judgment of the people. Which ignominy and reproach he took so grievously to the heart, that he departed into the country, and for many years together, he bore not only the City, but to converse and keep company with men. And almost eight years after his condemnation aforesaid, M. Claudius Marcellus, and M. Valerius Maximus the Consuls, reduced him again into the City. But he did not go in old and worn apparel, letting the hair of his head and beard grow long, carrying in his very countenance and air, the fresh and notable remembrance of the disgrace before received. But L. Furius and P. Licinius the Censors, compelled him to cut his hair, and lay away his vile and unbecomly weeds, to come into the Senate, and to speak again in civil matters and affairs of State. And yet in so doing, he would never proceed far; then to say Amen to other men's opinions, and speak but one word, yea and nay, or else not hugging at all, but shew his mind by pressing his feet to one side or other. Until such time as a kindman of his own, M. Livius Macatus, being in trouble, and his name and honour called in question, caused him to stand up and speak in the Senate and deliver his opinion. And when after a long discourse, he was to deliver his mind, he heard himself speak, he turned every man his eye upon him, and ministered occasion also of speech in these terms, namely, "That the people had done the man exceeding great wrong, years and hurt the common weal: much, in that during the time of so dangerous a war, there had been no man in place of so worthy a person, either for his travail and pains; or his wisdom and counsel." But to return again to the Lords of the Senate: they knew well, that Antibal was not M. Valerius, Leonus, nor could possibly be joynt as companion in government to C. Nero. Forasmuch as it was not lawful that both should be chosen out of the Nobles or Patrons. And the same was T. Manlius his case also. Besides that, as he once refused the Consulship when it was offered unto him, so no doubt he would not accept thereof the second time if he were offered unto him. But if they should join Marcus Livius and C. Claudius together, there would be an excellent example of Consuls in deed. Neither stood the people so much against, thus moved first by the Lords of the Senate. The only man in the whole City, that desired it, was the very party himself, unto whom this dignity and honourable place was presented. Who much blamed himself, and his country of the City, saying, "That they had, in part of his trouble and sorrow, and simple garments: but now stood and accused, and during the time of his trouble and sorrow, and simple garments: but now against his will, they offered him a glittering white robe, and a Consulship. This quothe he) they punish and deprecate, thus they honour and advance the same persons. If they took me for a good, and honest man, why condemned they me as if I were for a wicked one and a flibby? If they found me naughty and faulty, why could they have to trust me with a second Consulship, who used the former so badly, which was committed unto me? As he argued and made complaints in this wise, the Lords of the Senate reproved him, and replied again: saying, "That the eyes, the example of M. Furius, who in times past was called home out of exile: and when the State was decayed and lying along, set it upright again in her former place and pristine glory. And like as the cruelties and rigor of parents, is to be mollified by patience, even so the hard and fiery dealings of a mans country, is to be dulged and mitigated by bearing and sufferance. So they all flock close together, and chose M. Livius Consul, with C. Claudius. Three dayes after, they went to the election of the Pretors. And there were created Pretors, L. Porcius Cicerilius, Caius Manlius, A. Hostilius, and C. Hostilius, both Cass. When the election was finished, and the games celebrated, the Dictator and General of the Cavalry surrendered their places; C. Terentius Varro was sent into Hetruria as Pro-pretor, to the end that out of that province; C. Hostilius should go to Tarentum, unto that army which T. Quinctius the Coll had. That L. Manlius should go beyond Sea as Ambassador, to see how the world went there: And withal, considering that in summer, there were to be solemnized the famous games at Olympia, which were celebrated with a most frequent resort and meeting of all Greece, in case he might safely and without impeachment of the enemy, he should visit that great assembly: to the end that if he could light upon any Sicilians, who were fled and banished their country, or any citizens of Tarentum, confined thither and sent away by Antibal, they should repair home again into their own countries, and know, that whatsoever they were possessed of, before the wars began, the people of Rome would restore the same, and make good again unto them.

Because it was like to be a right dangero is year, and no Consuls were invested fully in the Common-weal, all men depended upon the Consuls elect, and were desirous that they should with all speed, call for their Provinces: and every man was willing to know aforeshand, what Province each one should rule, and what enemy he was to deal withal. Moreover, a motion and speech there was in the Senat-house, that the Consuls should be reconciled and made friends, and Q. Fabius Max. propounded that first. For there had been notorious enmity and variance between them aforesaid: and the calamity of Livius made the same more grievous and unportable unto himself; in regard that he was perished, he was in that misery of his, he was

A depicted of his adversary. Whereupon he grew to be more implacable of the twain, and worse to be treated. There needs (quothe he) no reconciliation, neither is it material and to any purpose, for they will do all with more diligence and better spirit, who ever stand in fear that their adversary and concurrent shall grow great and be advanced by their default. Yet the authority of the Senat bare such a stroke with them, that they laid aside all malice and old grudge, and with one mind, content, and counsel, administered the affairs of the common-weal. Their Provinces were intermingled, nor their government extended into one anothers country, as in former years, but distant alunder, and divided by the remote frontiers and farthest marches of Italy. For unto one of them were assigned the Brutians and Lucans country against Antibal: unto the other, Gallia against Antibal: who as the rumour and bruit went, was come forward near unto the Alpes. Of those two armies which were in Gallia and in Hetruria, he whose fortune was to go into Gallia, was to chule which army he would, and have besides that, other of the City. And he whose lot should be to go into the Brutians country, beside the new legions enrolled of citizens, was to take unto him, the army of whether Consul he list, of the former year. Allo Quintus Fabius the Pro-consul, had the charge of that army which the Consul refused, and his authority was renewed for one year longer. As for C. Hostilius, whose Province Tarentum they exchanged for Hetruria, they altered this Province again, to wit, Capua instead of Tarentum. Unto him was allowed that one legion which Fulvius the last year commanded.

Now increased their care every day more than other, concerning the coming of Antibal into Italy. And the Embassadors of the Massilians had brought newshirts, that he was passed over into Gallia: and that the minds of the Gauls were mightily cheered up by his coming, because the speech went, that he had brought a huge deal of gold with him, for to hire and wage soldiers for aid in the wars. Then afterwards, Sex. Asinius, and M. Reius, who were sent Embassadors back with them from Rome, for to see whether it were so indeed, had made relation unto the Senate, that they had sent certain of purpose guided by the Massilians, who by means of their especial friends, the Princes and Lords of the Gauls, might learn the truth, and bring word back accordingly. By whose report it was for certain known, that Antibal having levied already a puissant army, was minded the next spring to passe over the Alps: and that there was nothing else said him, but that it had been done already, saving only the passages of the Alps which were closed up with the winter snow.

In the room of M. Marcellus, L. Aquilius Paivus was created Augur, and so consecrated. And likewise Cn. Cornelius Dolabella was inaugurated or installed King of the sacrifices, instead of Marcus Marcius, who died two years before. In this very same year the City was purged; and there was a general survey and numbering of the people, by the Censors taken, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. There were reckoned and entered into the Censors books of Citizens, 137168. A smaller number by much odds, than before the war. It is recorded in the Annals, that this year first after that Antibal came into Italy, the Comitium was built over head and covered. And that the Roman Games were once renewed by the Ediles of the chair, Q. Metellus, and C. Serrullius: and that the other Games called Plautii, were renewed two dayes by Q. Manlius, and M. Caelius Metellus, Ediles of the Commons: who also offered three images, and let them up in the Chapel of Ceres: And the solemn feasting dinner of Jupiter was celebrated by occasion of those Games.

Then C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius the second time, entered their Consulship: who (because whiles they were but Coll. elect, they had call lots for their Provinces) commanded the Pretors to do the like. And to C. Hostilius fell the jurisdiction over the citizens, who had that likewise over strangers and forrainers: to the end, that the other three might go forth into their Provinces. To A. Hostilius was allotted Sardinia: to C. Manlius, Sicilia: and to L. Porcius France. In sum, the legions were in number three and twenty, divided into the Provinces in this sort: to wit, the Consuls had two apiece, Spain four. The three Pretors for Sicily, Sardinia, and France each of them twain. C. Terentius in Hetruria commanded two. Q. Fulvius in the Brutians country, other two. Q. Claudius about Tarentum, and the Salentins conducted twain: and Caius Hostilius Tubulus at Capua, one. Last of all, two were enrolled for the City. In the fourth first legions, the people chose all the Colonels or Massials, but to all the rest the Consuls sent new to make up the defect.

Before the Consuls went forth there was a Novendial sacrifice celebrated because at Vul it had rained stones from heaven. And after one prodigious sight was once minded and spoken of, there were (as it is commonly seen) others also reported: namely, that in Anturnus the temple of Jupiter, and the sacred grove of Marcius was smitten with lightning: and at Atella the wall and gate likewise, was blasted with fire from Heaven. The men of Anturnus take also of a more fearful and terrible thing than that, to wit, that there ran a river of blood in their very gate. Last of all, at Capua the Wolf entered the gate at night, and worried and dismembered one of the watchmen. These wonderful signs were expiate with sacrificing of greater beasts, and a supplication was holden for one day, by virtue of a decree from the Prelats. Then was the Novendial sacrifice once again renewed, because it was seen, that in Arministrum it rained stones. And mens minds were no sooner freed of one religious scruple; but they were troubled again with another. For word was brought, that at Furino there was an infant born, as big as ordinary a child is at four years of age. And the thing was not so strange for the bigness of the body, as for that it was born doubtful whether it was male or female, like as two years before, at Spina, it was a monster, and that it should be had out of the Dominion of Rome, and drowned in the deep, lest it might touch no ground. Wherefore they went alive into a coffin, and when they had carried it a good way into the Sea, they flung it in before the Priests made a decree that certain Virgins in three companies, having nine apiece, should go through the City, and sing certain Canicles. And while in the Temple of Asclepius the Virgins were learning their song by heart, deified and framed in verse by Lucius the Poet, the Temple of Queen Juno in the Aventine hill, was stricken with lightning about Heaven, and when she herself had declared that this prodigious token touched the matrons and dames of the City, and that the goddess was to be pacified with an oblation, they were (by virtue of a sacred law) carried out by the Curules of the Patres into the Capitol, as many as had any house, either in the City of Rome, or within ten miles every way. And these matrons themselves chose five and twenty into whose hands all the rest should put some small portion of their dowry. Of which there was made a file and large golden chain, to be presented unto Juno, and it was brought into the Aventine, and the dames offered unto her purely and chaste their sacrifices. And straight after the Decemvirs sacrificed a bull for another sacrifice of the same goddess, the manner and the where of was this: There were two white heifers led from the Temple of Asclepius into the City through the Sacra Caracina, after them were carried two images, representing Phoebus made of Cyprus wood, which were seven and twenty, Virgins in long (wide garments) chanting hymns and songs to the unknown Phoebus. These songs in verse were of a very commendable, and passed for good with the matrons and people with their living, but it they should be careful now a days to our time, heads they would learn but empty stuff, and composed without wit or reason. After this row of Maidens, came the Decemvirs decked with sacred Ceremonies, with chaplets and garlands of Pales, clothed in vestures and robes embroidered with purple; from the gate above named, they passed by the street Septimia to the Grand place, and there vested this solemn pomp, and train, the three Virgins taking hold of a cord, which went through all their hands, singing and dancing the measures, looking as usually according to the book. From thence they went by the Tullian street, and Palatine through the Forum market, and so forward into the Claustrum Publicum, until they came to the Temple of Juno. There the Decemvirs sacrificed two oxen, and the images of Cyprus wood were offered and set up in the Temple. When the Gods and Goddesses were sacrificed, the Consul took matters more freightly and with greater reverence, than any Consul could remember in former years; For both the fear of the war was two-fold, by reason of a new come enemy unto Italy, and also there was less store of youth out of which the soldiers should be recruited. Whereupon they cancelled the inhabitants of the Colonies by the Sea sides, who were said to have an especial immunity of warfare (by a sacred law) to go to find, and fight, and when they denied, and stood upon their privilege of exemption, they set them down a certain day, upon which every man should repair into the Senate, and shew what cards they had for their immunity and vacation. Upon the day appointed there presented themselves before the Senate, these Commonwealths following to wit, of Hesperia, Alba, Antium, Ardea, Antivra, Signina, and Ardea from the upper Sea. When every one of these States exhibited and read their charter of immunity, there was none of all them denied with, but they of Antium and Hoffia, in regard the enemy abode in Italy, and to the young and servicable men of those Colonies, were put to their oath and sware, that not above forty of them should be taken forth of the walls of their Colony, so long as the enemy continued in Italy.

When all the Legati of the Senate were of opinion, that the Consuls were to go forth to the wars with all speed possible (for that both Asdrubal was to be encountered coming down the Alps, for fear he should follow the Gauls on this side the Alps, and the Tullani likewise who hoped and looked every day for a change and alteration; and also Annibal was to be kept occupied in his own wars, that he might not go forth of the Brutian country, and meet with his brother) only Lucius made some stay, and drew back, as reporting but small fruit in the armies belonging to his own Provinces. And as for his Colleague, whereof Quintus had the charge at Tarentum. Whereupon he had made some motion of calling the Volones (or volunteers) again to their colours, and to serve in the wars. The Senate granted the Consul a large and free commission, both to make supply from whence he would, by chusing out of all his armies whom they pleased; and to make exchange with whom they would; and to draw out of the Provinces whomsoever, according as they should think it good for the Common weal. And all this was executed with the exceeding concord and unity of the Consuls: The Volones were enrolled into the nineteenth and twentieth legions. Some Authors have written, that Scipio sent unto Spain from out of Spain a strong power of auxiliaries for that way, to wit, eight thousand of Spaniards and Frenchmen; two thousand legionary footmen, and eighteen hundred men of arms, partly Numidians, and partly Spaniards; and that Marcus Lucertius brought these forces by Sea; also that C. Marius sent out of Sicily four thousand archers and slingers.

The fear and trouble in Rome were much increased, by occasion of letters sent out of Gallia from Leptineus the Pretor, purposing thus much, That Asdrubal was removed out of his wintering harbours, and was passing over the Alps, that there were eight thousand Egiptians levied

Alexand and ready to join with him, so soon as ever he was come into Italy, unless some one would first against the Lightness to prevent and keep them otherwise busied with war. As for himself, he was armed with that weak army that he had, go forward, as far as he thought he might with safety. These letters caused the Consuls to dispatch the multitudes in great haste, and to go forth into their Provinces, sooner than they had purposed with this intent, that both of them as well the one as the other, might in his several provinces keep the enemies occupied, and suffer them not to join, and lay the forces together. And verily the thing that helped them most in this their disengagement, was an opinion and persuasion that Annibal had. For albeit he was assured that his brother would, the summer past over into Italy, yet when he called to remembrance what a toil he had himself, and how much trouble and travail he endured in the passage one while of the river Rodanus, and then while of the mountains of the Alps, and how for the space of five months together, he was forced not only to fight with the people, but struggle also with the difficulties of the places, a he never looked that Asdrubal could so easily and speedily pass over as he did: which was the cause that he dislodged out of his wintering places to such the hater. But Asdrubal had better expectation, and all things more easily and speedily than either himself hoped for, or others expected. For the Arverni, and other nations (by their example) both of France and also about the Alps, not only received and entertained him, but also accompanied him to the war. Over and besides, as he conducted his army by those passages which were prepared and made open by his brothers journey, and had been at anytime unpassable wilds and craggy fells: so against his coming, the Alps were much more easily, by reason of twelve years continual passage, to and fro those ways, and the nature of the peasants more civil and tractable. For the people before, being not used to any strangers and aliens, nor accustomed to see passengers or travellers coming into those parts, were in manner unobedient, savage and wild, and could not away with the society of men. And at the first not knowing whither Annibal intended to go, they supposed that he came for to surprise their holds in caves and rocks, to take their fortresses, and to drive away their people and cattle as booties. But afterwards, the same that went of the Punic war, (wherein now twelve years Italy was plagued and vexed) had taught them sufficiently, that the Alps were nothing but the way for the Carthaginians to travel through. And by this time well they knew, that two most puissant Cities and States, divided and removed one from another by a great space of Land and Sea between, strived together and warred for their greatness and sovereignty. Upon these occasions, Italy, the Alps were open and passable to Asdrubal with ease. But look what time he gained by speedy journey, the same he lost again by stay about Plavinia, whilst he lay there in vain, rather besieging than assailing it. He was carried away with a great passion, that the Town lested upon a plain and champion country, might long before him and with, and the great name that went of that noble Colony, induced him to believe, that by the strength and ruling of that City, he should strike a terror to all the rest. But in lying against that Town, he not only hindered himself much, but also itaid Annibal, who having heard that he was pressed out of the Alps, and come down into Italy, so much sooner than he looked for, was upon the point to dislodge out of his standing wintering camp. For he considered and cast in his mind, not only what a long and tedious piece of work it is to besiege and assault Cities, but also well remembered how himself after his victory at Trebia, assailed to force that colony in his return from thence, but might not prevail.

The Consuls being departed from the City, and gone diverse ways as it were for two sundry wars at once, distracted mens minds with many cares and troublous imaginations, as well it is remembrance of those losses and overthrow, which they had received at Annibal his first coming; as also in thinking, what gods should be so propitious and favourable to the City and empire of Rome, as to prosper the affairs of the State and Common-weal, at once in both places. For until then, their success had been variable and alternative; and their prosperity always delayed with flemishable adversity; and again, their losses were recompensed with equal gains. For when in Italy the Common-wealth of Rome went one way downward heading to the ground at Thrasymenus and Cannae, the fortune was another way in Spain, let it upright again. Afterwards, when in Spain one overthrow and defeat happened in the neck of a nother, at what time as two noble Captains were slain, and two valiant armies in part destroyed; the happy and lucky hand in Sicily and Italy, made up those breaches, and let the reeling line on its foot again. For why? the very distance of the place so far remote (because one of the wars was maintained in the farthest part of the World) yielded time and respite to breath themselves and gather new strength. But now, two wars at once are entertained within Italy, two most brave warriors and renowned Captains enclose between them the City of Rome: all dangers come huddle together; all the heavy load and whole burden beareth upon one and the self-same place and no doubt, but whether of those two Captains first shall get a victory, he will within few days after join his forces to the other. The fresh and lamentable remembrance also of the very last year, wherein two Consuls lost their lives, mightily frightened the hearts of the people. So as, in these perplexities and troubles of mind, it is more over in fong records the Consuls as they departed and went into their several Provinces. It is more over in fong records found, that when Q. Fabius advised and warned M. Livius being upon his journey toward the wars, not rashly and hand over head to give battail to the enemy, before he knew his nature and qualities, he full of anger still and discontentments with his fellow citizens, made this answer, That so soon as ever he could have a fight of his enemies army, he would fight it, and being

At Rome, they were no leſſe terrified and troubled, than they were two years before, at what time as the Carthaginians were encamped before the walls and gates of the City. And men wiſt not well, what to make of this adventurous and audacious journey of the Conſul, whether they that Annibal was dejected and mocked in a matter of so great moment, as to be ignorant what it was become of the General, or of the Army, to which he lay in clove and near encampment. Annibal (thought he) and without all question, he hath received no small toil and overthrow, and in this might dareth not make after and follow the Spaniards. Nerva he feared much lest all were lost and gone, and that he should not come time enough to help and succour him: and that the Romans had gotten already the same good hand in Spain, which they had before in Spain. Other whiles he was persuaded, that his letters never came to Annibal his hands; that they were intercepted, and so the Consul made halt to prevent him, and give him the fall by the way. Being perplexed with these careful cogitations, he called the fires to be put out, and as the signal given at the first watch to run up his baggage, and to dislodge, and on gone. In this fearful halt and nightly tumult, the golden whiles they were sleepily looked unto, and small heed was taken of them, one of them lay down and rested close in a secret lurking hole which he had before defined in his mind; the other waded over the river Megris, through the floods that he was well acquainted with, and to go away and made an escape. So the army left at random without their guides, first wandered over the fields, and then diverse of them being weary and sleepy with overwatching, laid them down along here and there, and left their colours with few about them. Annibal commanded them to march along the bank of the River, and to follow it, until the day-light might direct them the right way: and to go, a compass in hand, and according to the winding teaches and cranks of the River, wandered a great while, and gained but a small ground forward. Now when day light once appeared, he purposed to file out the fifth place for convenient passage and there to get over. But finding no floods, by reason that the river it was from the Sea; the higher were the banks from the water that kept in the River, he sent all the live-long day, and gave the enemy time to follow after him. And first Claudian Nero came with all the Horleimen, then Porcius followed hard after with the vapouriers, and light armed footmen. Whilest he made offer to charge their enemies in their march, every way, and paid it till upon them, in so much as now Annibal leaving to journey forward (wherein he seemed rather to flee than march) was desirous to take a little hill along the river side, and there to encamp and fortify: Livius was come also with all the main power of footmen, so armed and so orderly appointed and marshalled, as they were not only provided to march in journey, but ready also presently to give battle. But when they were all joyed together, and arranged in battail array, Claudian kept the leading of the right wing. Livius commanded the left, and the Pretor took the charge and conduct of the main battail. Annibal seeing no other remedy but to fight, never fortified his camp; but in the fore-front before the vanguard, and in the very mids, placed his Elephants: about them in the left wing he opposeth the French against Claudian: not so much trusting upon them, as supposing verily that the enemy was afraid of them: and in proper person he took up the right wing against Livius for himself and the Spaniards, in whom (being old beaten fouldiers) he reposed his most hope. The Ligurians in the mids were bestowed behind the Elephants. But the battail was rather drawn out in length, than stretched forth in breadth: The Frenchmen were defended with the hill that bare out over them. That front which the Spaniards kept, encountered with the left wing of the Romans. And all the battail of the right side, which bare out from the conflict, stood still and fought not. The hill that was opposite against them, was the cause that neither afront, nor as flank, they could charge upon the enemy. But between Livius and Annibal there was an hot fight begun already, and cruel bloudshed on both sides: There were both the General Captains: there was the greater part of the Romans, as well foot as Horse: there were the Spaniards, old and experienced fouldiers, skillfull also in the Roman manner of fight: there were the Ligurians, a tough nation, and hardy in fight. Against this battail were the Elephants turned, who at the first shock and onset troubled and disordered the vanguard, yea, and began to force the ensignes to give ground. But after upon the noise that grew greater, and the battail that waxed hotter, they began to be unruly, and traveres between both battails, as it were doubtful to whether side they belonged, much like to ships left hulling and floating without their pilots and steers men. Then Claudian cried out loud to his fouldiers: To what end, quoth he, made we such post halt, and took so long a journey? But seeing that he laboured in vain to advance his banners and mount up against the hill opposite unto him, and perceiving that way how it was impossible to come unto the enemy and to enter upon him, he drew forth certain cohorts out of the right wing where he saw they were liker to stand still than to fight, and wheeled about behind the enemies battail, and so upwars not only to the enemies, but also to his own men, he charged upon the left flank of the enemies: and he bestirred himself so nimbly, that when he had shewed himself on the sides, presently he paid upon their backs: in such sort, that now on all hands, afront, behind, and on their flanks, down went the Spaniards and Ligurians and were hewn in pieces, yea, and the execution reached to the very French. There, with them was leashed, and smallest fight of all: for a great many of their fellows had abandoned their colours, and being slip away in the night, lay asleep all over the fields: and such as were there, went with travail and watching (as having bodies that of all things cannot away with labour and pains taking) were scarce able to bear their coriaces on their backs. Besides, now it was high noon: and what with drought & heat together, they stood gaping for air, & yielded their bodies either to be massacred, or taken captive. As for the Elephants, there were more of them killed by the hands of the governors and guides that late upon them, than by the enemy that fought against them. For their

A their manner was to have about them a Carpenters chissel and a mallet, and when the beasts began once to rage and to run upon their own fellows, their mallets would set the laid chissel between their ears, even in the very joyn: where the nape of the neck and the head meet together, and with his mallet to drive it as hard as he could: this was found to be the readiest and most speedy way to kill so mighty and huge a beast, when they were past all hope to rule them and keep them in order. And the first inventor and practiser of this feat was Annibal, a famous and memorable Captain, as in many other respects, so especially for this battail. He it was that held out to the end, exhorting his fouldiers to fight, fighting also himself, and adventuring all dangers: he it was, that when his men were weary and drew back (by reason of long toil and labour) incensed them again, one while by fair words and intreaty, another while by sharp checks and rebukes: he reclaimed them again when they were running away: he renewed the fight in divers places when it flaked and gave over. And at the very last, when he saw evidently that the enemy had the honor of the day, because he would not remain alive after to great an army defeated that followed his standard, and were induced by the reputation and name that went of him, he set spurs to his Horse, and rode among the Squadrons of the Roman Horleimen: and there, as be seemed Amilcar son, and Annibal brother, fighting right manfully, was slain. Never during the time of this war in one field were there so many enemies killed: and it seemed now that for losse of Captain and overthrow of army, they might well cry quittance with them for the defeat at Canna. Slain there were 50000 enemies, 6000 taken prisoners: and a rich booty and pillage gained of all sorts, besides gold and silver. Moreover, there were recovered of Roman citizens above four thousand, who had been taken prisoners, and were among the enemies. That comfort they had to make amends for the fouldiers that died in this battail: for they won not the victory without bloudshed in this field, wherein to the number almost of eight thousand Romans and allies together, lost their lives. And the Conquerors themselves had so much their fill of bloud and laughter, that the next morning, when word was brought unto Livius the Consul, that divers Cisalpine Gauls, and Ligurians, which either were not at the battail, or escaped out of the execution, and were going away in one company all together, without a certain Leader, without Ensigns, without any order or command, and might all be put to the sword and utterly destroyed, if there were but one cornet of Horleimen sent out after them, "Nay, quoth he, let some remain alive to tell the news both of our enemies losse and ruin, and of our own virtue and valour." And Nerva the very next night after the battail, marched with more speed backward, than he came thither, and within six dayes returned again so far as to his standing leaguer, and the enemies. All the way as he marched, he was not indeed to recolect unto and frequented by so many men, by reason that there went no hiribingers or messengers before: but his coming was welcomed, with so great gladness and mirth, that for very joy, the people were welner besides themselves. As for Rome, it cannot be uttered and exprelled in words sufficiently, how men were affected the one way or the other: neither how penfive the City was in doubtful expectation of the event, nor how joyous and jocund again, upon the news and tidings of the victory. For never one day (after the rumour once was blown thither, that Claudian the Consul was gone forth in his expedition) from the sun-rising unto the setting, departed either Senators out of the Council-chamber, from attendance upon the Magistrats, or the people out of the Common-hall. The dames of the City, because other help they could yield none, betook themselves to their beads and devotions, and in every Church went up and down, and plied all the Gods with prayers, with vows, and humble supplications. As the City was thus perplexed and in suspense: first there came some flying news, that two Horleimen of Narnia were come out of the battail, and returned to the camp which lay to guard and keep the straits and passages of Umbria, who had brought word thither, that the enemies were defeated. At the first, they rather lent their ears to hear these tidings, than bent their minds to entertain the same as being greater than they might in heart conceive, and more joyful than they could affordly believe: and the exceeding twiftness of the rumor hindered the credit thereof, because it was reported withal, that the battail was fought but two dayes before. Then were letters brought from L. Manlius Acidinus, sent out of the camp, which confirmed the arrival of those Horleimen of Narnia. Those letters were brought through the common place, unto the Tribunal of the Pretor: whereupon the Lords of the Senat were sent for out of the Council-hous. But the people kept such a thrilling and thronging about the door of the Senat, that the messenger could not pass thither, but was baled and pulled by the people, questioning with him, and calling hard upon him, that the letters should be read at the market cross, and in the Koffra, before they were opened in the Senat. But at the last, they were refrained by the Magistrats and caused to void, and hardly could the joy be contained among to unruly people, who had no measure nor rule of their affections. Well, the letters were first read in the Senat, and then in the assembly of the people: and there, according to the divers dispositions of men, some took joy and contentment of mind, as upon a certainty: others would give no credit, before they either heard the messengers speak directly from the Consuls, or saw their letters. After this word came, that there were Embassadors themselves at hand. And then indeed, there ran to meet them, of all sorts, young and old, every one desirous to be the first, to see and to hear these so glad tidings, and they went out so far as the bridge Milvius, and all the way along, was full of people. These Embassadors or messengers, were L. Volumnius Philo, P. Licinius Varus, Q. Caelius Metellus, Who being accompanied with people of all degrees and qualities, that flocked about them, came as far as to be seen on places some H applied with themselves, others of court of their train and retinue, what news, and how the World went. And as any one had caught in and from them, that the army and Captain General of the enemies was slain, or the Roman legions safe, and the Consuls alive and well, he would immediately impart his joy unto others. Much and had they to come into the City, and more ad there was, to keep out the multitude, that they were not mingled among the Lords of the Senate.

 Bill at the letters. Were read in the Senate. From thence were the Ambassadors brought into the general assembly of the people. And Scipio after he had read the letters, explained himself from point to point in order, how every thing was done, with great applause, and afterwards, with a general shout of all the assembly, who hardly could conceive in their minds so great joy.
 Then they ran divers ways, some to the Temples of the Gods to render thanks, others to their I own houses, to communicate with their wives and children to lucky and fortunate tidings: And the Senate decreed a solemn procession for three days together, for which as M. Livius and *C.
 Claudius* the Consuls, with the fathers of the legions had, vanquished the enemies, killed their Generals, and put their army to the sword. This procession, C. Hostilius the Priest, published in the open assembly of the people, and it was celebrated and solemnized, both by men and women.
 All the Temples for three days fully, were likewise replenished with one sex and the other.
 For the Matrons and Dames of the City, in their best apparel, together with their children, yielded praise and thanks to the immortal Gods, as if now they had been freed from all fear, and the war came to a final end for ever. This victory altered the very face and course of the commonwealth, so as from that time forward, as long as called peace, men durst make contracts, buy and sell, borrow and lend, yea, and pay debts to their creditors. Scipio and Claudius the Consuls, so soon as he was entered into the camp again, sent the head of Asdrubal (which he had preserved with great care and brought with him) to be shewen before the Comitia and the Nations of the enemies, and that the African captives, should be shewed bound as they were in chains, and two of them to be kept loose unto Annibal, to declare and recount in order, how every thing happened. Annibal having at once received this double blow, mourning as well for the publick loss of the state, as for the calamity happened in his own house, fetched a deep sigh (by report) and said, Ah, I see well the hard fortune of Carthage. And distressing from thence, because he would bring together all his forces (which being dispersed and under, he was not able to hold and maintain) into the utmost angle of Syrah (the Bruttians country) L he brought thither as well the Metropolitans, even the whole state of them, who abandoned their own Towns and Cities, as also the Lucans, as many as were subject unto him, and under his obedience.

The eight and twentieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the eight and twentieth Book.

T H E prosperous affairs in Spain, under the conduct of Syllanus the Lieutenant of Scipio, and L.
Scipio his brother, achieved against the Carthaginians; as also the acts performed by Sulpitius the Procurator, and Attalus the King of Bithynia (the last) in the quarrel and behalf of the Ætolians, against Philip King of the Macedonians, are reported and set down in this book. When there was a triumph decreed and granted unto M. Livius and C. Claudius the Consuls: Livius, because he N had performed the exploit in his own Province, rode in a chariot drawn with four steeds: and Nero, because he came into the Province of his colleague, in help forward the victory, rode after him mounted on horseback: Howbeit even then, in the habit and manner of triumph, he carried the more glorious, post, and reverence: for to say a truth, in this war he had done more good services than his brother Consul. The five went out in the chapel of Vesta, by negligence of a Virgin, that had the keeping and tending thereof, and looked no better unto it. The said Virgin was well whipped. P. Scipio finished the war in Spain against the Carthaginians, when he had continued fourteen years: and in the first year after that he went from the City of Rome. And having dispersed the enemies quite of the possession of Spain, he recovered it wholly for the Romans. From Tarcon he took two barks, and sailed into Africk unto Syphax King of the Nymidians, with whom he concluded a league. Aidrubal the son of Gilgo, at there with him at one table, and they supped together. He exhibited a game and pastime of word-playing at new Carthage, in the honor of his father and uncle: and the same was not performed by common fencers, and sword-players hired thereto, but by such as either for the honor of their Captain, or to determine some controversy, gave defiance one to the other, and entered the lists in combat. Among whom, we give L. of the country, who were brethren, fought as sharp for the sovereignty of the Kingdom. When the City Alapa was besieged and assailed by the Romans, the Townsmen caused

A caused a mighty pile of wood to be made, and set on fire, and when they had killed their wives and children, they threw themselves headlong into the fire after them. Scipio himself, whilst he lay grievously sick, and this happened by occasion thereof, writing to arise in one part of his army, when he was am-able done, made an end thereof: and compelled the States of Spain (that mutined) to come in and was amed obedience again. There was likewise an amity and treaty concluded with Malmilla, King of the Nymidians:
 who also promised him his aide, in case he would come over into Africk: With the Gaditans also, after the departure of Mago from thence: who had received letters from Carthage, that he should pass the sea into Italy. Scipio, after he was returned to Rome, was created Consul. And when he made sure to have the Province of Africk, Q. Pabius Maximus withstood him: a d so he had the government of Sicily: but with commission to sail over into Africk, in case he thought it good for the Commonwealth. Mago the son of Amilcar from the lesser Baleare Islands, where he had wintered, took the sea and sailed over into Italy.

The eight and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

VV Hich it seemed that Spain was eased as much of war, as Italy charged therewith; by the voyage of Asdrubal thither: behold all of a sudden there arose other troubles there, equal to the former. And as for the Provinces of Spain at that time, they were possessed between Romans & Carthaginians in this manner. Asdrubal the son of Orgo was retired with his power full within the country, even to the Ocean and Gades.
 But the coasts bordering upon our sea, and in manner all Spain bending toward the East, was held by Scipio and subject to the Roman Empire. Hanno the new General, being passed out of Africk with a fresh army, and entered into the coast of Asdrubal the Barchine, joined with Mago:
 and when he had put in arms within a short time, a great number of men in Celiberia, with lieth in the midst between the two seas: Scipio sent forth against him: M. Syllanus made ten thousand foot, and five hundred horsemen. Syllanus made such speed by taking as long journeys as possibly he could (considering how much hindered and troubled he was, both by the roughness of the wayes, and also by the straits, environed with thick woods, and forests, as most parts of Spain are) that notwithstanding all those difficulties, he prevented not only the messengers, but also the very fame and rumour of his coming, and by the guidance of certain fugitive revolts out of Celiberia, he passed forward from thence to the enemy. By the same guides he had intelligence, and was for certain advertised (being now some ten miles from the enemy) that about the very way where he should march there were two camps: namely, on the left hand the new army abovevald of Celiberians, to the number of more than nine thousand lay encamped, and the Carthaginians on the right. As for this Leaguer it was well defended and fortified with corps de guards, which watch and ward both night and day, according to the good order and discipline of war.
 But the other was as much neglected, dilapidate, loose, and out of order, like as commonly barbarous people and raw souldiers are, and such as fear the less, by reason they are at home within their own country. Syllanus thinking it good policy to set upon them first, gave commandment to march under their ensigns and colours, and bear toward their left hand as much as they could, for fear of being discovered in some place or other by the guards and Sentinels of the Carthaginians.
 And himself in person, having sent before certain vanguardiers and epials, with his army advanced space directly toward his enemy. Now he was approached within three miles of them unespied, and not descried at all. For why? a mountain country it was, full of roughs and crags, overpread and covered with woods and thickets. There in a hollow valley between, and therefore secret for the purpose, he commanded his souldiers to sit them down and take their rest.
 In this mean time the epials came back and verified the words of the fugitives aforesaid.
 Then the Romans, after they had piled their packs, their trusses and baggage in the midst, armed themselves, and in order of battell set forward to fight. When they were come within a mile of the enemies, they were discovered by them, who began suddenly to be afraid. Mago at the first outcry and alarm, let spurs to his horse, and rode a gallop out of his Camp to succour. Now there were in the army of the Celiberians four thousand footmen targettiers, and two hundred horse. This Troop being in manner the flower and very strength of the whole army, and as it were, a full and complete legion he placed in the vanguard: all the rest, which were lightly armed, he bestowed in the rearward for to succour and relieve. As he led them forth thus ordered and arranged they were not well issued without the trench, but the Romans began to lance their jav-alins and darts against them. The Spaniards to avoid this volley of shot from the enemies, couched close under their shields, and defended themselves, and afterwards they rose up at once to charge again upon them. But the Romans standing thick, as their manner is, received all their darts in their targets, and then they closed man to man, and foot to foot, and began to fight at hand with their swords. Howbeit, the ruggedness of the ground, as it nothing availed the swiftness of the Celiberians (whose guile is to run to and fro in skirmish and keep no ground) so the same was not hurtful at all to the Romans who were used to a set battell, and to stand to their fight: only the straight room, and the trees and shrubs growing between parted their ranks and files asunder, so as they were forced to maintain skirmish either singly one to one, or two to two at the most: as if they had been marched to cope together even. And look what thing hindered the enemies in their their flight, the same yielded them, as it were, bound hand and foot unto the Romans, for to be killed. Now when all these targetiers were slain, the Celtiberians were slain, their light armed soldiers, and the Carthaginians also, who from the other camp ran to succour, were likewise discomfited and hewn in pieces. So there were two thousand footmen, and not above, and all the horsemen (who scarce began battell) fled with Mago and escaped. As for Hannibal, the other General, together with them who came left, and to the very end of the day, was taken alive. But Mago fled still; and all the Cavalry, with as many as remained of the old footmen followed after him, by the tenth day arrived in the Province of Gades, and came unto Alshubal. The Celtiberians, that were but new soldiers, slipped the next woods out of the way, and so from thence fled home.

Andalusia.

This fortunate victory happened in so good a time, not so much stifled the present war in the very birth, as it cut off the matter and maintenance of future troubles, in case the enemies had been let alone, and suffered to solicit and stir other nations to take arms, like as they rallied the Celtiberians already. Whereupon, Scipio having taken the City, in case Hannibal should not the matter, hope withal to dispatch quite, and make an end of the war, in case Hannibal should not the matter, and made long stay; pursued the remnant behind, and far forward into the utmost Province of Spain against Alshubal. But Alshubal, who hoped that to live encamped in a Belagium for to keep his Allies in obedience and faithful allegiance, all on a sudden dislodged, pluck up (as he kept away) and more like one that fled than marched, led his army further into the country, even as far as the Ocean, and to Gades. But supposing that so long as he kept his forces all together, himself was the only mark which the enemy would shoot at, before that he was driven there, straight to Gibraltar, to Gades, he brake up his whole army, and sent them away betwixt and there to their several Cities, both to save themselves within the walls, and to defend the walls by force of arms. Scipio, so soon as he perceived that the war was thus divided into sundry parts, and that to lead about his forces from City to City, was rather a long and tedious piece of work, than either difficult or much available, retired back. But because he would not leave that country clear in the hands of the enemies, he sent his brother, Laelius, with 10,000 footmen, and 1000 horsemen, to assail the mightiest and wealthiest City in those parts, which the barbarous people call Orcula. This City is seated in the compass of the Metiss (a nation meer Spaniards) the soil fruitful, and the inhabitants thereof find themselves. This was the fortress of Alshubal, and his place of safe retreat, when he made outcrops all abroad into the midland countries of the main, and spoiled the people. Laelius, Scipio having pitched his Camp under the said City, before that he entrenched and blocked the town, sent certain to the gates, who by parling near at hand, might feel and found the dispositions of the Citizens, and perceive with them to make usual of the Roman friendly alliance, rather than their forcible violence. But perceiving by their answers no mind at all nor inclination to peace, he casts a trench, and raised a double rampart about the town, and divided his army into three parts, to the end that one of them should ever follow the assault, while the other twain took rest and ease. And when his first troop and regiment of them began to give a camisado, there followed a fierce, cruel, and doubtful skirmish. For they could not easily either come under the walls, or bring scaling ladders to set to, by reason of the shot that lightly upon them. And such as already had reared up ladders to the wall, some of them were pushed off with certain forks provided for that purpose, others were caught hold of with iron hooks from above, and were in danger to be hung up to the air, hoisted aloft, and seeth over the wall. Seeing that the conflict was unequal, by reason of the small number of assailants, and that the enemies had the advantage besides, in that they fought from the wall top, caused the first regiment to retire, and with the other twain at once gave a fresh assault to the town. This assault greatly a fear into them who were already wearied with fighting, that not only the townsmen suddenly abandoned the walls and fled, but also the Carthaginian garrison footmen, for fear lest the City was betrayed, forsook also their stations and places of guard, and gathered themselves in one place. But then the townsmen were afraid, lest if the enemies put themselves within the City, they should be massacred every where as they came in their way, without respect and difference who were Carthaginians, or who were Spaniards. Whereupon they for one gate open on a sudden, and in great numbers ran out of the town, bearing their targets before them, against the darts that were shot far off, and showing still their naked right hands, in token that they had laid aside their swords. But whether the enemy could not well discern them so far off, or whether they suspected some crafty and deceitful practice, I wot not, but they fell upon their shields and yielded unto them, and slew them down with axes, and to break them open with crow's of iron. And as every horseman got into the City, he rode again according to the direction given by the General into the market place, to be possessed thereof. And to these horsemen were assigned the Triarii for aid and assistance. The Legionary footmen besides ran over all the other parts of the City, spoiling and killing all that ever they met, save such as defended themselves with their armour. All the Carthaginians were taken prisoners, and committed to ward, likewise the townsmen about three hundred, such as had shut the gates; but unto all the rest there was no reward again, and each man had his own goods delivered and restored unto him. There were slain at the assault of that City, of enemies almost two thousand; but of Romans not above four score

As by the winning of the town, they that were employed there took great joy and contentment, so in their return to their General himself, and the rest of the main army, they made a goodly show as they marched with a mighty multitude of prisoners led before them. Scipio having offered his brother in the most honourable terms that he could devise, and namely, for his exploit of forcing Orcula, making him equal in glory to himself for the conquest of Carthage; because whilst drew out, that he could neither give the attempt upon Gades, nor yet follow at once upon the army of Alshubal, so dispersed as it was in sundry parts over the Province, conducted his forces back again into the Province of Spain, that lieth on this side Thenus; and when he had diminished his legions into their several standing camps to winter in, and sent his brother L. Scipio to Rome together with Hannibal the General of the enemies, and other Gentlemen prisoners, he withdrew himself to Tarraco.

In the last year the Roman Armado being set out under the conduct of the Admirall M. P. Valerius, the Pro-Consul, made a voyage from Sicily into Africa, and tormented all over the Territories of Mica and Carthage, inasmuch as they drove booties out of the very utmost confines of the Carthaginians, and even about the walls of Mica. As they failed back for Sicily, they were encountered by the Carthaginian fleet, consisting of seventy long ships of war, whereof eleven were boarded and taken, lost sunk in the deep sea, the rest were put to flight and dispersed. Thus the Roman Captain Valerius, after victories achieved both by sea and land, returned with rich prizes of all sorts to Lilybæum; and hereupon by reason that the seas were open and cleared of the enemies ships, great store and abundance of grain was brought to Rome.

In the beginning of that summer wherein these things shap'd, P. Sulpicius the Pro-Consul, and King Antiochus, after they had wintered in Egina, as is above said, with a joint navy passed over from thence into the Island Lemnos. The Romans were twenty five Gallies of five ranks of oars, and the King had thirty five. Philip for his part because he would be ready at all affairs to meet with the enemy either by land or sea, went himself in person down to the sea-side, as far as Dintheis, and made proclamation, that all his forces should by a certain day meet together at Laurisa. Upon the same that went of the Kings coming, there repaired sundry Embassies from the confederate States of all parts unto Demetrius, for the Etolians having taken heart unto them, as well for the society with the Romans, as upon the coming of Antiochus, waited and peeped their borders. And not only the Acadians and Boeotians, and they that inhabit Euboea, were in great fear, but also the Acheans, whom over and besides the war from the Etolians, Medonides also the Lacedaemonian tyrant terrified, who encamped himself not far from the confines of the Argives. All these States made report what perils were like to ensue both by sea and land to their several Cities, and besought the King his aid. Moreover there came unto him out of his own Realm no good tidings of peace and quietness, for that Scardelus and Phlegrus were gone out and rebelled; and of the nations of Thrace, the Medi especially were ready to invade the frontiers adjoining upon Macedony, in case the King should fortune to be busied and occupied otherwise in any long wars. The Boeotians likewise themselves, and other nations inhabiting the more inland parts of Greece, had given intelligence, that the passages of the torrest

Thermopylae, where as the narrow gullet of the treights yieldeth small passage, were stopped up by the Etolians with a trench and palliads, that it might give no access at all unto Philip, for to come and defend the Cities of the Allies. Thus many troubles coming fast and thick one upon another, had been able to have roused and awakened even a sleepy and slow Captain, and made him to look about him. These Embassadors he dispatched and sent away, promising every one of them help and succour, as time and occasion would permit; and willing them each one for the present to provide those things that were most urgent and important. Then he sent a garrison unto that City from whence new came, that Antiochus having passed with a fleet from Lemnos, had wasted and foraged all the territory about it. And he sent Paphlantes with a small power into Boetia, and Menippus likewise, one of his own Captains and Cavaliers, unto Chalcis, with a thousand targetiers, called Peltati, (now the Phlaeans certain small bucklers or targets, nothing unlike unto the Spanish Cetra) unto whom were joined five hundred Ænians, that they might be able to guard all the parts of the Island; himself in person went to Scorfinia, and there he appointed the Remonstrances that all the forces of the Macadonians should be brought thither from Laurisa. News came unto him there that the Etolians had summoned and proclaimed a general Diet or Council at Heraclea, and that King Antiochus would repair thither to consult about the managing of the whole war. And with an intent by his sudden coming to trouble this solemn assembly and meeting of the States, he took great journeys in his march, and led his army toward Heraclea; but the Council was newly dissolved when he arrived thither. However, he destroyed all the standing corn, which was near-hand ripe, especially in the vale along the Gulph of the Ænians, and to reduce his army back again to Scorfinia; and there leaving his whole power, he retired himself to Demetrius, attended only with his royal guard. And because he might from thence be ready to meet with all sudden hits and invasions of the enemies, he sent out men of purpose into Phocis, Euboea, and Peloponnese, to chuse out certain high places for beacons, from whence the fires might be seen afar off. And himself set up one watch tower upon Cyllarus (a mountain, the top whereof is of an exceeding height) that upon the signal of the beacons on fire from afar, he might in the minute dition of the Orphans and the Oppidum he called from Chalcis to Orvum. And when he had commissioned the government of the State, and the affairs of the City, unto these principal Citizens, who

A next year likewise that the Consuls for the time being confirmed this prerogative choice and election of those gentlemen, with their own assent and authority the morrow after in a frequent assembly before the people, giving honourable testimony of the valiant and faithfull service of those forsaide Lieutenants in that war.

Now the time draw neare of election of new Magistrates; and when it was thought good by the Senat, that a Dictator should call that solemn assembly for the laide election; C. Claudius the Consul nominated for Dictator his Colleague M. Livius, and Livius named Q. Cecilius General of the horsemen. So there were created Consuls by M. Livius the Dictator, L. Varrus, and Q. Cecilius, even he who then was General of the Cavalry. After this, they went to the election of the B. Praetors, and chosen there were, G. Servilius, M. Caelius, Manlius, T. Claudius, Asellus, and Q. Manlius Leptinus, who then was Edile of the Commons.

When these elections were finished, the Dictator having resigned up his office and dismissed the army, by vertue of an act of the Senat, took his journey unto the Province of Tuscania, to sit in commission and make enquiry, what Vases either of the Tulcan or Umbrians intended and plotted to revolt from the Romans, and to turn to Asinibal at his coming into thole parts; and who they were that had assisted him either with auxiliary soldiers, or with victuals, or with any aid and help whatsoever. And these were the acts for that year, as well at home as abroad in the war.

The great Roman Games were wholly renewed and set out again three times by the Ediles of C. the chaif, En. Servilius, Capto, and Sere. Cornelius Leptinus. Likewise the palliames and plaies, called Plebeis, were once illy renewed and exhibited again by M. Sempronius Mato, and Q. Manlius Turpinus Rebules of the Commons.

In the thirtieth year of the second Punic war, when L. Varrus Philz, and Q. Cecilius Marcellus were Consuls, both of them were appointed by the Senat to make war upon Asinibal in the Province of the Bruttii, which done, the Praetors cast lots: And to M. Cecilius Marcellus fell the jurisdiction of the Citizens; to Q. Manlius of the forreigners. C. Servilius his lot was to govern Sicily, and T. Claudius Sardinia. As for the armies, they were divided in this manner: one of the Consuls had the conduct of that which was under C. Claudius the Consul of the year before. The other Consul had the leading of that (namely, two full legions) which C. Claudius the Pro-Praetor before D. commanded. M. Livinus Pro-Consul, whose government was prorogued for another year, received the charge of two legions of voluntaries in Hetruria, at the hand of C. Terentius the Pro-Praetor. And Q. Manlius was appointed by a decree of the Senat to deliver over his jurisdiction to his Colleague, and to take the charge of Gallia with the forces there; whereof L. Porcius the Pro-Praetor was Captain, and he had in commission to waite the lands of thole Gauls who were returned to the Carthaginians upon the coming of Asinibal. C. Servilius was assigned with the power of the two Campan legions, to defend Sicily, like as P. Manlius had before. Out of Sardinia the old army was withdrawn, which was under the governance of A. Hostilius; and the Consuls enrolled one new legion, for T. Claudius to sail over with Quintus Claudius, and C. Hostilius Tubulus, E. had both of them their commissions newly sealed for one year longer, the one to govern *Tar-ra-*num, and the other to rule Capua. M. Valerius the Pro-Consul, who also was Admiral for the sea-coast and river along Stella, was commanded to give up thirty of his sail unto C. Servilius, and withal the chief of the Navy to return to the City of Rome.

As the City was in turbulence and flood doubtfull for the variable event of so great a war, attribution of the causes of the war, and woe of prosperity, and misery to the gods; behold many prodigious tokens were reported to have happened. Namely, That in Tarracina the Temple of Jupiter, and at Saguntum the Chappel of the goddess Minerva, were blasted with lightning from heaven, and the inhabitants of Saturnium were no less terrified with two serpents that were crept into the temple of Jupiter at the very doors. From Antium there was word brought, that the harvest folk as they were reaping, spied certain ears of corn bloudy. At Ceres there was a sow that farrowed a pig with two heads, and an ewe yeamed a lamb both male and female. It was reported also, that at F. Alba there were two lions seen; and at Fregella by night the day-light appeared. Also in the territory of Rome, by report, an Oxe spake; and the altar of Neptunus within the Cirke Flaminia brake out into much fire, and the Temple of Ceres, Salus, and Quirinus were blasted and imitten from heaven. The Consuls were commanded to expiate and purge these fearful sights with sacrificing of greater beasts and to make supplication one day. Which was done according to the decree of the Senat. But above all, the wondrous signs, either reported from abroad, or seen at home, the minds of men were put in fear, for the going out of the fire in the Chappel of Vesta. For, which cause the Vestal Virgin who had the charge that night to look unto it, was by the commandment of P. Valerius the Bishop well and thoroughly scourged. And albeit this happened by humane negligence, and that the gods portended nothing thereby, yet it was thought good that an expiation thereof should be made with greater sacrifices, and a solemn supplication held in the Chappel of Vesta.

Before that the Consuls went forth to the wars, they were put in mind by the Senat to take renewed order for the Regiment, and to procure their reducing again into the country, and placing them in their lands and farms. For seeing that by Gods goodness the war was removed far from Rome and Livinus, the country towns might be without fear of danger inhabited and frequented again; neither was it a meet thing, that they should have more care to inhabit Sicily than Italy.

Italy. But the matter was not easily to be compassed and effected by the people, for that many of the free-holders were consumed up in the wars; and great scarcity there was of servants and hires to till the ground: besides, the cattell was driven away in booties, and the manor houses were either ruinat or burned. Howbeit, a great sort were compelled by the authority of the Consuls to repair again into their country habitations. The motion hereof was first occasioned by the Embassadors of Placentia and Cremona; who made complaint, that their territories were much damaged and wasted by the incursions and rodes of the Gauls their next neighbours bordering upon them; and that many of their own natural inhabitants were fled and gone away, so as their Cities were not well peopled, and their country lay waste and desart. Whereupon Manius the Prætor had commission to defend and guard the Colonies from the enemy. And the Consuls by virtue of an act of Senat made an Edict and Proclamation, that all Citizens of Cremona and Placentia should by a certain day return into their Colonies. And then, they themselves in the beginning of Spring took their journey, and fet forward to war.

Q. Cælius the Cof, received the army of Cl. Nero and L. Veturius of Q. Claudius the Pro-Prætor, and made up the full number of all the companies with those new souldiers whom he himself had enrolled. The Consuls led their army into the territory of Consentia, and having forraged and spoiled there and there, and being heavily laden with good booties, they were in a narrow and freight passage much troubled by the Bruttii and the Numidian archers: in omuch as not only their prizes were in danger to be lost, but they themselves that were armed in some jeopardy. Howbeit, the alarm was greater than the skirmish, and the booty being sent before, the legions escaped safe into places of security. And so from thence they went into the Lucania country. All that X nation without any fight returned under the obedience of the Roman Empire. With Annibal that year was nothing done: for neither he himself made offer of war, upon the fresh hurt and loys received as well in publike as private, nor the Romans provoked him as long as he was quieter. For they were all of this judgment, that there was such mettall and valour in that one commander, although all things else about him went to wrack, that they held it no good policy to provoke him, and wake a sleeping dog. And verily I wot not what to make of him; whether he were more to be wondered at in adversity than in prosperity. For why? warring as he did in his enemies land for the space of thirteen years, so far from home, in such variety of fortune, with an army not consisting of natural Citizens and subjects, but mingled of a confused ill-rat and medley of all nations, having neither the same laws, nor manners, and customs, nor language: differing in fashions, in habit, in apparell, in armour, in rites, in religion, nor serving, as it were, the same gods: he had to knit and united them in one link and freight band, that they mutined neither among themselves, nor against their General, notwithstanding oftentimes there wanted money for pay, and victuals in their enemies country: for default whereof, in the former Punic war, many outrages were committed both among Captains and souldiers. But when Annibal the Captain together with his army was defeated and overthrown, in whom they reposed all their hopes of victory, and when they were fain to quit, as it were, all Italy besides, and to retire themselves into an angle and corner of Bruttium: who would not think it a marvellous matter, that there was no stir nor commotion in his Camp? considering that over and besides all other difficulties, he had no means nor hope else to maintain his army, but out of the Bruttians country: And say, that it were all wholly tilled, sowed, and well husbanded, yet a small thing it was to find and feed so huge an host. Moreover, a great part of their youth was fet away from the tillage of the fields and grounds, and wholly employed in warfare: to say nothing of the natural guile and corrupt usage of that nation, which in time of war was wont to live and maintain the same by robbing and thieving. Neither had he any succour at all sent from home out of Carthage: whyles they all were studious and careful only to keep Spain, as if all had gone well with them in Italy.

In Spain the fortune was in some respect all one and the same, in other far unlike and different: the same, in regard that the Carthaginians being defeated in a fought field, and having lost their Captain, were driven to the utmost coast of Spain, even as far as the Ocean sea: different, in that N Spain is a country more apt and commodious to the reparation of new war, not only than Italy, but also than any land in the world, as well for the site of the region, as for the nature of the people. For although it were the first nation of all the main and continent, that the Romans went first in hand withall to reduce into the nature of a Province: yet it was the last of all others that was subdued, and but lately in our daies even under the conduct and happy fortune of Augustus Cæsar. There at that time, Annibal the son of Gisco, the greatest and noblest Captain in all these wars (next after the Barchin house) returned from Cadix, and hoping by the help of Mago the son of Amilcor to wage war afresh, took musters throughout the farther part of Spain, and armed to the number of fifty thousand foot, and 4500 horse. And as for the Cavalry, all writers in manner do agree: but for the Infantry, some write, there were 70000 brought unto the City Silpia. O There upon the open plains late these two Carthaginian Captains down, because they would not seem to fall off and refuse battell.

Scipio, when news came unto him of so puissant an army levied, supposed that neither with the Roman legions he was sufficient to match such a multitude, unless he opposed the aids of the Barbarous nations, if it were no more but for the new and outward appearance: nor yet was to repose such assured confidence in them, as in the fundamentall strength of his army, that in case they should

A should give him the slip when the time came, (the only occasion of the overthrow of his father and uncle) they might do much hurt to the main chance and totall sum of all. And therefore he sent Sylpium before unto Celera, (a Lord over the lignory of eight and twenty towns) for to receive of him his horse and foot, which he had promised to levy in the winter time. Himself departed from Carthage, and gathered some small aids of his allies that inhabit along the way as he marched, and so came to Castulo. Thither Sylpium brought also certain auxiliaries to the number of three thousand foot, and five hundred horse. From thence he went forward to the City Barula, being in all of Citizens and Allies, with footmen & notemen together, one with another 45000 strong. Annibal, As they were pitching their tents and encamping, Mago and Masani, with all their Cavalry, set upon them, and no doubt, had troubled them mightily as they were making their designs, but that certain troops of horsemen hidden behind an hill, whom Scipio hadily for the purpose had there bestowed, suddenly at unawares ran upon them and recharged them as they were secretly cidden forward without order and array. These had not well begun skirmish with them, but they discomfited the forwardest of them, and such especially as engaged themselves near to the trench, to impeach and annoy the pioneers and labourers at work: but with the rest that kept to their colours, and were orderly in their ranks, the fight was longer, and for a good while continued doubtful. But when the squadrons which stood ready appointed in their guards and stations, were first brought forth: and after them, the souldiers also from their work and fortifications were moved, to take arms: and still more and more continually came fresh and in heart, in place of those that were wearied, so as now from all parts of the Camp there was gathered together a full power, and ran to the battell, wney the Carthaginians and Numidians turned their backs plain and fled. And at the first they went away by troops and companies, keeping their order and array fully, and not disbanded for hattle or flight. But afterwards, when the Romans began one more eagerly to play upon the hindmost of them, so as now their furious violence could no longer be resisted, when without all regard of ranks or files they forgot their array, and ran on all hands by heaps seeking every man the next way he could to escape. And albeit by this skirmish, the Romans were more encouraged agood deal, and the enemies hearts much danted: yet for certain daies ensuing there never ceased exultations and bickering maintained by the horsemen & those that were lightly armed. Now when by these small scuffling they had made stiff, sent trial on both sides of their strength. Annibal first led forth his forces into the field, & then the Romans likewise came forward ready to receive them. But when both armies stood without their Camp, arranged in battell array, & neither of them gave the charge: when the day drew toward intreating, Annibal first retired with his men into the Camp, and after him the Roman General likewise. This continued they for certain daies together. Annibal was evermore the first that came abroad, and the first again that sounded the terror to his souldiers, wearied with long standing. But of neither side they made out to skirmish, or discharged any shot, or gave alarms and let up a cry. Of the one part the Romans, on the other the Carthaginians, together with the Africans, stood in the main battell: and the allies of either side kept the wings, and those were Spaniards, as well in the one army as the other. But in the front of the Carthaginian battell were the elephants placed, who after off made a E show as if they had been Cattles. And throughout both armies this word went for current, that when the time came, they would so fight as they stood day by day arranged namely, that the main battell of the Romans and Carthaginians, between whom was the quarrel & occasion of the war, with like courage of heart and force of arms would encounter and cope together. Scipio perceiving this once to go for good, & to be stilly settled in their opinions, altered all on set purpose against the day that he minded indeed to give battell. And over-night he gave a watch-word and taken throughout the camp, that both horse and man should take their dinner before day, and that the horsemen in arms ready appointed should hold their horses saddled and bridled. Now before it was broad day light, he lent out all the Cavalry together with the light armour, to charge upon the Corps de guard and standing watch of the enemies. And himself straight after advanced forward with the whole strength of the legions armed at all pieces. And clean contrary to the conceived opinion and persuasion both of his own men, and also of his enemies he strengthened the wings with Romans, and marshalled the main battell with the allies. Annibal ran d with the clamour and shout of the horsemen leapt forth of his pavilion, and perceiving a tumultuous alarm and fearful stir of his own men before the rampart and trench, and seeing start off the glittering ensigns of the Legions, and all the plains over-spread with enemies, presently made forth all his Cavalry against the forward horsemen. Himself with the battell of footmen thrust out of the Camp, and made no change nor alteration at all in the marshalling of the battillions, otherwise than he used the daies past. The horsemen continued the fight a long time doubtfully: neither could it be determined by it felt, because evermore, as any of them were put back (which happened on both parts in manner by turns) they retired safely into the battell of footmen. G Now when as the battells were not put half a mile asunder one from another, Scipio sounded the retreat and opened his ranks, and received all the horsemen and light armed souldiers within the middle ward: and having divided them in two regiments, he bestowed them for succours and supple behind the wings. Now when the time was come to joyn in skirmish, he commanded the Spaniards (and those were the main battell) to take fore footing and so steadily together: fair and softly himself out of the right wing (for that point he commanded) dispatched a messenger to Sydacus & Martius, willing them to stretch out that wing on the left hand, like as they saw him him to draw it as length on the right: with direction also unto them, that they together with the light horsemen and light appointed footmen should encounter and close with the enemy before that both battels might meet and joyn together. Thus having enlarged but at full their wings, they with three squadrons of footmen and as many corners of horsemen, together with the light armed skirmishers, advanced with fall speed directly against the enemies whilst the rest followed side ways across. Now there was a void piece of ground in the middle between, by reason that the Spaniards enigs were but slowly forward: and the wings had been in conflict already, when the flower and strength of the enemies battell, consisting of old beaten Carthaginians and African soldiers, were not yet come within the darts shot neither durst they put it to succour them that were in fight, for fear they should open the main battell for the enemy that came directly against them. Their wings were much distressed in the fight on every side. For the horsemen, the light armed soldiers, and the skirmishers, having wheeled about and set a compass to environ their ran upon them on their flanks. The cohorts of footmen charged upon them above, and strove to break off their wings from the body of the battell. And as now in every respect the fight was unequal, so the rabble of camp-followers, Balear Islanders, and raw untrained Spaniards, opposed against the approved Roman and Latine soldiers, pulled down aside. The day went on hill and dale, till his army began to faint: and no marvel, for they were surprised and taken on a sudden, betimes in the morning. So were forced in haste to enter into the field & go to battell before they had refreshed and strengthened their bodies. And to that purpose Scipio had drawn the day on length, & drilled out the time, that the battell might be late. For it was the seventh hour of the clock after noon, before the ensign of footmen charged upon the side points. And a good deal later it was ere the main battels fought and joyned together: so that the heat of the noon in the pain of long standing in a storm, and hunger and thirst came all together to enfeeble and spend their bodies before that they came to hand-strokes and to buckle with their enemies: which was the cause that they stood leaning and resting themselves upon their shields. And over and besides all other troubles, the elephants also affrighted and maddened with this tumultuous and disordered manner of fight of horsemen, skirmishers, and light armed soldiers together, ran from the wings upon the main battell. The Captains therefore themselves, being thus tainted as well in courage of heart as in bodily strength, gave ground and retreated. Howbeit they still kept their straits, as if the whole battell had retired whole and found by the commandment more forward to charge upon them more hotly on every side, because they saw them to lose their ground and shrink back: so as their violence could not well be endured: then albeis Afrubal held them still together, and did what he could to stay their flight, crying offensives aloud unto them, that there were hills behind them, and places of safe retreat, if they would retire in good sort, moderately, and in order: yet when they saw their enemies press so hard upon them, killing and hewing in pieces those that were next unto them, fear was above shame, and so immediately they flew their back parts, and ran away all at once as fast as they could. Yet at first, when they came to the root and foot of the hills they began to make a stand, and rally the soldiers again into order of battell, seeing the Romans to make some stay of advancing their ensigns up the hill. But afterwards, when they perceived them to come lustily forward, they began again to flee a fresh, and so in fear were forced to take their Camp. Neither was Scipio himself far from their trench and rampier; but in that very brunt had been master thereof, but that immediately upon the hot gleams of the sun, when he shined in a watery sky full of black and rainy clouds, there poured down such a store of showers and tempests, that hardly could he himself after his victory recover his own camp. And some there were also that made it a scruple and matter of conscience to attempt any more for that day. The Carthaginians, although they had great reason to repose themselves, and take their necessary rest, so wearied as they were with travel, and sore wounded, especially seeing the night was come, and the stormy rain continued: yet, because their fear and present danger wherein they stood gave them no time to loyler and slack their business, against the next morning that the enemies should early assault their Camp, they gathered up stones from out of the vallies near about them, and piling them one upon another, amended the height of their rampier, purposing to defend themselves by the strength of their fence, seeing small help and remedy in force of arms. But the falling away of their Confederats was the cause that their departure and flight from thence, seemed more safe than their abode there would have been. This revolt was begun by Alanes, a great Lord of the Turdetans: for he with a great power of his followers and retainers fled from the Carthaginians to the adverse part. Whereupon two strong walled towns, together with their garrisons were yielded by the Captains unto Scipio. Afrubal therefore, fearing lest this mischief might spread farther, now that their minds were once set upon rebellion, dislodged about the midnight following, and removed. Scipio so soon as he was advertised at the break of the day, by those that kept standing watch in their stations, that the enemies were gone: having sent his horsemen before, commanded the standards and ensigns to be advanced, and led so speedily a march, that if they had gone straight forward and followed their tracks directly, they had no doubt overtaken them: but believing certain guides, that there was a shorter way to the river Batis, they were advised to charge upon them as they passed over. But Afrubal seeing the passage of the river stopped against him, turned to the Ocean: and even at the first they departed in great haste as if they fled, which was the cause that they got the start of the Roman legionary footmen, and won a good space

A space of ground before them. But the horsemen, and light appointed footmen, plied one while upon their tails, flanked another whilst their sides, and by this means with charging and recharging they wearied them and tailed their march. And when as upon many of their troubles by the way, their ensigns were fain to stand, and forced to maintain skirmish, some time with the horsemen and sometimes with the light javelotters and auxiliary footmen behind the legions also came on apace and overtook them. Then there was not so much fighting and resistance, as massacre and slaughter of them: down they went with them and killed them like sheep. So long, until their Leader himself began to flee, and escaped into the next mountains, together with 7000 half naked and unarmed. All the rest were either slain or taken prisoners. Then the Carthaginians began to encamp and fortifie in all haste and tumultuous sort upon the highest mount they could find: from whence (by reason that the enemies had assailed in vain to get up the hill, having so difficult an ascent) they had not so much ado to defend themselves. But the place being bare and naked, and disurnished of all commodities for their relieve, they were not able to hold out the siege for a few daies. And thereupon the soldiers fell apace to forsake their own Captains. And to go to the enemy. So that at the length the General himself in the night season abandoned his army and having got shipping (for the sea was not far off) he embarked and fled to Gades, Scipio being advertized that the Captain of his enemies was fled, left with Syllanus ten thousand footmen, and a thousand horsemen to continue the siege of the Camp. Himself in person with the rest of his forces within seven daies returned to Taracoon, for to examine and hear incontinently upon his Carrival the causes of the Princes and States: that upon the true estimate of their defects they might be rewarded or chastised accordingly.

After his departure, Masanissa having had secret conference with Syllanus, about inducing his people also to be pliable and to hearken unto a change, passed over into Affrick with some small retinue. At which present time verily the occasion of his sudden alteration was not so evident and apparent, as afterwards his most constant truth and fast allegiance observed unto his dying day was a good proof and argument, that even then he entered not into this designment and action, without good and important cause. Then Mago, in those ships that Afrubal had sent back, passed over to Gades. The remnant, thus forsaken of their Captains, some by way of voluntary yielding and raising themselves to the adverse part, others by flight, were scattered among the next Cities, and no troop remained of them behind of any mark and reckoning to speak of, either for number or strength. In this manner, and by these means especially were the Carthaginians driven all out of Spain, by the conduct and happy fortune of P. Scipio, in the thirteenth year of the war, and in the sixth of Scipio his government in that Province and command of the army. And not long after Syllanus returned to Taracoon unto Scipio, and brought word that the war in Spain was fully ended. And L. Scipio was sent with many noble persons captives, as a messenger to carry tidings to Rome of the conquest of Spain. And when all other took full contentment and infinite joy at the news, and abroad in all places highly magnified the glory of this service, he alone who was the man that did the deed (as one who had an insatiable desire of virtue and true honour) made but small reckoning of the recovery and winning of Spain, in comparison of those matters that he hoped for, and conceived in that high and magnanimous spirit of his, which he carried with him. For now he cast in mind and aimed at the conquest of Affrick and great Carthage: and therewith, to make perfect and consummate that glorious war to his own immortal honour and renown. Add therefore, supposing it was now a good time to begin the way to those high exploits, and to lay plots, to prepare beforehand, yea, and to win unto him the hearts of the Princes and nations, he determined first of all other to found and ally King Sphax. This Sphax was King of the Masafis, a people bordering upon the Moors, and abutting upon that part of Spain especially where new Carthage is situate. At the same time the King was in league with the Carthaginians: which Scipio supposing that he would observe no more surely and precisely, than commonly the Barbarians use, (whose fidelity dependeth upon Fortune) sent C. Lelius with rich gifts and presents, as an Orator to treat with him. The barbarous Prince was glad hereof, both because the Romans then prospered every where: and also the Carthaginians in Italy lived by the loss: and in Spain went down to the ground, where they had nothing left: and thereupon he condescended to entertain the friendship of the Romans. But for the confirmation of this amity, he neither would give nor take assurance, but only in the personal presence of the Roman General himself. So Lelius having obtained the Kings royall word and warrant that Scipio might come unto him with safe conduct and security, returned unto Scipio. Now for him that aspired to the conquest of Affrick, it was a matter of great consequence and importance in all respects, to make himself sure of Sphax, the most mighty and puissant King of that Land, who had aforetime made proof what the Carthaginians could do in war, and the confines and marches of whole kingdom lay fully upon Spain, and but a small arm of the sea between, Scipio thinking it therefore to be a matter worth the adventure with great hazard, (for otherwise it might not be) leaving for the defence and guard of Spain L. Marius at Taracoon, and M. Syllanus at new Carthage, (whether he had travelled by land from Taracoon, and taken great journeys himself and Lelius together, looted from Carthage with two great Catvels of five banks of oars, and passed over into Affrick, through the calm and still sea, most of all rowing, and otherwise also making sail with a gentle gale of wind.

Happy it so fell out that the very same time Afrubal, driven out of Spain, was entred the haven with seven galleies of three courses of oars, and rid at anchor near unto the shore for to be let a land. When he had a kenning of the two Carvels aforesaid, which albeit no man doubted but they were enemies, and might have been boarded by them being more in number, before they could gain the rode; yet hereupon ensued nothing else but a tumult and hurry among the mariners and fouldiers together, in vain preparation of their ships and their armour. For the wind being somewhat big and high, drave the Carvels with full sail out of the main fea into the haven, being further dealing within the Kings Rode. So Asdrubal first let a shore, and within a while Scipio and Laelius landed, and went all to the Court. Syphax took this for a great honour done unto him (as indeed it was no leis) that there were come to him at that time, and in one day two Generall Captains of two most mighty and puissant States, to sue for peace and amity with him. He invited both of them friendly, and gave them entertainment: and since it was their fortune to enter under one roof, and the lame house for to be lodged in, he endeavoured to draw them to a parley, and to make an end of all quarrels, grudges, and controversies between them. But Scipio denied flatly, that either there was any private malice or hatred between him and Asdrubal, that should need an end with conference and speech: and as for State-matters, he might not treat with a professed enemy as touching them, without expreis warrant and commission from the Senate. But when the King laboured greatly with him that he would find in his heart and not think much to bear Asdrubal company at meat and meal, because he would not seem to exclude either of them from his board, he yielded thereunto, and was content. So they supped both twain together with the King, and Scipio and Asdrubal sat both at one table in one meis, and upon one bed, for so it was the Kings pleasure. But so courteously Scipio behaved himself (as he was a man that naturally knew how to carry himself with a grace and dexterity in all things, and in every place wheresoever he came) that by his fair language and eloquent speech, he won not only the favour of the barbarous Prince Syphax (who before was not acquainted with the Roman fashions) but also the good will and love of Asdrubal, a most malicious and mortal enemy: who seemed to have him in more admiration upon this one meeting and communication in presence personal, than for all his feats of arms achieved in war, and made no doubt but reckoned fully that King Syphax and his Realm would presently be at the devotion of the Empire of Rome. Such a singular gift had that man to win love and favour, and to solace himself with walking along wandering at a venture, nor as a traveller to see countries, and to solace himself with walking along the pleasant and desirable coasts, leaving the Province which he had newly subdued, leaving his armies which he commanded, sailing thus with two ships only into Affrick, and committing himself unto an enemy country, and into a Kings hands, of whose fidelity and protection he had no self experience: but no doubt upon some great hopes to compass the conquest of Affrick. And this was it that long since Scipio had in secret purpose and designment, this was it that openly he fretted and formed at, namely, that he warred not himself as well in Spain as Annibal in Italy. Well, Scipio having concluded a league with Syphax, departed out of Affrick, and notwithstanding he was tossed upon the sea with variable winds, and those for the most part boisterous and raging, yet upon the fourth day he arrived at New Carthage.

As Spain generally was at peace and rest for any Carthaginian war, so it was well known, that certain particular States, in regard that they were touched with the guilt of trespasses committed, were quiet for fear, rather than for any loyall allegiance. Of which the most notorious as well for their own greatness and power, as for their fault and transgression, were Illurgum and Cassula. The Cassulonians had been Roman Confederates in time of prosperity, were revolted unto the Carthaginians, upon the defeat of the two Scipios and their armies. The Illurgians besides their revolt and rebellion, added this wickedness, in that they betrayed and murdered the Romans who fled unto them for succour after that overthrow. These two nations, if Scipio at his first coming had proceeded in rigour to revenge, while the States of the country stood in suspense he should have regarded their desert more than his own good and commodity. But when all troubles were composed and reduced to quietness, he thought it then a convenient time to punish and chastise them accordingly. And therefore he called L. Marius from Taracum, with a third part of his forces, and sent him to assaile Cassula. He himself with the rest of the army marched toward Illurgum, and within five daies presented himself before it. The gates he found shut against him, and all preparation and furniture for defence and to withstand the assault. For their conscience bare them witness what they had deserved, and there needed no other defence or incitation of war against them than the privy of their wicked fact. Hereupon Scipio took occasion to exhort his souldiers, and began in this wise. "The very Spaniards themselves, quoth he, by putting their gates declare plainly what they justly are to fear: and therefore ye ought to war with them in more hostile malice and deadly hatred than with the Carthaginians. For with them the quarrel was maintained, as it were, without anger and rancor, only for their cruelty glory: but of these men ye are to take vengeance for their disloyall treachery, for their cruelty and wicked villany. And now the time is come, to revenge not only the unworthy death of your fellow souldiers, but also the like insult prepared for your selves, in case your hap had been to have fled for refuge thither at any time: yea, and to shew exemplary justice to all posterity,

A posterity, that no man hereafter be so heady as to wrong any Citizen or souldier of Rome, in what poor state so ever he be, without fear of condign punishment. Upon this exhortation and comfortable words of the Generall, they belittled themselves and divided the scaling ladders amongst choise men out of every company. And having to parted the army between them, that Laelius the Lieutenant had the conduct of the one half, they gave assault with great terror unto the City in two places at once. But neither any one generall captain, nor any principal Citizens encouraged and heartened the townsmen manfully to defend their City, but only their own fearful and sinful consciences for they wilt well and remembered, yea, and put one another in mind, that it was their punishment and not victory that the Romans sought for. And as for themselves, since they were to lose their lives, this was the only point that they were to consider upon, namely, where they were best to die, whether in fight and in the field (where the fortune of battail was common, and oftentimes lifted up the conquered, and put down the conqueror) or after their City burnt and laid, to yield up breath in the sight of their wives and children taken captives amid the torments of whipping and hard irons, when they had endured all villanies and indignities. Whereupon not only the servicable youth for war, not only men I say, but women also and children, even above the bodily strength of that age, or courage of that sex, were ready and presented themselves to defend the wals. Some brought weapons to the defendants, others carried stones up to the wals unto them that were fortifying and repairing the breaches. For why? they stood not upon their liberty alone, which whetted the stomacks of valiant and magnanimous men only, but they set before their eyes all extremities of torture and punishment, yea, and the shamefullest death that could be devised: and their hearts were incited to undergo all pains and peril, by striving avie together, and seeing one another to hazard themselves. In so much as they stood to it, and fought so resolutely, that even that noble army which had subdued all Spain, took the repulse often times at the hands of the youth of one City, was driven from the wals, and finally to their honor received some foill in fight and began to fear. Scipio seeing that, and doubting lest upon so many bootlesse attempts the enemies might take heart and his own souldiers be tainted, thought good to enter himself personally into the action, and to take part in that dangerous service. Having re-embled therefore his men for their cowardise, he commanded the ladders to be brought and set to, threatening that himself would scale the wals, if the rest made basting and thus drew back. With that he made no more ado, but approached under the wals in great peril of his person. Whereupon the souldiers respecting the dangerous state of their Generall, and fearing greatly of his behalf, set up a shout on all hands, and began to rear ladders in many places at once. Laelius likewise on the other side plied the assault and gave not over. Then at last the townsmen, for all their resolute resistance, were overcome; the defendants overthrowen and beaten from their standing, and the wals possessed by the enemies. The castle also on that side which was thought impregnable, was in that brant and tumult taken. For there were certain Africans serving then among the Romans (fled before the enemy) who whiles the townsmen were wholly turned to defend those places that seemed to be expoied unto danger, and the Romans climbing and entering where they could, espied one part of the City much higher then the rest, which because it was compassed about with an exceeding high rock, was neither fortified otherwise with bulwarks, nor manned with any defendants at all: and being men (as they all are) light and agile of body, and nimble by reason of much practice and exercise, they climbed up the rock where they could meet with any crag therof to bear out unequally from the rest, and to yield them hold and footing: but when they came to a plumb upright steep place, and where the cliff was even and smooth, they talked certain great iron spikes and nails, which they carried about with them of purpose, and stuck them a pretty distance asunder, like greces and stairs to climb upon: and ever the foremost plucked him up by the hand that followed next, and the hindmost heaved up those that went before them, until they were gotten up to the top; and then they ran down with an outcry into the City, which was already won by the Romans. Then it was well seen that they forced this City from very desperate anger and deep hatred. There was no thought of taking any prisoners alive, there was none that once minded any pillage, notwithstanding all lay open unto them for to be ransacked and rifled. But down they went with the unarmed as well as the armed, killed men and women one with another: nay, their cruell mood was such, as they spared not the sucking babes. Then they let fire on their houses: and what the fire saved they rated and pulled down: so canered a mind they had, and so bent they were, to leave no monument and token of such a City, and utterly to abolish and root out the memorial of those enemies.

After this, Scipio led his army against Cassula. This City was defended not only by Spaniards who thither were repaired out of others parts, but also by the reliques of the Carthaginian army which were scattered abroad in their flight, and thither fled. But ere Scipio was come before the City, they had heard the news of the wofull calamity and destruction of the Illurgians: by reason whereof they were all terrified and in despair of themselves: and as it falleth out in such variety of causes and deserts every man sought means to shift for himself the best he could, without regard of his neighbour. And at first they began to have a feere jealousy and suspicion one of another, but afterwards they brake out to open dissention: in somuch as the Carthaginians and Spaniards divided themselves, and parted asunder. Cerdubellus openly advised the Spaniards, and persuaded with them, to yield. Himilco was the Captain over the Auxilliary Carthaginians,

when doubtful & suspicious rumours were spread of their General, how he was in danger of death, H but long before, upon a licentious course of life that they had taken to, and so much the rather, for that now in time of peace they were held in, more freightly and neatly, who before were used in their enemies land, during the wars, to break out in more loose manner, and to live upon rapine and robbery. At the first they began to mutter and whisper secretly these and such like speeches :
If there be war still in the province of Spain, what do we here among peaceable people ? And if the war be ended, and the time of the commision come out and expired, why are we not had again back into Italy ? Then they proceed to demand their pay very malapertly, and more loudly than might stand with the duty and modesty of soldiers : yea, and the Sentinels and corps de guard would not stick to give reproachfull terms and railing words to the Tribunes or Marshals, when they went the round : and some of them made no bones to enter by night into the peaceable territory about them, for to fetch in booties and prizes ; untill at length openly at noon day, they departed from their colours without passport and licence. All things they did as transported away with lust and self-will of soldiers, not guided by the order and discipline of warfare, nor directed by the commandment of their captains and rulers. Nevertheless, there was retained still a form of Roman camp among them : and that upon this only hope that the soldiers had of the Tribunes fore said : whom they supposed in time would come to the bent of their bow, enter into to the same furious courses, and have their hand in the mutinies, and follow them in their rebellion : and therefore they were well content with them to sit judicially in Marshall court, in the usual place of Principis to minister law and execute justice : also to call for the watchword and sign-all of them, yes, and orderly to go to their watch and ward in their course and due times, And K whereas in very deed they had cast off all reverence and obedience of government, yet they would seem to shew a kind of loyal and dutiful diligence, in that (forsooth) they would be commanders of themselves, and keep some order without constraint. But in the end the mutiny broke out into open sedition : namely, when they perceived once, that Tribunes misliked and reproved their doings and endeavoured to cross their designs, yes, and denied flatly and openly to take part with them in their follies and furious outrages. Whereupon they dethroned the Tribunes of their judicial places in the Principis, yes, and dispossessed them quite of all room in the camp, and by a general consent conferred the sovereign rule on two common soldiers, the captains of their seditionous commotion, Albius Caelius, and C. Arrius Puster. Who not contented with the * marks and ornaments of the Tribunes, were so bold as to handle the rods and axes, even the very toll enigns of sovereign rule ; never thinking how those knives of rods, and axes sticking within them, which they caused to be born afore them to the fear of others, were ready to light upon themselves, to scourge their backs and sides, and to chop off their own heads not long after.
The supposed death of Scipio, whereupon they vainly built, was it that blinded their wits and minds : upon the rumour whereof, being already noised abroad, they had no doubt, but all Spain generally would be up in arms. In which garb and hubbubly, they made reckoning, that they might levy monies of the confederat States, and spoil and pill the Cities neer unto them. And amid these troubles, when all were in an uprose, and every man would venture to do every thing at his pleasure, then they supposed their own deeds and actions would be lesse scised and marked.
Now when as they looked every day still to hear fresh newes, not of his death only, but also of his funerals ; and seeing there came none at all, but rather, that the former tidings were checked, and proved but a flying tale without head or foot, then they began to make semblance of enquiring after, & seeking out the first authors who raised those false reports : then they seemed to be angry also and offended with them, to the end, that they forsooth might be thought rather to have believed things inconsiderately, than to have devised such a matter themselves purposely. These leaders and captains thus disappointed and abandoned, began now to dread and stand in horror of their own enigns of magistracy that were carried before them, and in stead of that imaginary rule which they usurped, they feared greatly, that the very edge indeed of the true and lawfull power of authoritie would be shortly turned upon them. As the sedition was thus dashed, by occasion, that it was credibly and for certain reported, first, that Scipio was living ; and within a while after, that he was recovered and in health : there came seven Tribunes or Colonels, sent from Scipio himself. At whose first arrivall at the camp, the soldiers grew more angrie and wailpish then before : but anon upon fair words and speeches, wherewith the Colonels entertained those of their acquaintance, with whom they had communication, they were well contented and appeased. For first they went about to their pavilions from one to another, and afterwards to the Principis and the Pretorium, where they hapned to spie some knots of soldiers met together and talking one with another : and so spake unto them, as if they rather questioned with them what the cause should be of their anger and suddain commotion, then blamed them, or laid any action to their charge. The reason commonly pretended, was this, that their wages was not duly paid at the day. Besides, they alleged, that whereas at the same time, when upon the treacherous fact of the Illiturgians, there followed the losse and death of two Generals, and the defeat of their two armies, they by their virtue had defended the Roman name and honour, and likewise kept the province to their behoof, the Illiturgians had indeed received compensation for their offence and trespass, but there was none that had requited and recompensed them for their good service accordingly. Believe me (say they again) your complaints are just and requests reasonable, and we will make relation thereof to the Lord General :
and glad we are in our hearts, that it is no worse, and that the case is no more insurable then it is for

A for God be thanked, P. Scipio and the common-weal, are both sufficient and also willing to make you amends for all.
But Scipio, a man though siled to the wars, yet altogether unacquainted with storms of soldiers was much troubled in spirit and perplexed, for fear the army might exceed measure in transgressing or himself pass his bounds in punishing for the present he thought good to deal gently with them till, as he had begun, and sent abroad the collectors about the Tributary Cities to gather up the revenues, thereby to put them in good hope of pay, and that with speed. And hereupon there went out an edict and proclamation, that they should repair to Carthage, there to call for their wages, either by companies apart one after another, or altogether in general, whether they would themselves.
B And now by this time, the sudden pacification of the Spaniards that were about to rebel, hilled the sedition of the soldiers quite, which of it self began to cool and slake already. For Mandonius and Indibilis, after it was reported that Scipio was alive and lively, gave over their enterprise, and were retired again within their confines. So as now the soldiers had neither Citizen nor forreiner to take part with them in their folly & furious rage. And when they had calt all about what course to take and what shift to make, they found no other evasion, but the most common refuge and retreat of all Jewel counsels and bad desigments, even to commit themselves either to the just wrath of their General, or else to his clemency and mercy, whereof they were not past all hope and in utter despair. For why ? he had not pardoned even the very enemies, with whom he had fought in battell. And as for their mutiny, it was as yet without bloodshed, and no hurt C done : and as it self was not cruel and outrageous, so it had delivered no extreme and rigorous punishment : thus reasoned they and comforted themselves, as naturally men are too prompt and eloquent, to exonerate, to palliate and cloke their own faults, more I wot, then they should. This was their only doubt, whether they were better to go by cohorts and squadrons, or all at once to command their pay. In the end they were of opinion, that the safer way was to go all in one train.
At the very same time, whilst they among themselves laid their heads thus together in the camp, there was a council held at new Carthage about them, and much dispute there was, and variety of opinions, whether they should proceed against the heads and Captains only of the seditious (who were in number not above five and thirty) or by cutting off the greater sort to punish this so odious example and precedent of a rebellion rather then a mutiny. But the milder sentence took D place, namely, that from whence the offence began, there the punishment should rest. And for the multitude, some chastisement and rebuke was sufficient for their correction. When the Council was dismissed and broken up, to the end that it might be thought abroad that they sat about nothing else but this which they pretended, they published an edict throughout all the army in Carthage, for an expedition or journey against Mandonius and Indibilis : and gave commandment to make provision of victuals for certain daies. And those seven Tribunes, who had before gone to Suero for to appease the mutiny there, were now sent to meet that army again : and having five names apiece given them of the principal authors of the fore said tumult, they had a direction unto certain meet persons for the purpose, to shew them good countenance, to speak fair unto them, and courteously to invite them home to their houses, and afford them kind and friendly entertainment ; and after they had made them good cheer and brought them to bed, to take them being fast E asleep upon their libell drinking of wine, and to bind them sure hand and foot Now when they were not far off from Carthage, they under stood by those whom they met and encountered upon the way, that all the whole army, was the next day following to set forth against the Lacians :
which tidings not only rid them of all fear, which secretly surprised and possessed their minds, but also made them exceeding glad and joyous, for that they supposed their General being now left alone with their forces, they might do with him what they would themselves, rather then be at his commandment and devotion. And about sun-setting they entred the City, and perceived the other army providing and making all ready for the voice above named. Received they were and welcomed with gentle words, devised and framed on purpose : namely, that the L. General F took great joy and contentment for their coming, for that they were come so just before the setting out of the other army : and so they went to repose and make much of themselves. And without any stir and tumult at all, the ring leaders of the sedition, were by the means of those Tribunes entertained and lodged in the houses of certain persons of good behavior and meet for that purpose, and there apprehended and imprisoned. At the relieve of the fourth watch, the carriages of that army, whose expedition was pretended, began to set forward on the journey : and somewhat before day the standards and enigns advanced, but the whole army was detained and staid at the gates, and certain warders sent to keep all the passages and wayes, that no man should go as forth of the City. Then were those soldiers who came the day before summoned to an assistance : and they ran boldly into the market place to the Tribunal of the General, (as if G with their outcries and clamours they would have put him in some fear and dread of them. And at one time both the Lord General himself in person ascended up the Tribunal, and with all the armed soldiers were brought again from the gate, and enclosed round about at their backs the unarmed multitude gathered together to hear an Oration. Then were they damed, as lustily as they were before, and all their courage cooled : and (as they confessed afterwards themselves) nothing terrified them so much, as the healthful strength and fresh colour of the L. General beyond all their expectation, whom they thought verily to have found sick and cratie : yea, and his countenance and face to vigorous and courageous, as they never remembered to have seen him so lusty in any battell before. For a while he sat still and said never a word, until he was advertised that the Captains of the mutiny were brought into the place and all things else in readines. Then after silence made by an Oyez of the cryer, in this wise he began and said,

"I would never have believed that I should have wanted words, and proper language unto mine own army: not because I have exercised my self at any time rather to make eloquent speeches than to manage valiant actions, but for that being always from mine infancy almost trained up in the camp, I have been acquainted with the natures and humours of soldiers. But in what manner I should speak unto you, neither my wits will give me advice, nor my tongue afford me utterance: you, I say, whom I wot not to much as by what name to call. Should I term you Citizens, who have revolted from your native country, or soldiers, who have renounced your Generall, refused to be under his command, his charge and government, and made no conscience to break the oath of your allegiance? Left of all, should I give you the name of enemies? Now surely, me thinks I agnise the bodies, the faces, the apparel and habit of mine own natural Citizens: but contrariwise, I see plainly the deeds, the words, the intents and minds of arant enemies. For what have ye wished and hoped for else, but the Illegates and the Caracenes have done the like? And yet I must needs say, that they had to follow for their captives in their outrage, Mandonius and Indibilis, two Princes of royal blood: whereas you imposed the sovereign command & government upon Vmber Arius, & Calenus Albinius, two base companions. Denie it now hardly if you will, that you all either were in the action, or willing in the intention. Verily I can easily believe you in to disavowing, and namely, that all this proceeded from the folly of some brainick fellows among you. For the trespasses committed are of that quality and consequence, that if the whole army were therein culpable, the expiation & purging thereof could not be procured without great sacrifices and exquisite punishment. Full against my will I touch these points, as sores and galls that will not abide the rubbing: but unless they be touched and handled too, they cannot possibly be cured and healed. I assure you, for mine own part, I thought verily that when the Carthaginians were driven out of Spain, there was neither place nor person throughout the whole province, that had envied my life and health: such hath been my carriage, and so have I demeaned my self not only with Allies, but also with enemies. But see, how much I have been deceived! even in mine own campe the news of my death was not only received with joy, but expected also with a longing desire. I speak not this, that I would have any man to imagine that I conceive, how all in general are guilty of this fact (for if I were per-faded in my mind, that my whole army wished my death, I would here die presently before your eyes; for what good would my life do me, repined of my soldiers and fellow Citizens?) But the multitude of every people is like the seas in nature: which of themselves are unmovable, and stir not as the winds blow, as the gales go and come, so are they either calm or troubled, serene and quiet: and even so the cause and source of all this fury and outrage, is in some few heads and leaders. As for you, ye have caught the infection from them, and plaid the fools with them for company. Surely I am thus perfwaded of you this day, that ye know not yet, to what enormous height of folly ye have proceeded: what mischievous act ye were entred into against mine own people: what you attempted against your native country, your wives and children: what you entertained against the gods and witnesses of your loyal oath: what ye have done against the sacred auspices and happy fortune, under which ye have served in warfare: what ye have committed against the custome & law of war, against the discipline of your ancestors: & finally, how prejudicial and offensive your designs have been against the sovereign majesty of the Roman empire. As for my self, I am willing to say nothing: content I am to think, that ye rather gave credit to my death rashly and inconsiderately, then hearken thereto willingly and greedily. And it may be, that I have behaved my self, that no wonder it is, if mine army be weary of me and of my government. But what harm hath your country deserved at your hands which to betray, ye should complot with Mandonius & Indibilis? How hath the people of Rome offended you, that you have deprived the Kn. Marshalls and Colonels created by the voices of the people, of their lawful rule and authority, and conferred the same upon private persons? And being not therewith contented, to have and acknowledge them for your Colonels: you, even you the army of the Romans, have taken the knitches of rods belonging only to the General, and bestowed them upon those that never kept so much as a bondslave of their own to command. Albins and Arius forsooth, set up their pavilions in that chief place and State in the camp, where the sovereign magistrat ought to quarter: with them the trumpet sounded: from them the signall and watch-word was demanded, they sat as judges in the Tribunal seat of Scipio the Pro-consul: upon them the Licitors and Sergeants attended: for them they made way & voided the place, against they should go forth & march in their state: and before them were the rods borne, and the axes withall. When it rained stones, when thunderbolts are shot, when lightnings flash from heaven, when beasts bring forth strange, uncouth, and monstrous young ones, contrary to the course of nature, you take them for prodigious signs and fearful tokens. Nay this is a monstrous sight and wonder in deed, which by no sacrifices of beasts, by no supplications and prayers, can be purged and expiat, without the blood of them that have committed so heinous a fact. And albeit no wicked crime can be founded upon any reason, yet would I gladly know of you (as in a case that indeed should not be once named and remembered)

A "what was in your mind? what imagined you? and what was your designment? There was in times past a legion sent to Rhegium, there to lie in garrison. Traitorously and villainously they murdered the principal citizens there, and for ten years space possessed and kept that wealthy town to their own behoof. For this notorious and heathily fact the whole legion, even four thousand men and no fewer, were in the market place of Rome beheaded every one. And yet they at the first followed not for their captain Arius Vmber, little better then alander, der, skulian, and follower of the camp, a man of an unlucky and unfortunate name, but Decimus Junellus, a Tribune or Kn. Marshall: neither joyed they with Pyrrhus, nor with the Samnites and Lucans, professed enemies of the people of Rome. Whereas ye, have plotted in council, and meant to have banded in arms together with Mandonius & Indibilis, their purpose was to have heated themselves for ever in Rhegium, like as before them the Campanians, who took Capua from the Tuscans, the old inhabitants: and the Mamertines likewise; who possessed themselves in Stellio of Messana, and never minded to molest and make war either upon the people of Rome, or any of their allies and confederats. But tell me I pray you, intended ye to have made your continual residence, and to have dwelt at Suerot where if I your General at my departure out of the province, when my time and commission was expired, should have left you behind me, ye might have cried out upon me, and called for vengeance to God and man in regard of hard measure and wrong offered unto you, in that ye might not be permitted to return home to your wives and children. But alas, wife and children were clean excluded out of your minds: ye thought no more upon them, then of me or of your native country. Well, I will follow on still, and discourse upon your plot and designs, wicked and ungracious though they were. Yet haply not altogether to foolish and forth in the highest degree as may be supposed. I imagined ye being eight thousand men in number, (and say that ye were all of better account & reckoning then Albins & Arius are, under whom ye submitted your selves) to have been able for to defeat the people of Rome of the province of Spain so long as I lived, and the other army I stood bound and strong: wherewith in one day I forced new Carthage; with which I discomfited, put to flight, and chased our Spa, four brave Generals, and as many puissant armies of the Carthaginians? But let that go by, and to say aside my name, and to speak of no more abuse but this, that ye were very credulous and quickly believed that I was dead. How then? what if I was departed this life and gone indeed? Had the common wealth together with me yielded up her ghost? Would the main state and empire of Rome have lain to the ground with me at once? Forth (O Jupiter, almighty and most gracious) that ever a City founded first most happily, with the approbation of the gods, built eternally for ever to endure, should be compassed and made but equal with this frail and mortal body of mine. Flamininus, Pantus, Gracchus, Posthumus Albinus, M. Marcellus, T. Quintus Crispinus, Cn. Fulvius, two Scipios, my father and uncle both, so many noble warriors and captains have been slain in this one war; and they are dead and gone: yet the people of Rome continue on foot and overlive them, yea, and shall still, when a thousand more of them shall die, either upon the edge of the sword, or upon some sickness or other. How should then the state of the people of Rome be entered & buried with the dead corps of me, but one man and no more? Even you your selves (to go no farther to seek examples here in Spain, when my father and uncle two Generals, were killed, chole Septimius Martius for your captain, to lead against the Carthaginians, being in the ruff and jollity of their fresh and late victory. I speak now, as though if I had miscarried, Spain had been left delitute and without a Commander and General. M. Syllanus who was sent with me in the province, joined in the same commission and of equal authority; L. Scipio my brother, and C. Lalius, both Lieutenants general: would these have fit still and done nothing? would these have failed to maintain and recover the majesty of our empire? What could ye have compared army for army, captains for captains with them? was either your reputation and credit, or your quarrel and cause comparable? And suppose that in all these regards, ye have been superior and gotten the vantage, would ye indeed with the Carthaginians, have born arms against your native country against your fellow citizens? would ye in very truth, that Africk should have commended Italy, and Carthage the City of Rome? And for what demerit and great trespass, I pray you, that your country had committed? Corneilius long ago, being wrongfully condemned and unworthily banished, seeing himself to live a miserable exiled man, was moved to take arms and to come against his country to assail it. A private regard of love and natural kinde, reclaimed them from publick parricide. But what grief of heart, what fit of anger hath indeed and provoked you? Set case your wages was paid later by some daies, whilst your General lay sick; was that a sufficient cause for you to give defiance to your country & proclaim open war against it? was that enough to cause you to revolt from the people of Rome, and turn to the Illegates? and to spare no law of God and man, but to break all and make shipwrack of conscience and common honesty? now surely, soldiers, ye were out of your wits, and fools as ye were in the highest degree. I was not my self farther out of frame and sicker in body, then ye were in your mind and understanding. I tremble to think upon it and to rehear, what folk believed, what they hoped, what they wished. Let all be forgotten and buried in oblivion, if it be possible: if not let us not speak of it yet, however we do, but rake it up in deep silence. I cannot deny, but my words have seemed sharp and bitter unto you, and all this my speech very rigorous. But how much more cruell think ye are your deeds, then my words tart and sour? And if ye deem it reasonable, that I should bear & put up the things that ye have done, will ye not abide them

* Arius Vmber: alluding to Atreus, black and Umbra a dark shadow.

"and take in good part, and patiently to hear me to tell all that I can say. But these matters I will H "lay no more in your dish from henceforth; ye shall be checked no more for them. Would God ye "could as soon forget them, as I will put them out of my remembrance. And therefore as touching
 "you all in general, if ye repent and be displeased with yourselves for your fault, and folly, I shall "be content and think you punished to the full. But as for Adrius Calpurnius and Arrius Pudentius, "the rest of the authors of this cursed and detestable mutiny, they shall make amends for their "treachery and transgression, even with their heart-blood; and they shall surely die for it. The "spectacle of their exemplary punishment ought not to seem unto you grievous and odious, but "rather a pleasant and delectable sight, if ye have any grace in you, and be come again to your right
 "wits. For their intent was to hurt and do mischief to no man alive, more than to your selves."

He had scarce made an end of his speech, when all at once, according to the order given beforehand, there was presented to their eyes and ears a terrible and fearful object on all sides. For the army which had environed the assembly round about clattered their swords & bucklers together.
 The common cry was heard to cite by name all those that were condemned there, in the presence of the whole audience. Stripped they were naked, and haled forth in the midst of them all, and every thing brought out at once for to accomplish the execution. Thus were they bound to the stake, whipped with rods, and their heads chopped off. So benumbed they were all and astonished for fear, that were present at the sight, thereof, that there was not heard amongst them all one shrill & hard word, in milking the rigor of the punishment, no, nor so much as one groan or fetter sigh. Then their bodies were all drawn at one side, the place was made clean, & purged & all the soldiers were called by name & each one according as he answered to his name, had his wage get truly paid. This was the issue and final end of the soldiers mutiny, which began at Sucri.

At the same time, Captain Hannibal by Mago, from Gades with a small power of Africans, solicited the Spaniards about the river Baetis, for money, to rebel and put in arms upon a four thousand able men. But afterwards he was forced by L. Marcius to quit his camp, and having lost the greatest part of his men in the very tumult of taking the camp, yea, and some in the flight, whom the horsemen pursued in chase and slew as they ran struggling, himself with few others escaped away. While these things happened about the river Baetis, Laelius in the mean time having passed through the Straights into the main Ocean, arrived with his army at Carteia. This is a City standing on the sea coast bounding upon the Ocean, even in the mouth of the river, where it first openeth from the Straights into the broad sea. Now there was some hope (as hath been aforesaid) to gain the City of Gades without any assault, by treason, for as much as there came some into the Roman camp, that of themselves made offer and promise thereof. But the treason broke forth too soon and was revealed before it was ripe, the conspirators were all apprehended, and sent by Mago unto Adherbal the Pretor, for to be conveyed to Carthage. And Adherbal having embarked those traitors in a Caravel or Gallion of five banks of oars, and sent her ashore, because she was slower of sail than those of three banks; himself with eight three-banked galleys, followed a pre-ty way also. The said Caravel of five oars of oars, was not so soon entered the Straights, but Scipio also being embarked in another Caravel of the same sort, made out of the haven of Carteia with seven Gallies of three ranks of oars and invited Adherbal and the fore-said Gallies supposing verily, that the enemies Caravel being taken tardy in the very current, was not able against the tide to retire. Adherbal being thus surprised on the sudden, for a while stood in fear and doubt what to do; whether he had best to follow on after his own Caravel, or turn the prow and beaks of his galleys, and make head against the enemy. Thus while he stood at a bay lingering, he lost the opportunity of shifting and avoiding a battell: for now they were come within the dart shot, and the enemies on every side were ready to charge. And the current was so strong, that they were not able to rule and manage their ships as they would. But the manner of fight was nothing at all like to a sea-battell, for as much as they could do nothing to their mind, nothing by skill and dexterity, nothing by counsel and advice. The nature onely of the narrow sea, the violence of the current was in all, and ruled the conflict, driving the ships one against another, as well upon their own fellows as upon their enemies: notwithstanding they rowed and laboured what they could to the contrary. So as one while ye should see a ship that fled and scudded away, whirled about back again with a witness by the waves, upon those that had her in chase: and likewise another that seemed to follow and pursue after her enemy, if she hapned once into a contrary course of billows, to turn top and tail, and seem to flee. And in the very conflict it so fell out, that when as one vessel ran with her beak head full butt upon another, she was forced by waves to turn her side, and receive in her flank the push of her enemies. And contrariwise, when as one with her flank opposite to the enemy, suddenly all at once she should wind and whirle again upon her prow. As the galleys fought thus doubtfully together, hap hazard, at the pleasure and will of Fortune, the Roman Caravel (where it because of her weight she was able to stand more steady against the surging billows, or by reason that she had more ranks of oars that cut the waves, and so was more easily ruled) chanced to sink two of the smaller galleys of the enemies; and running fast by one with a forcible violence wiped away clean all the oars of one side, and had no doubt spoiled and marred all the rest that she would have invited and charged upon, but that Adherbal, with the other five made sail, and got over into Africk. Laelius having sailed back to Carteia with victory, and heard what had been done at Gades, namely, how the culprit of betraying

A betraying the Island was disclosed, the conspirators sent bound unto Carthage, and consequently all their hope frustrate and turned to nothing upon which they came to Gades; dispatched messengers to L. Marius, giving him to understand, that unless they meant still to lie before Gades, trifling away the time and doing no good, the best way was to return unto Scipio the lord General; and so with the content of Marius both of them within few daies repaired to Carthage. Upon whose departure Mago had not only a time to breath himself being frightened as he was with a double fear both by land & sea; but also hearing that the Illegers were revolted, conceived some hope to recover Spain again, and addressed his courriers to the Senat at Carthage: who by relating not only the civil mutiny that arose in the Roman camp, but also the rebellion of the confederates (and all by way of amplification and enforcing every thing to the highest degree) should encourage and exhort them to send aids for to regain the dominion of Spain, left unto them by descent over their ancestors. Mandonius & Indibilis who were retired for a time into their confines, untill they knew how the sedition sped and what was the issue thereof, rested still in inopine. For if the natural citizens had their trespass forgiven, they made no doubt themselves but they might be pardoned also. But when it was published abroad how severely and sharply they were punished, they supposing their own transgression to deserve the like punishment, solicited their own people again to take arms: and thus having levied and assembled the same power of aids which they had before, they passed into the Sedetan's country, where at the beginning they lay in standing camp, being in all 20000, and 2500 horse strong.

C Scipio after he had soon reconciled and won again the heart of his soldiers, as well by making true payment of their wages, to the faulty and innocent alike, as also by shewing a loving countenance, and giving friendly words unto all indifferently; before he did lodge and removed from Carthage, assembled them all together to an audience. "Where he inveighed bitterly and at large against the fallhood and treachery of the lords of the country that rebelled: and protested before them all, that he went not now to be revenged of them for their wickedness with the same mind, wherewith lately before he had cured the folly, and reformed the error of his natural citizens: for then quoth he with grief and groans, and with tears like as one that rent and cut his own bowels, I expiated and purged either the inconsiderate folly, or the wilful malice of eight thousand men, with the head of thirty persons: but now I go with joy and glad heart, yea, and with a resolution to execute and massacre the Illegers. For neither are they born in the same land with me, nor linked now in any society at all unto me: the only bond of faith and amity which was between us, that they have themselves first impiously broken. But in my own army, besides that I see they are all either Roman citizens or else allies, and thole not Aliens but meer Latins:
 this doth me good and moved me much, that there is not among them so much as one soldier to speak of, but was brought out of Italy either by mine uncle Cn. Scipio (who was the first of the Roman name that came as L. Deputy into this province) or else by my father who was Consul, or last of all by my mine own self. They are every one of them well acquainted & inured with the name of Scipio, and tied to their fortune and government: whom I gladly would conduct home safe with me to deserved triumph, and whom I hope to find ready to assist me with their favour when I stand for a Consulship, as if it were a matter that concerned the honor of them all in general, as well as mine particular. And as for the expedition now in hand, whosoever taketh it to be a war, little remembereth the noble acts by me achieved: for surely I make more reckoning of Mago and his exploits, who is fled with a few ships as it were out of the compass of the world, in an land environed with the Ocean sea, then I do of the Illegers. For there in that place is not only a Carthaginian captain, but all the Carthaginian forces and strength that now remain. Here are none but thieves and robbers, and their leader: who peradventure may be of some power and sufficiency to forage the fields, to burn the houses, to drive away some cattell of their neighbours, but to come to hand-to-strokes in a set fight and ranged battell, they are of no valour and worth at all: who no doubt will come into the field, trusting upon their good footmanship to run away in the rout, more than upon any force of arms to maintain the fight.
 F And therefore I have thought good to put down and suppress these Illegers, before I depart out of the province: not for any present danger at all, or fear of greater war that I see may spring from thence; but first and principally, that I to ungracious and wicked a rebellion should not remain unpunished, and next because it might not be said, that in a province so subdued, as well by singular prowess as rare felicity, there was left one enemy behind of the Romans. And therefore in the name of the gods follow after me, not so much to make just war (for ye are not to deal with enemies any way comparable unto you) as to take vengeance of wicked men, and to punish graceless persons. When he had finished his speech, he dismissed them, with commandment to G be ready the next morrow to put themselves in the journey; and after that he set once forward, by the tenth day he came to the river Iberus, and when he had passed over, within 4 daies more, he encamped in the sight of his enemies. Now there was a plain there, environed round about with mountains: into which vale between, he caused the cattell (and those were for the most part driven out of the enemies country) for to be put forth to graze and all to provoke the anger of the fierce and savage enemies: and lent out withall, the light appointed archers to guard them: he took order besides, that when there were one in skirmish with the vanquishers of the enemies, Lae-lius with his Cavalry should closely from some covert place give sudden charge. And for this purpose, there was a hill that bare out handiomey to hide the ambush of those horsemen.

"fear of any danger from thence. We see before our eyes their City rated at whose infatigation & whom for to gratifie. Annibal before had said Saguntum and ought their lands now we gather rents and revenues: which contenteth our hearts not so much for profit & gain, as for quittance and revenge. In consideration and regard of these benefits and good turns, which be such, as greater we cannot hope nor wish for at the hands of the immortal gods, the Senat and people of Saguntum hath sent us ren here in Embaslie unto you, for to give you thanks in their name; & with all joy & congratulate in your behalf for the happy hand ye have made, and the fortunate exploits ye have achieved these last years past, as well in Spain, as in Italy; namely, that ye have subdued, and do hold in possession all Spain, not only so far as to the river Iberus, but even to the lands end, and the utmost point lying upon the Ocean Sea, And as for Italy, ye have left no more ground in it, for Annibal and the Carthaginians, than they emale within the compass of I french and ramparts. Moreover, we have in special charge, not only to render thanksgiving there- to for almighty and most gracious Jupiter, the patron of the fortres, and Castle of the Capitol, but also to offer & present unto him (if it might stand with your good grace and liking) this golden crown; and to set it up in the Capitol, in token and memorial of Victory. Which we humbly beseech your HH. of your favour to grant unto us; and moreover, (if it please you) to ratifie and confirm for ever by your authority and approbation all those benefits, franchises, and privileges, which your Generals have of their goodness vouchsafed to endow us with.

The Senat made this answer to the Saguntin Embassadors. "That both the raising and also the tearing again of Saguntum should be a memorable example to all nations, of the faithfulness, and alliance, observed both of the one part and the other inviolate. And whereas their Generals had re-edified the City of Saguntum, and delivered the Citizens thereof from servitude and bondage, they had therein done well and truly, and by direction according to the will and pleasure of the Senat. And whatsoever else was performed by them to the good and benefit of the Saguntins, the Senat stood willing and contented therewith, and gave order therefore. As for their present and oblation, good leave they had to bestow it solemnly in the Temple of the Capitol. After this order was given, That the Embassadors should have their lodging appointed them, and presents sent unto them, and all other entertainment at the charges of the City; yea, and by way of a reward, an allowance of no less than ten thousand Asles apiece.

Then were the other Embassadors admitted into the Senat-houle, and audience given them. Also the request of the Saguntins was granted to go and see Italy for their pleasure, so far forth as they might with security of their persons; and certain guides were assigned to conduct and accompany them, with especial letters also directed unto all Cities and towns, for to receive the Spaniards friendly, and give them courteous entertainment.

These things done, the Senators sat in consultation about the state and common weal, & treated concerning the levying of new armies; the distribution of the Provinces. Now when as the common brite went that P. Scipio was destined & named to a new province of Affrick, & all men gave out with open voice, that he was the man to be sent thither directly, without asking lots for the matter; & himself besides not resting content now with men glory, said openly, that he was declared Col, not only for to maintain war but also to finish and make an end thereof, once for all which could not be effected by any other means, unless himself in person made a voyage with an army into Affrick; protesting moreover, That if the Senat crossed and gaind this design of his he would propound it to the people, and carry it away clear by their voices: whiles the principal LL. and ancients of the Senat were nothing pleased with this resolution of his, but durst not say a word and speak their minds, either for fear, or for courting of him, in hope of preferment; only Q. Fabius being demanded his opinion, spake to the matter in question to this effect.

"Right honourable and my LL. of the Senat, I know full well, that many of you here attempted are of this mind & verily periwaded, That we are let this day to no purpose, but even to confute & debate of a matter clearly determined; & that in vain he shall spend words, who shall deliver his advice of the Province of Affrick, as of a point as yet doubtful & not resolved upon already. For mine own part, first I cannot conceive neither will I enter into my head, how Affrick can possibly now be accounted as a Province, & assigned certainly unto your Col, (let him be a man right hardy, & of as much valour as may be) considering, that neither the Senat unto this day hath judged it; nor the people ordained & assigned it to any person in the nature and name of a Province. Furthermore, if it were so indeed without all peradventure: then in my judgment the Col, hath done amiss, who in making fembance to put a matter for to be debated, which is already agreed upon, hath deluded and mocked the whole Senat, and not the Senator, who in his course delivereth his opinion of the thing in question. But I am assured, that in gainfaying and crossing this hally voyage into Affrick, I shall incur the sinister opinion & surmise of two things: the one is of my usual lingring and slow proceeding in all mine actions (a course that naturally I am given unto) which young men may term at their pleasure, timorousness and laziness; but so long as I have no cause to repent therefore, I pass the less. For surely hitherto the advices of others have ever at the first light made a goodlier hear, and seemed more honourable: but by experience, mine own waies have sped better, and been found in the end more effectual. The other is, of backbitting, detraction, and envying at the glory and reputation of the Col. a man of singular prowess (I must confess) & whom I see to grow from day to day in greatness and honour. From which jealousie and suspicion, if neither my life passed and the carriage of my self; if neither my

"Dictatorship with five Consulships, nor so much glory which I have acquired as well in managing the affairs of war abroad, as of civill policy at home (that a man would think I should rather be glutted therewith than desire any more) be able to clear and assuage me; yet my years at least will free me from my very son? When I was Dictator, in the vigour and and him, who is not of equal age with my very son? I was Dictator, in the vigour and flower of my strength, in the very course and train of my greatest and bravest exploits, no man either in Senat or in the assembly of the people, heard me to refuse or deny. That my own General of Cavalry, who could not afford me a good word, but ever railed at me, (a thing that was never heard before) should be made equal with my self in command and government. And yet by good deeds rather than by fair words, I effected and gained thus much in the end, that he, who in the judgment of others was matched with me and made my fellow, confessed within a while himself to be my inferior. Let reason have I then now, after I have gone through all degrees of honors and dignities, to enter into contention & emulation with a young gentleman, of all others at this day most flourishing in the eyes of the world: unless forthwith it bea likely matter that (a man weary not only of managing affairs, but also of this world, and of this life) should look to have the Province of Affrick offered unto me, if it were once denied him, Nay verily, I have enough already: in that glory I am content to live and die, and seek for no more. It was sufficient for me to hinder Annibal from achieving the victory to the end that by you, who now are gallants in the belt of your strength, he might be vanquished & overcome. Meet it is then and great reason O. P. Cornelius, that you should bear with me and hold me excused, if I, who never in regard of mine own self set greater store by the fame and opinion of people, than of the good of the Common-weal prefer not now your glory before the weal-publike. And yet I will not say, but in case there were no war at all in Italy for the enemy of that quality, as by conquering of whom there were no credit & honour to be gotten: then that would seek to keep you still in Italy, were it never so much for the good of the State might seem to go about to disappoint and frustrate you (in putting you by the charge of the war) of the very means and matter of your glory and renown. But seeing that Annibal is your object, seeing he is our enemy, who with an entire army still holdeth Italy, as it were besieged now these fourteen years will you not, O. P. Cornelius, hold your self well contented with this honour and reputation. That you being Consul, should drive that enemy out of Italy, who hath been the cause of the death of so many brave men of ours, and of so many foils and overthrow that we have received: that, like as C. Lucius had the name of finishing the former Punic war, so you may win the title of ending this other also. Unless that a man would say that Annibal was a warrior and Captain worthy to be preferred before Annibal; or that war of more importance than this: or that victory greater and more honorable than this is like to be, in case it happen that we may be conquerors under your conduct, and whiles you are Consul. Whether would you chuse rather to have drawn Annibal away from Drepanum & the mountain of Eryx, than chased and hunted the Carthaginians and Annibal out of Italy? Nay surely, even your own self (howsoever you embrace glory already won than hoped for hereafter) would not take more joy & contentment, and triumph rather for freeing and delivering of Spain than Italy from the wars. Annibal, Twot, as yet is not come to that low ebb, nor so down the wind, but that he which made choice of another war, may seem well in so doing to stand as much in fear and dread, as in contempt of him. Why then address you not your self to effect this imprese, and leave building these Castles in the air, and hope by fetching these reaches and this compals, & going the longest way about, that when you are passed over into Affrick, Annibal will follow you thither: and not rather go the next way to work, and fight with Annibal where he is, and make no more ado? Are you willing indeed and desirous to win this honour of dispatching quite the Punic war? Why, it is the course of nature to defend and make sure your own before you go in hand to assaile the dominions of others. Let us have peace first in Italy before we make war in Affrick: and let us first rid our selves of fear ere ever we take occasion to put others in fear; unless we had some greater quarrel. And if by your conduct and fortunate government, both these may possibly be effected; conquer Annibal here, and then go thither to assaile Carthage a Gods name, But if the one or the other of these victories must needs be left for new Consuls to achieve: as the former of the twain will be the greater and more memorable, so it will open the way, and give the overture unto the other, then ensuing upon it. For at this time, over and besides that our treasure, and all the revenues and finances of our state, are not able to maintain and wage two sundry armies both in Italy and in Affrick: besides I say, that we want the means to keep two Armados afloat, and have nothing left sufficient wherewith to furnish them with victuals and munition: who leeth not I pray you how far we engage our selves in peril and danger by this enterprise? P. Lucius shall war in Italy, and P. Scipio in Affrick. What will ye say if Annibal, (which God forbid, & my heart even dreadeth to prelate, but that which once hath happened may happen full well again) upon the ground of some new victory, fortune to go forward and assaile the City of Rome? Where are we then? Shall we have time then to tend for your Col, out of Affrick, as we did for Q. Fabius from Spain? And what say you to this besides. That the fortune of war is doubtful & uncertain even in Affrick, as well as in other places: Call to mind, and learn betimes by the examples of your own house and family, by your father and uncle: who within 30 daies were slain, & their armies defeated: even there, where for certain years space they had performed both by sea and land most

"unto you. Do you indeed trust Syphax nor rely upon the Numidians? Well, let it suffice that I
"we trusted them. Rash adventures speed nor always best. And oftentimes we see, that fraud fe-
"meth faithfull, and maketh way of credit in small things, that in matters of greatest importance "and when the time serveth it may pay home and work a mischief with a witness. The enemies
"overcame not your father and uncle by force of arms before that the Celtiberians our Allies "over-raught them by falshood and treachery: neither were your self in so much danger from "Mago and Asdrubal the chief Captains of your enemies, as from Indibilis and Mandonius, your "new friends and confederates. Can you repose any confidence in the Numidians? You, I say that "have experience of your own souldiers mutiny, and have seen them rise against you: As for Sy-
"phax and Masaniassa, as they had rather themselves be the sovereign & most mighty in Affrick, M
"than the Carthaginians should: so surely they wish the Carthaginians to be the highest above "all others besides their own selves. Now at this time there is some emulation and heart-burning "among them, and all occasions of quarrell where they on to maintain sides and factions, so long "as fear of forrain enemy is far enough off. Shew them once the Roman arms and forces, let "them see an host of strangers once, they will run I warrant you altogether then, as it were to "quench a common scarefire. You shall find, that the very same Carthaginians will far otherwise "stand to the defence of the wals of their Country, their Cities, the Temples of their gods, their "Altars and private houses, when going to battell they shall have their fearful wives to bear them
"company, their small children to go afore them in their eye: you shall find them, I say, stick be-
"tar to it than they did in the quarrell upon the confidence of the generall concord of Affrick, of "finding themselves strong enough upon the confidence of their own wals, should fortune
"the fast fidelity of the confederate Kings, of the strength of their own wals, should fortune
"shew themselves, when they shall see Italy destitute of your help, and disarmed of their forces, ei"ther to make out a fresh army from Affrick and send it into Italy, or else give order and directi"on to Mago (who as it is well known for certain, is departed with his navy from the Balear "Islands, and lyeth floating and riding continually upon the Alpine Ligurians) for to joyne his "power with Annibal: It is a clear case, that we shall be in as great trouble, and as much affright-
"red then as we were of late, when Asdrubal mounted over the Alpes, and came down into "Italy. Asdrubal, I say, whom you (that will with your army compass not only Carthage, but also "all Affrick) let go out of your hands, and suffered to pass over into Italy. But you will say, that O
"you have vanquished him, say you so? I would not for any thing, not only in regard of the love
"I beare to the Common-weal, but also of the affection that I carry toward your self, that a van"quished man could find the way by you into Italy, be content & suffer us to attribute all things "that have gone well with you or the Common-weal, during the time of your government, to "your wisdom and policy; and contrariwise, whatsoever hath fallen out crose and adverse, to im-"pute and assign the same to nothing else, but to the variable events of war, and to fickle fortune. The

A Under their hand: & decreed it was that they two, namely L. Veturius & Q. Caecilius, should either
"The better and more valiant that you are, the more need hath your native Country, yes, and all
"Italy besides, to keep you still at home with them, to brave a captain, or rare a Protector. You
"annot your own self dissemble the matter, but confess, That wheresoever Annibal is, there is "the very head, the fort & strength of all this war; for as much as you pretend, that the only cause
"why you would pass into Affrick, is to draw Annibal thither after you. Well then, he is here or "is it there, with Annibal you must have to do. Tell me then, whether are you like to be stronger
"affric your self alone, or here where your own forces and the power of your Colleague shall be "joined together? Is it possible that even the late example of Levinus and Clautius, so fresh in "memory, should not inform and teach us, what difference there is between the one and the o"ther? In whither place I pray you, will Annibal be more strong in men and munition, here in the "utmost corner & angle of the Brutians Country, where this long time he hath waited in vain for "aid from home, where he hath sent for succour and gone without, or near unto Carthage, and in "the midst of Affrick among his friends and allies? What kind of policy is this of yours, there to de"cide the quarrell and try the whole matter, where your own forces are as lesse by a halfe moiety, and
"the power of your enemies much greater and stronger, rather then here, whereas you may "fight with the power of two armies against one, toiled out of heart in so many battles, and wea"ried with long warfare, so tedious and grievous withal? Consider with your self, what comfort-
"mity and remembrance there is, between your designs and your fathers. He, as Consul having "made a journey into Spain, to the end that he might encounter Annibal as he came down the Alps, "returned out of his own province into Italy: and you, when Annibal is in Italy, purpose to a"bandon and leave Italy. And why? forsooth not because you judge it good for the common-weal,
"but because you think it an enterprise that may import you in great honour and glory: like as
"when you being captain Generall of the people of Rome, left your province at random, and your "army at six and seven, without warrant of law, without order or act of Senat, hazarded in two "bottoms the whole state and majesty of the Empire of Rome; which at that time together with "the danger of your life, incurred the perill and jeopardy of the maine chance. To conclude, for "mine own part (my LL. of the Senat, I am of this mind, and this is my conceit, that P. Cornelius
"was not created Col. privately for himself and his own behoof, but for the good of the common"weal and us all: and then the armies were levied and enrolled, for the guard of the City and de"fence of Italy; and not for the Col. in their proud self-conceit & overweening of themselves.
D "after the manner of absolute KK to transport & lead into what parts of the world they list them"selves. When Fabius by this oration (premeditated and framed to the time) had through his autho"rity and the long settled and confirmed opinion that men had of his wisdom, drawn unto his side "and the grave counsell of the old man, above the lully and youthful courage of the other gallant:
"then Scipio by way of answer made these remonstrances, and spake in this wise. "My lords of the
"Senat, even Fabius himself in the beginning of his oration, said very well, that his opinion which "he was to deliver, might be suspected of detraction and envy. Or which note, verily I distrust not "my self to tax and accuse a man of his quality and reputation so much, as methinks is not so well "cleared as it ought to be the very suspicion it self: and I wot not whether it be a default of his "speech & oration, or that the thing it self is so pregnant. For in such manner he exalted with good"ly words, and magnified his own dignities and renowned deeds, and all to quench the jauntie
"and envie of envy: as if my self was to fear the danger of emulation and concurrence of some "company of the basest degree and condition and not of him; who because he far surpasseth other "men, (which height and pitch of honor I deny not, but I endeavour my self to reach unto) would "not in any hand, that I should compare with him. So highly hath he advanced himself in regard
"of his old years considering that he hath gone through all ranks and honour: and so low debated "me, and put me down even under the age of his own ion: as though the desire and love of glory,
"should passe no farther then the length of mans life, and the greatest part thereof extended not "to the memory of posterity and the future time. This I hold for certain, that it is a thing inci"dent to the most magnanimous men and of greatest spirit and courage, to have a desire for to "match themselves not only with them that live in their daies, but with most famous & excellent "personages, that ever were or might be in any age. And surely for mine own part, Q. Fabius,
"I will not make it goodly, but frankly bewray my mind that way, namely, that I would full fair
"not only attain unto your praise-worthy acts and commendable virtues; but also (with your good "leave be it spoken) if possible I can, even to exceed and surmount the same. Therefore let us not ca"ry this mind, either you towards me, or I to those that are younger then my self, to be unwilling "and think much, that any one citizen among us, should prove equall to our selves: for in to do"ing, we should offer wrong and do hurt not only to them whom we have envied and maligne,
"but also prejudice the common-weal, & in manner the whole state of all mankind. And thus much "to you self. He hath now (my lords) recounted, to what great perils I should enter into by the A-"ffrick voyage in such sort, as he would seem not only to have a careful regard of the common"wealth and the army, but also to pity me and tender my safe and fortune. Whence cometh it, that "you should all on a sudden take so great care for me when my father and uncle both were slain,
"when their armies both twain, were utterly almost defeated and put all to the sword: when "Spain was lost; when 4 armies of Carthaginians, and 4 Generals, held all in fear by force of "armes; when there was a captain sought for to undertake that war, and no man durst be seen to
"Gcc 3 put

"put himself forward, no man so hardy as to present and offer his service, but my self; and when H
 "the people of Rome had committed the charge and government of Spain to me a young man
 "but four and twenty years old: how happened it that no man then took exception at my age, made "mention of the enemies force, discount of the difficulty and danger of the war, or laid abroad
 "the late and fresh defeat and death of my father and uncle? I would demand and gladly know "whether we have succeeded now lately, more greater calamity and loss in Africa, than we re"ceived at that time in Spain? or if the armies at this present in Africa be more puissant, or the "captains more in number, or better in valour, then they were in Spain at that time? or whe"ther mine age then, was more ripe and sufficient to manage wars, then now it is? Is that of "wherein I be better, more commodious & easie, to maintain war with the Carthaginian enemy
 "in Spain, then in Africa? After that I have discomfited and put to flight four holls of Cartha"ginians: after I have either for ed by assault, or reduced under mine obedience (for fear) so many
 "my Cities: after I have vanquished and subdued all, even as far as to the Ocean sea, so many "princes and potentates, so many herce and cruel nations: after I have so fully recovered Spain, as "there is not remaining to be seen there, so much as the footing and bare token of any war: as also "easie matter it is, and all one to elevat and deprelle the acts past that I have achieved: as also
 "purdie it will be, when I return with conquest out of Africa, to debase and make nothing of "those very things, which now to keep me back from then, e, and to make them appear strange,
 "are amplified with great words, & stretched upon the painters to the fun, he holdeth that there "is no access, no entrance into Africa, nor havens open to receive an armada. He telleth us and "alleged that M. Attilius was taken prisoner in Africa, as if M. Attilius forsooth at this first arri-"vall in Africa, had caught that harm and heavy misfortune. But he never in remembrance and cal-
 "lecth to mind, how that even the very same captain, as infomant as he was, yet found the baies "is open enough into Africa, and the first year bare himself fight valiantly and victoriously: & for "hitherto of Carthaginian captains, continued invincible to the end. You shall never therefore "scare me with the example so much, (were it so) that the calamity you speak of, hapned in this "war, and not in the former: of late, and not forty years ago) that I should give over my intend"ed purpose and not to fall into Africa now, because Regulus there was taken prisoner: as well as "I passed before into Spain, whereas the Scipio chanced to be killed. Or that I shall suffer, that "Sambroth the Laedemonian was born into this world more happy for Carthage, then my "self for Italy: but rather, that thereby I should think the better of my self, considering that the "fortune of one only man can be of such consequence and so great effect. But we ought (you say)
 "to consider the example of the Athenians, who leaving the war at home in their own country, "passed over into Sicily unadvisedly. Seeing you are at so good leisure to tell tales and report
 "the fabulous stories of Greece: why discourse you not rather of Agathocles the king of the Syracuse
 "Sicily, who seeing that Sicily a long time was troubled & eyed with the Punic war, failed over "into the self-same Africa, whereof we speak, and withdrew the war thither from when, e it "came? But what need I to instruct and teach you by rehearsing old and forrain examples, how "material a thing it is and important, to begin with an enemy first and put him in fear; and by "bringing another in danger, to remove the peril from our selves. Can there be a present found "more present more present and fresh in memory to prove and enforce this point, then Anni-"bal himself? A great difference there is between the waiting and pilling the lands of others, and "seeing of our own burnt and destroyed. And he which giveth the assault to endanger another,
 "is ever, of more courage then he that standeth upon his own guard and at defence only to save "himself. Moreover, the fear and dread is alwaies greater of things unknown unto us: but so "soon as the good is entered into the confines of a forrain country he may behold and see at hand (as "well as the good as the bad) what may advantage and what may endanger the enemies. Annibal
 "would never have thought and hoped, that so many States in Italy would have revolted unto "him as they did upon the overthrow at Cannæ. How much lesse account then may the Cartha"ginians make of anything in Africa, to remain fall and assured unto them: who are fickle al"lies to strangers without all truth and fidelity: proud, lords & intolerable tyrants over their "own subjects, full of wrath & cruelty? Over and besides, we albeit we were forsaken and aban"doned of all our confederates should alwaies upon our own forces, & maintained our selves with "peer Roman souldiers: whereas in Carthage they have no strength of natural citizens: the "souldiers that they have, are mercenaries all & waged for money partly Africans and partly Ni-
 "midians, the most unconstant nations of all others by nature, and aptest to entertain changes & "innovations. Let me have no stay and hindrance in this place only: ye shall hear news at one "time that I am set over in Africa, that all the country there is up in a broil that Annibal is re"ady to dislodge and remove out of these parts: & also that, Carthage it self is besieged. Expect you "daily out of Africa better and luckier tidings, yea, and often then ye heard out of Spain. These "hopes of mine, I ground upon the fortune of the people of Rome to upon the justice of the gods "witnesses of the league broken by the enemies upon Syphax and Masinissa, both Kings, whose "truth and fidelity I will trust so far forth as I find them, and ever stand in fear and doubt of their "faith and treachery. Many things they are now, that by distance of place appear not, which "war now begun will soon discover. And this is a special point of a man indeed, & of a good cap"tain, in no case to be wanting unto fortune when the offereth herself, but to take all vantage
 "that she giveth: and those accidents and occurrences which fall by chance to make use of them
 "yea,

A "yea and by wisdom and counsell to frame them to his own purpose and designs. True
 "it is, O Fabius, I shall have Annibal to beard and to match me: a souldier, I confesse, as "good every way as my self, but I will rather draw him after me, than he shall keep me back "at home. For he him I will to fight in his own country, and Carthage shall be the price of my vi"ctory, rather then the decayed peeces, and half ruinat perycassles of the Brutii. Only provide, O
 "Q. Fabius, that in the mean time whiles I am at sea in my voyage, whiles I am landing mine ar"my in Africa, whiles I approach Carthage with a running camp, the Common-weal luttin no "harm and damage here at home. See to this, I say, and be well advised, that it be not a shame-
 "full reproach to say, that P. Licinius the Consul, a man of singular valour (who because he is the "high Priest, and by vertue thereof, not to absent himself from the solemn celebration of sacrifices
 "and divine service, was content and willing, that the charge of so distant a province should "be not befall unto him by calling lots) is not able to perform that, now when Annibal is half de"feated, and his heart almost broken, which your self was sufficient to effect when Annibal's half de"feated it out, and braved all Italy like a conqueror. But let the case and suppose I say, that by this "counsell which I mean to take, the war be never the sooner brought to an end: yet surely it
 "were for the honour of the people of Rome, and for the reputation and name which they have "among forrain princes and States abroad, that they may see and know, that they have "not only to defend Italy, but also to offend Africa, and that it might neither be thought, and be"lieved nor spoken and noised abroad in the world, how no Roman captain durst adventure that "which Annibal hath already dared and done: and when as in the former Punic war, when all
 "the quarell was for Sicily, our armies and armados so often assailed Africa: now that Italy is in "C. a question Africa should lie still, and be at rest. Nay, rather let Italy be at repose and quiet now "at last, after so long travell and affliction and let Africa in her turn be fired and forraged ano"ther while. Let the Roman camp be pitched rather under the very walls and gates of Carthage, "then we see once again from our walls the trench and rampier of our enemies, to invest our Ci"ty. Let Africa be the set place and seat of the war, let tight and flight, foraging and harrying "of countries, revolt and rebellion of allies, and all other inconveniences and enormities that "follow war, which have lien heavy upon us these 14 years, turn from us thither. It shall content "and suffice me to have spoken as touching state-matters & the commonweal of the war present"ly in hand: and concerning the provinces and their government now in question and consula-
 "tion. For it would require a long and tedious discourse, and the same impertinent altogether un"to you, as if Q. Fabius hath delayed and depraived mine acts in Spain, so I likewise should dif"fer and diminish his glory, and set out my self and mine own reputation with goodly
 "and magnificent words. But my self, I will do neither one nor the other. And if in nothing else,
 "yet at leastwise, young man as I am, I will in modesty and government of my tongue go beyond "him as old and ancient a personage as he is. Thus have I lived, and thus have I carried my self in "all mine actions, that without blazing of mine own praises, I can soon content my self with "that good opinion which you of your selves have conceived and entertained of me.
 "Scipio had audien given him, with lesse indifference, and patience because it was commonly "voiced abroad. That if the Senat would not grant him to have the province and whereupon Q.
 "Fulvius, a man that had been four times Consul and Censor besides, required the Consul to "E speak his mind openly before the Senat, whether he would refer unto the LL, there assembled,
 "to determine of the provinces, and stand to that which they should set down, or prefer the thing "unto the people. When Scipio had made answer again and said, That he would do that which "might be good and expedient for the service of the Common-weal: then Fulvius replied upon "him and said: I demand not this question of you, as ignorant what either you would answer, or "what you meant to do. For I know full well, that ye pretend no lets your self, that you do but "found the Senat, and feel rather how they had inclined, then to stand to any advice of theirs in "good sadness. And in case we do not presently grant you the province according unto your de"fire, you have a bill framed already to present unto the body of the people and Commonalty.
 "F And therefore (qd. he) my masters, ye that are Tribunes, I require your aid and assistance, in that "I forbear to speak unto the point and deliver mine opinion; in this regard, because I know that "the Col. will not approve and ratifie the same, howsoever the whole house will go with me,
 "and allow my sentence. Hereupon arose some brail & debate among them, whiles the Col. urged
 "and enforced this point especially, and said, It was against all reason and equity, that the Tribuns
 "should enterpise their authority, and not permit every Senator being requelled to speak in his "turn, for to deliver his mind and opinion. Then the Tribuns made a decree in this manner, if the
 "Col. be content that the Senat shall determine of the Provinces, we will and command, that all "men rest in that which the Senat that order and judgment will we suffer the same to be pro-
 "pounded unto the people: if he be not content nor yeeld thereto, then we will assist him who "shall refuse to speak to the matter. Then the Col. requested a daies rest to confer with his Col"league, and so the morrow after he condescended to put all to the censure of the Senat. And in this "wife were the provinces distributed and appointed: unto one of the Col. Sicily was assigned, and "thirty ships of war with brazen beak heads (even the same that C. Servilius the year before had "the charge of) with commission also to passe over in Africa, if he thought it were for the good "of the Common-weal. The other Consul had the government of the Brutii and the managing "of the war against Annibal, with the power of that army which L. Veturius and Q. Caecilius had "left

wherein they seemed to be made good friends again. The same Livius left all the tribes but one, disarmed, and caused them to pay tribute as no denizens, for that they had both condemned him being innocent, and also made him a Consul and Censor afterwards.

The nine and twentieth book of T. Livius.

Scipto after he was arrived in Sicily, disposed his voluntary souldiers in order, and enrolled them by Centuries. Over and besides them he had him three hundred lusty tall fellows, for the flower of their age and strength of body, the bravest men of all others: but they wist not themselves for what purpose they were relieved; being neither assigned to any Colours under a Captain, nor so much as armed at all. Then he made choice from out of the whole manhood and youth of Sicily three hundred men, such as for birth and wealth were the very principal and best in the Island, who were to pass over with him into Affrick: and he appointed them a day, upon which they should all present themselves in readines, furnished and appointed in the best manner with horse and armor. This warfare so far from home was like to be irksome unto them, and to bring with it much trouble, many difficulties and dangers, as well by sea as land. The consideration and fear hereof mightily disquieted not only the parties themselves, but also their parents and kinsfolk. Now when the day appointed was come, they shewed their horses and armour. Then Scipio made a speech unto them, and said, "That he was given to understand, that certain Sicilian horsemen stood in great fear and dread of this soldiery, as being a force and painfull piece of service: In case then (quoth he) there be any of you so minded and disposed indeed, I had rather you would now presently be known thereof unto me, and confesse at once, then hereafter to whine and complain, and so to prove lazy lubbers and unprofitable souldiers to the Common-wealth. And therefore prier your minds in plain terms, and I will be content to hear you without offence. Whereupon, when as one of them took a good heart, and said flatly, "That if it lay in his choice freely to do what he would, he was altogether unwilling to serve: then Scipio answered him again in this manner, Forasmuch as my youth (thou hast not dissembled thy heart's grief, but spoken out what thou thinkest, I will loose) depute one in thy turn unto whom thou shalt deliver thy armour, thy horse and other furniture of warfare, and whom thou shalt forthwith have home with thee, there to train, teach, & exercise him after thou hast given him thy horse and armor. The young man was glad hereof, and accepted the offer upon that condition: and so he assigned unto him one of those three hundred above said, whom he kept about himself unarmed. When the rest saw that horseman in this manner discharged of his service, and that with the favour and good will of the L. General: every man then began to speak for himself, and to make excuses and took others in their stead. Thus for the three hundred Sicilians were substituted as many Roman horsemen, without any expenses at all of the State. And the Sicilians themselves had the charge of instructing and training them up. For the General had made an Edict and Proclamation, That whosoever did not so, should serve himself in person. This proved by report a brave cornet of horsemen above the rest; and in many battles performed right good service to the Common-wealth. After this, he took a survey of the legions or footmen: and all those who had borne arms longest in the wars he selected forth, especially such as had been employed under the conduct of Marcellus. For those he well wist to have been brought under the best discipline of warfare, and also by reason of the long siege of Syracuse, to be most skilfull in assaulting of Cities. For now they were no small matters that he had in his head, but he plotted even the very destruction and ruin of great Carthage. After this, he divided his army and placed severall forces in sundry towns. The Cities of Sicily he enjoyed to provide corn, he made spare of that which was brought out of Italy: the old ships he newly repaired and rigged, and with them he sent Lelivius into Affrick for to prey upon the country and fetch in prizes the new which did at Panormus he drew up to land, that they might all winter long lie upon dry ground, and be seasoned, because they were made in haste of green timber. When he had prepared all things necessary for war, he came to the City of Syracuse, which as yet was not in good order and well quieted, since the great troubles of the late wars. For the Greeks made claim for their goods, granted unto them by the Senat of Rome, which certain of the Italian nation detained and withheld from them by the same violence, wherewith in time of war they had possessed themselves thereof. He supposing it meet and requisite to maintain above all things, the credit of the State: partly by vertue of an edict and commandment, and partly by a civil course and process of law against such as were obstinate and avowed their wrongs done, he forced them to make restitution to the Syracusians. This act of his pleased not only them, but also all the states of Sicily: and therefore they were more willing and forward to help him in the wars.

The same summer there arose in Spain great troubles, raised by the means of Indibilis the Illegere for no other occasion or reason in the world, but because in regard of the high admiration of Scipio, all other Captains besides whatsoever were but despised. "Him they supposed to be the only General that the Romans had left, now that all the rest were slain by Annibal. And hereupon it was thought they that when the two Scipios were killed, they had no other to send into Spain but him: and afterwards, when the wars grew hot in Italy, he was the only man sent for over to match with Annibal. And over and besides that, the Romans had now in Spain no Cap-

"rains

A "rains at all, but in bare name and shew: the old experienced army also was from thence withdrawn. All things are out of frame, and in great confusion, & none there, but a disordered sort of raw Irish water souldiers. And never they looked to have again the like occasion & opportunity to recover Spain out of their hands. For hitherto they had ever been in subjection to that day, either to the Carthaginians or the Romans, and not always to the one or the other, by turns, but otherwise to both at once. And like as the Carthaginians have been driven out by the Romans, so may the Romans be expelled by the Spaniards, if they would hold together. So that in the end Spain being freed from all foreign war, might be restored for ever to the ancient customs and rights of the country. With these and such like suggestions and discourses, he solicited and raised not only his own subjects and countinmen, but the Aulicans also, a neighbouring nation, yea, and other States and Cities that bordered upon his and their confines: so as within few daies there assembled together into the territory of the Sedetans (according to an Edict published abroad thirty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse).

The Roman Captains likewise for their part, L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, left by neglected of the first beginning the war might grow to a greater head, joined their forces together, and marching through the country of the Aulicans, as peaceably as if they had been friends (notwithstanding they were known enemies) came to the very place where they were encamped and pitched themselves within three miles of the enemies. At the first they assayed by way of Embassage to deal with them, and to persuade them to lay aside all arms and hostility: but they laboured in vain. Afterwards, when as the Spanish horsemen gave charge suddenly upon certain Romans that were foraging, the Romans also sent out from their Stations and Corps de Guard their Cavalry to rescue: so the horsemen skirmished, but no memorable act to speak of was effected on the one side or the other. The next morrow by sunrise the enemies all shewed themselves armed and in order of battel, and braved the Romans within a mile of their Camp. The Aulicans were marshalled in the main battel: the Illegeres in the right point, and certain other Spanish nations of late and mean account in the left: between both those wings and the battel, of either hand they left certain wide and void places, whereas when the time served they might put forth their horsemen. The Romans having embattled and put themselves in array after their old and usual manner yet in this one thing followed the examples of the enemies, in leaving out certain open waies between the legions for the men of arms to pass through, but Lentulus supposing that the use of the horse-service would be advantageous to that part which first should fend out their Cavalry into the battell of the enemies, that lay to open with spaces between, gave commandment to Ser. Cornelius a Knight Marhall or Tribune, to call and charge the Cavalry to let to with their horses, and to enter those open places between the enemies battalions. And himself having sped but badly in beginning the fight with footmen so rashly, staid no longer, but until he had brought the thirteenth legion (which was set in the left wing opposite to the Illegeres) out of the reeward into the vanguard, for to succour and strengthen the twelfth legion, which already began to shrink and give ground. After that once the skirmish there was equal and on even hand, he advanced forward to L. Manlius, who in the forefront of the battell was busy in encouraging his men, and sending supplies and succours into all parts where he saw need: thus shewing unto him, that all was well and whole in the left point, and that he had sent out Cornelius, who with his horsemen, would like a tempestuous storm come upon them, and soon over all bespread the enemies round about. The word was not so soon spoken, but the Roman horsemen were ridden within the thickest of the enemies, and not only did disorder the arrays and companies of the footmen, but also at once shut up the waies and passages that the Spaniards could not make out with their horsemen. And therefore the Spaniards leaving to fight on horseback, alight on foot. The Roman Generals seeing the ranks and files of the enemies disordered, themselves in fright and fear, and their ensignes waving up and down every way: fell to exhorting, yea, to entreating of their own Infantry to recharge them with all their force, whiles they were thus troubled and disbanded, and not suffer them to come into order, and to enforce the battel again. And surely the barbarous people had never been able to abide their violent impression, but that Indibilis himself their Prince and Lord, together with the men of arms that were now dismounted on foot, made head against the ensignes of the footmen in the vanguard. Whereupon ensued a sharp and cruell fight for a good while. At length, when as they that fought about their Prince (who first, although he was half dead yet stood their ground, and afterwards with a javelin was nailed to the earth) were overwhelmed with darts and slain: then they began to flee on all hands: but the greater number were killed in the place, because both the horsemen had no time nor space to recover their horses, and mount upon them again, and also the Romans pressed so hotly upon them after they were once discomfited, and never gave over until they had stript the enemies quite out of their Camp. So there died that day thirteen thousand Spaniards, and well near eight hundred were taken prisoners. Of Romans and Allies, not many more than two hundred left their lives behind them, and those especially in the left point. The Spaniards, that either were driven out of their Camp, or fled out of the battell, first ran scattered and dispersed over the fields, and afterwards returned every man to his own City where he dwelt.

Then Mandonius summoned them to a generall council: where they all bewailed their calamities & miseries, greatly blamed the authors of the wars, and agreed in the end to send their embas-

upon the signs and tokens which they should mark from on high a far off, they were sent back again. Then the exiled Locrians repaired unto Scipio at Syracuse, with whom also were others of the banished persons of Locri: and there they related unto him the promises of the captives aforesaid, and put the Consul in very good hope that the effect would be correspondent to their designation. With them were sent two Tribunes or Marshals, to wit, M. Sergius and P. Matienus, with commission to conduct three thousand soldiers from Rhegium to Locri. Letters also were dispatched unto Q. Pleminius the Vice-pretor, for to be assistant in this action. Who being departed from Rhegium, and carrying with them scaling ladders, proportioned to the height of the Castle wall fore-told unto them, about midnight gave a token by fire to those that were to betray the Castle, from that place which they had agreed upon: who being in readines also, and looking wittily for them, put down likewise ladders of their own, made for the purpose; and in many places at once received them that climbed up: so as, before there was any alarm heard, they let upon the watch of the Carthaginians, fast asleep as they were, and distrusting no such matter: who first were heard to grone as they lay a dying, but afterwards, to make a noise and keep a running and much ado, upon their suddain starting from sleep, all the whiles that they wist not what the occasion was. At length, upon the discovery of the matter, one man wakened another, and every one called aloud to arms; crying out, that the enemies were within the Castle, and the watchmen slain. And without question, the Romans had been put to the worse and defeated quite, being far fewer in number than the enemies, but that there was an outcry and shout set up by them that were without the fortresse: which so long as men knew not from whence it came, put them in great fear: and the tumult besides by night made every small and vain thing much greater than it was. By means whereof, the Carthaginians astonished (as if all places had been full of enemies) abandoned all fight, and betook themselves into the other fortresse (for two there were distant not far asunder.) The Townsmen kept possession of the City as the prize and quarry in the midst, for the winners. But out of the two Castles there were light skirmishes every day. Q. Pleminius was Captain of the fort and garrison of the Romans, and Amilcar over the Carthaginians: and both parts increased their strength, by aids that they had coming unto them from the places adjoining. Until at last Annibal shewed himself in person: and no doubt the Romans had never been able to hold out, but that the whole multitude of the Locrenians were galled and grieved with the proud government and the covetous polling of the Carthaginians, took part with the Romans. When intelligence came to Scipio, that the Romans were distressed in Locri, and that Annibal himself was advancing thither: for fear lest the garrison also should be in some hazard (as having no ready means to retire from thence) himself leaving at Messana his brother L. Scipio for the guard of the place, passed over from thence with his vessels down the water, when he espied the current and the tide offered to serve for a lane. Likewise Annibal having sent out a vanguard from the River Butaurus (which is not far from the City Locri) to signify unto his men, that by day light they should give a hot charge with all their might and main upon the Locrenians and Romans both, whiles he himself made an assault upon the Town behind, not looking for him, but wholly turned away and amused upon that other tumult. Now when as early in the morning he heard the skirmish begun, he was not willing to put himself within the Castle, for fear of pestering with over great a company the place so freight and of so small receipt: and for to scale the walls they had brought no ladders with them. So causing all their carriages and packs to be piled up in one heap together: he presented all his footmen in battail array before the City, to terrifie his enemies withal: and with the Numidian horsemen he made a bravado under the walls, and rode about the City. While the ladders and other ordinance meet to give an assault, were in preparing and making ready, he approached on horseback near to the wall, for to view on which part above the rest, he might give the assault: and there he was shot with a quarell discharged from an engine called a Scorpion, which hapned to be planted next unto him. And being affrighted at this so dangerous an occurrence, he commanded to found the retreat, and fortified his camp aloof without the perill and shot of any dart. Now was the Roman fleet from Messana arrived at Locri, and had the day afore them: so as they were all fet a land, and entered the City before the sun setting. The morrow after, the Carthaginians began to skirmish out of the Castle: and Annibal being now provided of ladders, and having all things else in readines needful for the assault, came under the walls: with that, all upon a suddain the Romans fet open a gate and sallied out upon him, who feared nothing less than any such accident: and thus setting upon them at unawares, slew two hundred of them. Annibal perceiving that the Consul was there, retired with the rest into the camp: and after he had sent a messenger to them that were within the Castle, willing them to shift for themselves, in the night season he dislodged and departed. They also who were in the fort, after they had set on fire the houses which were in their keeping, of purpose by that tumult to cause the enemy to make some stay and tarry behind, ran away in manner of a rout and before it was night with good footmanhip overtook their own company. Scipio seeing as well this Castle quit by the enemy, as their camp also empty, called the Locrenies to a general assembly, and gave them a sharp check, and rebuked them for their revolt. The principal Captains & Authors of that trespass he put to death; and gave away their goods to the chief heads of the other faction, in reward and consideration of their singular fidelity to the Romans. But as concerning the public fate of the Locrians, he said he would neither make nor meddle therewith, either in giving to them, or taking ought at all from them. But willed them to send their Embassadors to

A Rome, and look what the Senat would award in equity, that fortune they should abide. This one thing he was well assured of, that how ill soever they had deceived of the people of Rome yet they should live in better condition under the signory of the Romans, provoked no longer as they were, than they had already under the government of Carthaginians, pretending love and unity as they did.

Then himself in person cut over to Messana with those forces that he brought with him, leaving Pleminius his Lieutenant, and that power that won the Castle, in garnison for the defence of the City. The citizens of Locri had been so proudly muted, and so cruelly handled by the Carthaginians, after they were revolted from the Romans, that it seemed they could be content to abide any small wrongs, not only patiently but also willingly, and in manner with a good heart. But to far now exceeded Pleminius, Amilcar the former captain of the garrison, for when the Roman garrison fled, before the Carthaginians in wickedness & avarice, that man would have brought they had strove together who should pain the other in fustial vice and ungodliness, and not in tears of arms and prowess. For neither Captain nor soldier forbore to practise upon the poor Townsmen any enormous facts, which are wont to make the great & mighty men odious unto the poor and meane persons. They wrought and committed shameful villanies upon their very bodies: upon their wives and children. And their greedy avarice so far proceeded, that they could not hold their hands from spoiling and robbing the very religious and sacred Temples. Inomuch as, among other holy Churches which they polluted, they met even with the rich measure of Proserpina, which had lien still in all ages, and untouched by all others: save only it was thought to have been pilled by Pyrrhus: who indeed carried away the spoil of her, but he deeply bought it and paid full sweetly for that sacrilege. And therefore like as before time the Kings ships flucken with tempests, and torn and split with the rage of the Sea, brought nothing at all in that wreck safe to Land, but only that sacred money of the goddess, which they had stoln and carried away; even so at this present, the very same money (but in another kind of calamity and misery) brought upon all them that were tainted in that wicked action of robbing the Temple, a strange & frantick madness: which caused Captain against Captain, and soldier against soldier, to fire as if they were black and enraged as mortal enemies one with another. Pleminius had the chief rule and command of all. As for the soldiers, some were under him, such as himself had brought from Rhegium; others were commanded by the Tribunes or Colonels. Now it chanced that one of Pleminius his soldiers had stoln a silver cup out of a Townsmans house, and ran away when he had done; and the owners after him with hue and cry, and returned to come in the way, and to meet with Sergius & Matienus the two Tribunes or Colonels, full in the face. Whereupon the cup was taken from him by the commandment of the Tribunes; and thence arose first a brawl, and some hard words were dealt between; and from them consequently they went to open clamors and loud outcries, until at length there grew a very fray between the soldiers of Pleminius and of the Tribunes: and according as they came still one or other in time to help their own side, both the number and the riot increased at once. In the end, Pleminius his men went away with the blows, and moaned themselves unto Pleminius, running to him with open mouth and great indignation, shewing their bloody wounds: and reporting besides, what opprobrious words to his disgrace had passed against him without spare, in the time of thole brawling fits. Hereupon in a great choler and boiling heat of blood, he gat him forth of doors in all the halt; convened the Tribunes before him, and commanded them to be stripped naked, and the rods to be brought forth ready for to scourge them. But whiles there was some time spent in turning them out of their apparel & uncajing them (for they struggled & made resistance, and called to their soldiers for help) at once they came thick about them (for very lusty they were upon their fresh victory) and ran from all places, as if the alarm bell had been rung against the coming of some enemies. But when they saw once the bodies of their Tribunes rewed with rods, then they fell into far more furious rage and a very fit of madness; and thus incensed as they were, without all regard, not only of the reverent majesty of authority, but also of common humanity, they fell upon the Lieutenant himself, after they had most pitiously beaten and evil intreated his Lieutors and Officers about him. Then having singled him out apart from his Ministers and Sergeants, they cruelly mangled him, cut off his nose, croped his ears, and left him for dead. News hereof came to Messana, and within few dayes Scipio highed him apace to Locri in a gally directed with six banks of oars: who after due examination and hearing of the cause between Pleminius and the Tribunes, acquit Pleminius as innocent, and left him Governour of the garrison of the place: but he judged the Tribunes guilty, as Malefactors, and caused them to be bound in chains for to be sent to Rome unto the Senat: and so he returned to Messana, and from thence to Syracuse. Pleminius not able to over-rule his anger, and thinking that Scipio had dealt but coldly and negligently in the matter, and made too light of the injury which he had received, and not punished the offenders accordingly; and supposing that there was no man able to make true estimate of the cause, but he that in his own person had felt the indignity and hainounes thereof: commanded the Tribunes to be haled before him, and after he had put them to all the cruel torments, that any mans body is able to abide, he put them to death: and not satisfied either with their dolorous torture whiles they were quick, nor with taking their lives from them, cast their dead bodies forth into the fields, there to lie a-bowe ground unburied. The like cruelty he exercised upon the principal Burgeesses of the Locrians, such as he heard say went to Scipio for to make complaint of his wrongs and injuries. And look

what foul and shameful pranks he had plaid afore with his friends and allies, proceeding of lust and covetousness: the same now in his fell and furious rage he multiplied and wrought in divers sorts: so as he brought infamy, hatred and obloquy, not only upon himself, but also made the world to think hardly, and to speak much shame of the General himself.

Now drew the time near of the solemn election of Magistrats: when as there came letters to Rome from Pub. Licinius the Consul, the tenor whereof was to this effect: That himself and his army were sore visited with a grievous sickness: and that he could not possibly have staid there, but that the violent contagion and influence of the same malady, if not greater & more grievous, had not afflicted the enemies. Seeing that therefore himself was not able to come unto the election, he was minded, if it might so stand with the good liking of the Lords of the Senat, to nominate as Dictator Q. Cecilius Metellus, for to hold the foresaid election. And as for the army of Q. Cecilius, it was for the good of the Common-weal that it should be called and discharged, since that there was no employment of them at this present: considering that Annibal was retired already with his forces into his standing camp, and taken up his wintering harbor; and again, the pestilence grew so hot in that leaguer of his, that if they were not discharged betimes, there was not one of them like to escape and remain alive. In these points, the LL. of the Senat granted unto their commission unto the Consul, for to do according as himself thought to stand either with his own credit and trust committed unto him, or the benefit of the Common-weal.

At the very same time there was a certain religious opinion that had possessed of a fuddin the whole City, by occasion of a certain Prophecie found in the books of Sibylla. When search was made into them and they diligently perused, about the raising of stones, which happened so often that year, the Prophecie ran in this form: "At what time soever an enemy of a strange and foreign country shall happen to make war upon Italy, he may be chased out of Italy and vanquished, if the goddesses come Cybele of Ida, were brought to Rome from Pessinus. This Prophecie found by the Decemvirs, moved the Senat the more, for that, the Embassadors also who carried the oblation and present afore said to Delphos, related, That as they themselves sacrificed unto Pythius Apollo, all the inwards of the beast killed for sacrifice, appeared good, and shewed prosperity: and the Oracle besides gave answer. That there was a far greater victory toward the people of Rome than that was, out of the spoils whereof they brought gifts and offered to the God at this present. And for to make up and fully accomplish these hopes, they alleaged withal, how P. Scipio demanding the Province of Affrick, did preface (as it were) before-hand in his mind the final end of this war. To the end therefore, that they might with more speed obtain this honorable victory thus fore-told, and offering (as it were) itself, by all lucky prefagings of men and Oracles of the Gods, they thought and devised some mean to transpire the said goddesses to Rome.

The people of Rome in those dayes was considered with no States of Asia: howbeit the LL. calling to mind, how long ago, upon occasion of a sickness, and to purchase health unto the people, a Consul was sent for likewise out of Greece, before it was joyned with the City of Rome in any league or society: and considering withal, that there was some friendship and amity begun already with King Attalus (in regard of the common war against Philip) and that he would be ready to do for the people of Rome, whatsoever lay in his power, they resolved to send unto him an honorable Embassage, to wit, M. Valerius Levinus, who had been twice Consul, and had warred in Greece: M. Cecilius Metellus, who had been a Pretor, and Servius Sulpitius Galba: likewise an Edile, and two late Quætors, C. Tremelius Flaccus, and M. Valerius Falco. For these five, they assigned five Quinquagems or Gallies of five ranks of oars, that according to the credit and dignity of the people of Rome, they should make a voyage into those Lands, with whom they were to win a reputation and Majesty to the Roman name and State. These Embassadors, as they held on their course toward Asia, so soon as they were put on Land at Delphos, repaired directly to the Oracle, for to know what good hope it might afford unto them and the people of Rome, of effecting that business and commission, about the which they were sent forth. And this answer by report, was returned to them again, That they should obtain their desire, and effectuate their purpose by the means of Attalus the King: advising them moreover, That when they had conveyed the said goddesses down to Rome, they should take order, that the very best man of all others in the City, should give her lodging and entertainment. But to proceed, to Pergamus they came unto the King. Who having courteously received and welcomed the Embassadors, conducted them into Phrygia to Pessinus, and delivered into their hands that sacred and holy Stone, which the inhabitants of the country said, was the Mother of the Gods, and willed them to carry it to Rome. Then M. Valerius Falco was sent back from the other Embassadors to advertise them at Rome, that the goddess was coming, and that they should seek out the best man in all the City, for to receive and lodge her in his house with all devotion that might be.

Now was Q. Cecilius Metellus nominated Dictator by the Consul in the Brutians country, against the solemn election of the Magistrats. His army was disbanded and called, and L. Veturius Philo created master of the horse. Then the Dictator held the Election. In which were chosen Consuls, M. Cornelius Cethegius & P. Sempronius Tuditanus in his absence, who at that time had the government of Greece. After them were elected Pretors, T. Claudius Nero, M. Marcius Rallus, L. Scribonius Libo, & M. Pomponius Matro. When the Election was finished, the Dictator resigned up his place of magistracy. The Roman Games were thrice renewed and set forth, & the plaies Plebes seven times exhibited. The Ediles of the chair were Cn. and L. Cornetius Lentulus both. This Lucius governed verned then the Province of Spain: created he was in his absence, and absent as he was he bare that dignity. The Ediles of the Commons were T. Clodius, Julius, and M. Junius Pennus. That year M. Marcellus dedicated the Temple of Verus, next the gate C. pen., the seventeenth year after it was vowed by his father at Clusidium in Gaul, during the time of his first Consulship. There died also this year a Famine of Mars, namely, M. Marcellus in a. d. 11.

For the last two years the affairs in Greece had not been well followed, Philip therefore taking the vantage, that the Aetolians were forsaken of the Romans, the only aid upon which they trusted, forced them both to sue for peace, and to contract the same under what conditions and capitulations himself pleased: which if he had not made to et cetera, than that ever needeth to accomplish in good time, P. Sempronius the Vice-Consul, returned to seek redress in the government, had utterly defeated him while he waged war with the Aetolians, considering that he was ten thousand foot and a thousand horse strong, and had five and thirty, all thus of war, headed with brazen pikes before a power of no small reputation. I advise you to aid and assist his allies. For the said peace was not so soon concluded, but news came to the King that the Romans were arrived at Dyrrhachium: that the Parthians and other neighbour nations upon hope of change and a new world, began to rise and rebel: and that Dionysius was already besieged and assaulted: for to that City the Romans bent their power (in stead of aiding the Aetolians, unto whom they were sent) upon high displeasure and indignation, that without their advice and consent, yea, and against the tenor of the accord and covenant they had made a peace with the King, Philip upon these advertisements, for fear lest some farther troubles might arise among the nations and states retired, after he had sent Letterius his Lieutenant with part of his forces and thirteen ships into Euboea to visit the country, and to see in what terms they stood: yea, and to disturb and break the peace if possibly he could, Philip wasted and spoiled the territories and lands of the Ap. Ionians, and approaching the City with his whole power, he did batter to Scampronius the Roman General. But after he saw once that he kept himself quiet within the City, handling only upon his guard and defence of the walls, distrustful also his own strength, as not able to force the City by assault, & delicious withal to entertain peace with the Romans as well as with the Aetolians, if he could: if not, yet at leastwise to have truce with them without effecting any more (seeing he could but only rub an old sore, & renew cankred malice upon fresh contention & quarrel) he returned into his realm.

About the fence time, the Epirots weary of long wars, after they had first founded the disposition and mind of the Romans that way, sent their Embassadors unto Philip, to treat about a general and universal peace: affirming that they had assured hope of an honorable end and agreement, if his highness would vouchsafe to come to a parly with P. Sempronius the Roman General. And soon they obtained thus much of him, as to pass over into Epirus, for the King himself was not unwilling thereunto. Now there is a City in Epirus, named Phœnice, where the King after communication had first with Erapus, Dardas and Philippos, Pretors of the Epirots entered into an interview also with P. Sempronius. At this solemn meeting and conference, Antiochus the King of the Athamans was present, and other Magistrats of the Epirots and Acarnans. And first Philippos the Pretor began to speak and request, as well King Philip as the Roman General to make an end of all wars, and likewise to give the Epirots leave to do the same. P. Sempronius propounded and set down the articles and conditions of peace in this wise, That the Parthians, Dardani, Bærgulani and Engulani, should belong to the Seignory of the Romans, notwithstanding that they had obtained of the Senat by their Orators sent to Rome, to be annexed to the dominion of Philip King of Macedonia. When they were agreed for peace upon those capitulations, there were comprised within the league on the Kings behalf, Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achæians, the Bœotians, the Thessalians the Acarnans, and the Epirots: and on the Romans the Illyries, K. Attalus, Pleuratus, Nabas the Tyrant of the Lacedæmonians, the Eleans the Messenians, and the Athenians. And hereof were instruments and Indentures ingroffed and sealed, and truce made for two monthes, until such time as Embassadors were sent to Rome, that the people might by their suffrages approve of the conditions in that form. So all the tribes in general granted the same, because the war now being intended and bent against Affrick, they were willing for the present to be discharged of all other troubles.

P. Sempronius having concluded peace, departed unto Rome for to enter his Consulship. Now when as M. Cornelius and P. Sempronius were Consuls (which was the 15 year of the Punic war) the Provinces were assigned unto them in this manner, namely, unto Cornelius, Hæspæria with the old army: unto Sempronius the Brutia with the new legions that he was to enrol. And to the Pretors in this wise were the Provinces allotted that M. Marcius should be Lord chief justice of the citizens pleas, and L. Scribonius Libo have the jurisdiction of foreigners, together with the government of Gallia, Itreus, that M. Pomponius Matro should rule Sicily, and T. Claudius Nero sit as L. Deputy in Sardinia. As for P. Scipio, his commission was renewed and continued for one year longer, with the command of that army and Armado which he had conducted before. Likewise L. Licinius had his commission newly leased, for to have the charge of the Brutians country, with the power of two legions so long as the Consul thought it good for the Common-weal, that he should remain in the government of that Province. Also M. Lucius & Sp. Lucretius, with the assistance of those two legions with which they had defended Gallia against Mago, continued still in their room for another year. Moreover Cn. Octavius remained in place, with commission, that

"informed sufficiently and knew the truth, as well in what foer Loeri was first betrayed unto Am-nibal, as also after what order the garrison of Amnibal was thence expelled, and the City restored again under your obedience. For if it may appear that the treisals of our revolt cannot be imputed any way unto the publick counsel and content of our City; but contrary-wile, that our return under your signory and dominion was not only performed with our good will, but also first wrought and compassed by the means of our helping hand and valour: ye have the greater cause to be disconcerted and duplicated with your Lieutenant and souldiers, for offering us your good and loyal allies such abuses, to cruel wrongs and unworthy indignities. As for the cause of our double revoltment and change, I think it good to deter the speaking thereof to another time; and that for two reasons: the one is, that the matter might be heard in the presence of *P.
 Scipio*, who recovered Loeri; and was an eye-witness of all that we have done being at Carthage. I the other is this, that howsoever we be, yet we should not have abiden those calamities in which we fort as we have supported them. We cannot dissemble (my LL.) nor conceal, how all the while that we had the Carthaginian garrison within our Cattle, we suffered many foul outrages and shameful villanies, both at Amnibal's hands (the Captain of the garrison) as also from the Nu-midians and Africans: but what are they in comparison of the abuses & indignities that we endured at this day? May it please you (my LL.) to give us the hearing of those things with patience, that I shall utter even against my will with grievance. All the world at this day is in supercence, & standeth in great doubt, whether to see you or the Carthaginians, the Sovereign Lords of the whole earth. But if they were to weigh and counterpoise the Roman and Carthaginian Empire, by those injuries which have been offered to us of Loeri, either from them or your garrison; and which at this day, more than ever before, we fill endure: there is none but would rather make choice of them to be their sovereign LL. than the Romans. And yet consider, pray you, and see how well affected the Locrians are towards you: when we were nothing to hardly used nor so ill entreated by the Carthaginians, yet we had recourse unto your Captain General: and now that we are misused of your garrison, and put to more sorrow than if we were professed enemies, yet we have run no whit with our complaints but unto your selves, either shall you (my LL.) vouchsafe to have compassion of our miserable state, or else we see not what we have left wherein we should pray unto the immortal Gods, for to be good and propice unto us. Q. Pleminius Lieutenant to the General Scipio, was sent with a strong garrison and power of men to recover Loeri out of the hands of the Carthaginians; and with the very same garrison was left L. there: but this Lieutenant of yours (for, the extremity of miseries and afflictions wherewith we are driven, maketh us bold, and putteth courage in us to speak our minds freely finding nothing at all in him of a man, my Lords, but the bare shape and outward form; nor of a Roman citizen, unless it be the habit of apparel which he weareth, and the sound of the Latin tongue which he speaketh. A very plague he is & no better, a monstrous & ugly beast-like monster that, which sometimes if old tales and fables be true, haunted the narrow seas between us and Sicily, for to destroy all passengers that sailed by. Who, if he could have been content himself alone to have practised & wrought upon us your allies, all mischievous acts & pranks, of wickedness, of filthy lust, and greedy covetousness, we would peradventure in all patience & long sufferance, have filled up that one gulf and pit were it never so deep, & satisfied one gorge never so unsatiable. But now to great a delight & pleasure hath he taken, that all lewd & licentious parts all shameful acts, and villanies should be commonly practised & in every place committed, that he hath made all your Centineers very Pleminius, yea, and your souldiers as bad as himself. All of them can skill now of robbing, rifling, spoiling, beating, wounding, and killing: they are all good at forcing of dames and ladies of honor, at ravishing and deflowering of young Virgins, at abusing (against kind) of younglings, free born and well defended, whom they pull perforce from between the arms, and out of the very bowomes of their parents. Daily is our City assaulted and taken: daily is it sacked and pillaged, night and day, there is no place free, but ringeth again with the piteous shrieks and lamentable plaints and cries of women and children, harried and carried away in every place. He that were a stranger to these things, and knew nothing, might wonder well enough, how either we can possibly hold out in suffering such outrages, or they which are the doers, not yet be satisfied and full of committing so great wrongs and injuries. For neither will my tongue utter: nor serve to deliver, nor needful is it expedient for you to hear every thing in particular, what we have sustained. But in general I will comprise and knit up altogether, I will abide by it that there is not one house throughout all Loeri, I dare avouch there is no person either one or other, exempt from the wrongs that he hath done. I say, & stand to it, that there is no kind of wickedness, no manner of filthy lust & uncleanness, no unsatiable avarice besides, that he hath not assided to practise upon as many as were capable thereof, & fit subjects to work upon. Horribly can devise and think, whether of these two mischiefs incident to a City be more detestable: either when the enemies force it by assault in time of war, or when a pestilent & cruel tyrant oppresseth it by force & arms during peace. All calamities we endured before, that Towns woman and child put unto. And now at this hour, more than ever (my LL.) Pleminius hath perpetrated upon us, our children & our wives, all those excessive villanies, that the most inhumane, cruel & outrageous tyrants can devise to exercise upon those subjects, whom they keep down with oppression & tread under foot. Yet one thing there is (right honorable) whereof both sense of religion imprinted & engrafted naturally in our minds, constrains us to make particular complaint by speciality: and

A "and also our desire is, that ye should have the hearing, yea, and to avail and discharge your Common-weal of the scruple of conscience, in case ye think it to meet and requisite. For we have observed and seen with our eyes, with what devotion and ceremonial reverence, ye not only honor and worship the Gods of your own, but also receive and entertain those of strangers and foreigners. We have in our City a Chappel of Proserpina, concerning the holiness of which house, I suppose verily, that ye have heard some report and fame, during the war of King Pyrrus, when in his return out of Sicily, passing along the sea side with his fleet by Loeri, among other shameful villanies and outrages which he committed against our City in despite of us, and for our fidelity shewed toward you, pillaged also and robbed the treasure of this Proserpina, which to that day had never been touched by any man whatsoever. And when he had it done, he embarked the money & sent it away by water, but journeyed himself by Land. But see what hapned B "to LL. hereupon! His whole navy the morrow after, was all even tumbled, split, & torn a pieces in a most hideous gulf and horrible tempest, save only those ships wherein that sacred treasure was belloyed which were cast upon our coast & driven ashore. Whereupon this King, as proud & fierce a Prince as he was, being taught by so great harms and losses, to believe that there were Gods in heaven that ruled all; made diligent search for all the laid monies, and caused the same to be brought back again, and laid up in the treasury of Proserpina. And yet for all that, neversted he well in any thing that he went about, from that day forward, Hunted he was and chased clean out of Italy, and coming by chance one night, & entering unadvisedly the City of Syracusa, he died an obscure, base, and dishonorable death. And notwithstanding your Lieutenant, your Colonels C "and knight Marshalls heard of this and a thousand more such instances & examples which were recounted unto them (nor for to amplify and set out with the highest the great religion and holiness of the place: but as we and our ancestors have had right evident proof, and that full oftentimes, to shew the manifest power and puissance of that goddess; yet were they to hardy as to lay their theivish and sacrilegious hands upon those treasures, that were inviolate and not to be touched: and so by that cursed prize and booty have polluted themselves, their houses, and your souldiers. Whose service take heed my LL. as ye tender your selves and your credit, how ye employ either in Italy or in Africa, in any of your affairs and wars there: before ye purge and expiate this foul and heinous fact: for fear lest they make amends, and pay for this detestable forfeir not only which their own blood, but also with some publick ills & calamity of the whole D "State. And even already my LL. the ire and duplicature of the goddess hath been well seen upon your Captains and souldiers both: at this present day continueth still, Sundry times they have been together by the ears, and scuffled one against another with banners displayed, Pleminius the Captain bare up one side, and two Marshalls or military Tribuns another. Never fought they more fiercely & sharply with the Carthaginians in the field, than amongst themselves in frises at the word point. And through their furious rage they had given Amnibal good opportunity and vantage to regain Loeri into his own hands: but that Scipio, whom we sent for, came in the mean time upon him. But peradventure some will say, this madnes and fury hantereth and romanceth the souldiers only, who are tainted with the foresaid sacrilege, and no power at all of the god-des hath been shewed in punishing the leaders and captains themselves. Nay I wot, in them it E "hath most evidently appeared. The Tribuns have been beaten with rods by the Lieutenant & the Lieutenant again, being laid for by the said Tribuns, and caught in a train, hath not only been mangled all his body over, but when they had cut off his nose, and cropt his ears, was left for dead in the place. And afterwards, when the Lieutenant was recovered and cured of his hurts, he first impioned the Tribuns: then he scourged them, & after he had martyred them, & put them to all exquisite tortures that might be devised against bondslaves, he put them to death: when they were dead, would not suffer them to be entred. Thus ye see how the goddess hath punished and taken vengeance of them that have pillaged and robbed her Temple: & never will she give over to torment and harry them with all manner of furies and hellish fiends before the sacred money be again belloyed in the chests & cofers of her treasury. Our ancestors long ago in time F "of grievous and cruel war between them and the Crononians, because the Temple standeth without the City, were desirous to remove that treasure and money from thence, into the City.
 But in the night there was a voice heard from out of the shrine, that they should hold their hands off: that the goddess herself knew well enough how to defend her own Temple. And because upon this warning they made it a matter of conscience, & were afraid to stir the treasure from thence, they would needs call a strong wall about the said Temple: & when it was brought up to a good height from the ground, behold, suddenly at once all the work came tumbling down. But both now, and oftentimes besides, hath this goddess either guarded her seat & chappel, or else if it had been any way violated, the hath been grievously revenged by some fearful example of them that have seemed to offer violence to the same. Now for the wrongs that we abide, she is not able: neither is there any other but your selves (my Lords) to right us, and revenge G "our quarrel. You are they whom we flie unto, unto your protection only in all humble manner, we have recourse. And all one it is to us, whether ye suffer Loeri to be under that Lieutenant and that garrison, or yeeld us unto Amnibal in his anger, and to the Carthaginians, for to wreak their reeven upon us & our throats. Neither require we, that you should credit and believe our complaint of him that is not now in place, without liberty of his answer & pleading for himself. Let him come: hardly let him be at the hearing himself, and spare not, let him in Gods name clear
 "and

"and acquit himself as he can. If when all is done and said, it can be proved, that he hath left un-
 "done any mischief against us, that one man can devise to do unto another, we will be content to "abide and endure all those miseries once again (if it were possible) which we have suffered al"ready, yea & to hold and declare him guiltless of all offences done both to God and man.

When the Embassadors had laid abroad those matters, and Q. Fabius demanded of them, whether they had complained unto P. Scipio, and uttered these their griefs before him, they made answer and said, "That they had sent Embassadors unto him, but he was busied in making preparation for the wars, and was either passed already over into Affrick, or upon his voyage ready to take the Seas within few dayes; and they had seen by good experience, in how great favour the Lieutenant Pleminius stood with his general: and namely, they were not ignorant how Scipio after he had heard the matter between the Tribuns and him, committed them to prison: but as for the Lieutenant, who was as faulty as the other, if not more, him he left there still in his full authority. Now after that the Embassadors were willed to go forth of the Temple where the Senat sat, the chief LL. of the Senat began with biting words to inveigh bitterly against Scipio Senat sat, the chief LL. of the Senat began with biting words to inveigh bitterly against Scipio as well as Pleminius. But above all others, Q. Fabius guided at him and said, That he was born even to corrupt and mar all military discipline. Thus (quoth he) in Spain also we have lost more by mutinies of our own soldiers, than by the wars with our enemies: for why? after a strange and forraim manner, and according to the guile of Kings, one while he cockered his soldiers and suffered them to have their will and head too much; otherwhiles he would be over sharp and cruel to them. After which rough words, he came upon them both thus with as heavy and sharp a sentence, namely, That Pleminius the Lieutenant by his consent should be had away bound in chains to Rome, and there clapt up in prison, until his cause were heard, and judicially determined: and in case those challenges were true, that the Locrians have commended against him, he should be put to death in prison, and his goods be confiscated and forfeited to the chamber of the City. As for P. Scipio, in that he presumed to depart out of his province without commission and direction from the Senat, he should be called home: and the Tribuns of the Commons dealt withal, to prefer a bill unto the people for his deprivation, and to put him besides his place of government. As touching the Locrians, his opinion was, That the Senat should give them their dispatch; and return them this answer: First, as touching the wrongs that they complained of, it was not the will and pleasure neither of the Senat nor of the people of Rome that they were done: who wished with all their hearts they had been undone: Item, that they L. acknowledged them to be good men, to be their friends and allies, and so would accept of them and call them. As to their children, their wives, and other goods taken from them whatsoever, their mind was that they should be restored again: Item, that enquiry should be made what sums of money were taken out of the treasury of Proserpina, and that two-fold restitution should be made and laid up there in stead of it: Item, that there should be a solemn purgatory sacrifice celebrated for amends and expiation of that sin; but so, as the college first of the Priests and Bishops should be consulted with, and their advice taken in that behalf, considering the sacred treasure was disquieted, laid open and violated: namely, what manner of expiations and cleansing were to be used, to what Gods, and with what beasts they should sacrifice: Finally, that all the soldiers which were at Locri should be transported over into Sicily; and in their room four cohorts of allies from out of the Latin Nation should be brought to lie in garrison there. But every Senator could not be asked his opinion and sentence that day, by reason of their difference and disagreement of minds so hotly incensed, some in favour, other in disavowal of Scipio. For besides the lewd part of Pleminius, and the calamity & oppression of the Locrians, they began to speak against the apparel of the General himself. "How he went not like a soldier and a warrior, nor so much as like a Roman: walking up and down, and squaring it out in the schools and open places of exercise with his mantle and cloak, and in his slippers and pattens, as after the Greek fashion: And that he was over bookish, and set his mind too much upon reading; and took delight to be in the fencing school and wrestling place, and all his men and guard about him, as idly and wantonly given as he, took joy in the pleasures & delightful feat of Syracusa. As for Carthage and Amibul, they were quite forgotten, and his whole army through loose-ness and liberty was spilled and clean lost, like to that of late at Sacro in Spain, and all one with them at this time in Locri, more to be feared of their friends than their enemies. And albeit these matters thus reported, were either true, or mingled with some truths, and therefore sounded all very probable; yet the opinion of Q. Marcellus prevailed: who in all other things gave his assent unto Maximus, only as touching Scipio, he varied from him. "For I can not see any reason (quoth he) how this can stand, that where erewhile the whole City chose at those young years of his, to be the only Captin for to recover Spain; of whom they made special choice to be their Consul, after that he had gotten Spain from the enemies, to end at once the Punick war: and in whom they reposed great hope, that he was the man to draw Amibul out of Italy, and to subdue all Affrick: he now should all of a sudden be called for home out of his Province, as a person almost condemned, without pleading and hearing of his cause, as if he were another Pleminius: considering that even those lewd and cruel parts which the Locrians complained of, were by their own words and confession not committed, whiles he was present in place: neither could he be charged and accused directly for ought else but only for his suzerance and com-mivency, in that upon a tender and respective indulgence of his Lieutenant, he was too remiss, and

A "and forbore to punish him with rigor. His advice therefore and opinion was, that M. Pomponius the Pretor, unto whose lot the government of Sicily, was fallen, should within three dayes next and immediately ensuing, take his journey into his province: and that the Consuls, should elect x. Commissioners or Delegates out of the Senat, such as they thought good of, and send them with the Pretor: likewise two Tribuns of the Commons, and one Edile: that the Pretor with the assistance of these personages, should sit upon a commission to enquire and know the truth: and in case they could find that those things wherewith the Locrians found themselves so much grieved, were done either by commandment and direction from Scipio, or with his will and consent; then to charge him to depart out of the province, but in such a manner as Scipio were already passed over into Affrick; then the foresaid Tribuns of the Commons, and the Edile, joining unto them two of the Delegates above said (such as the Pretor seemed most meet) should sail into Affrick; and the Tribuns and Adjuvants with them Scipio from thence: and the two Commissioners have the charge and government of the army, until such time as a new L. General succeeded and came in place. But if M. Pomponius and the ten Delegates above said, found that neither by the direction, nor with the will of P. Scipio these enormities were committed, then P. Scipio should remain still with the army, and go forward with the war as he intended. When this decree of the Senat was once passed, and an act made thereof that they were in hand with the Tribuns either to agree between themselves, or else to call lots, which two of them should go with the Pretor and the Delegates. And then the college of the Bishops were consulted with, about the expiation and making satisfaction for those things which in the Temple of Proserpina at Locri were either handled polluted, or carried forth from thence. The Tribuns of the commons that went the journey with the Pretor and the Commissioners, were M. Claudius Marcellus, & M. Cincius Alimentus: who also had an Edile of the Commons to assist them, whom they might command: if Scipio would not obey the Pretor, whether he were in Sicily, or gone over into Affrick, to apprehend and attach his body; and by virtue of their sacrosanct and inviolable authority to bring him home with them, And first they resolved to go to Locri before they went to Messina. But concerning Pleminius, the report goeth two wayes. Some say, that when he was advertised what was intended and devised against him at Rome, he purposed to go to Naples into banishment, and chanced by the way to light upon one of the Delegates above said, and so by him was perforce brought back to Rhegium. Others affirm, that Scipio himself sent out one of his D Lieutenants, accompanied with 30 of the most noble Knights or Gentlemen that he had about him, with a warrant to commit Q. Pleminius, and with him the principal Authors of the sedition, and to lay them fast in irons. But certain it is that they all, were it by the commandment of Scipio before, or then by warrant from the Pretor, were put in ward and safe-custody with the Rhegians. The Pretor and the Delegates being come to Locri, first and foremost, according to their commission, had a principal care of Religion. For all the holy money which they found by diligent search in the custody either of Pleminius, or of the soldiers, together with that which they themselves had brought with them from Rome, they bestowed again in the privy vestries where the treasure was kept: and besides, they made a solemn purgatory sacrifice for the Sacrilege. After this, the Pretor assembled the soldiers together, and commanded them to carry their Ensigns out of the E City: where himself encamped upon the plain; and proclaimed that no soldier, as he would answer at his uttermost peril, should either tarry behind, or bring forth any thing with him but his own. Then he gave the Locrians leave, that every man should lay hold upon that which he knew to be his own: and if ought were not forth-coming and to be seen, to challenge and put in his claim for it. And above all things, his pleasure was, that all bodies of free persons whatsoever, should without delay be restored unto them, and if any made default of restitution he should abide the smart and be grievously punished. Then he assembled the Locrians to an audience, and pronounced before them all, That the people and Senat of Rome granted unto them their ancient liberty, and their own laws: giving notice unto them, that whosoever had any thing to say against Pleminius, or any other person by way of accusation, he should follow him to Rhegium, and there F give attendance. Also if they were desirous to make a publick and open complaint of Scipio, namely, That the facts committed at Locri most impiously and wickedly against both God & Man, passed either under his warrant, or with his leave and liking, then they should send Embassadors to Messina, where he together with his Council and assistants would give them audience of all Delegates or Commissioners: as also to the Senat and people of Rome; and said, "They would go to accuse Pleminius. As for Scipio, although he did little to heart the injuries and wrongs done unto their City yet he was a man whose friendship they desired rather to embrace, than to entertain his enmity. And this they knew assuredly, that so many lewd pranks, and so horrible parts there plaid, were neither by the direction nor yet with the connivency and toleration of P. Scipio: his only fault was that either he trusted Pleminius overmuch, or credited them too little. And some men (say they) be of this nature, that they will have a careful regard for to prevent sin, and an earnest desire that no offence be committed, rather than courage and heart to punish and correct faults when they are once done and past. Hereupon both the Pretors & also the Commissioners with him thought themselves well eased of no small burden and charge of making farther inquiry and sitting upon the cause of Scipio. But Pleminius and two and thirty persons more with him, they condemned and sent bound in chains to Rome. They themselves went also in person to Scipio, to be eye-witnesses and to make report at Rome of their own knowledge, H as touching the manner of apparel, the idle life of the General, and the loose, dissolute, and corrupt military discipline of his soldiers; so rise and common in many mens mouths. Against their coming to Syracuse, Scipio was provided of deeds to approve his innocency, and not of words to excuse his folly. He gave order for all his forces there to meet, and for his armada to be in readiness, as if he were that day to give battail both by Land and Sea to the Carthaginians. The very same day that they arrived thither, they were friendly received and courteously entertained by Scipio. The morrow after, he shewed them all his forces, as well for Land as Sea service, not only furnished, well appointed, and in readiness; but the one fort, namely the land soldiers, running and charging one another at turney; and the Sea servants likewise within the haven, representing a naval combat with their ships. Then he led the Pretor and other commissioners all about, to see I the arsenal and armory, the store-houses the garners of corn, and all other provision and furniture for the war. At the view and sight whereof, they were stricken with such exceeding admiration, both of every thing in particular, and of all in general, that they were fully periwaded, that either by the conduct of that Captain and valour of that army, the Carthaginians might be overcome and conquered, or by none other in the world: yea, and they wished him in the name of God, without more ado to pass over into Africk, and with all speed possible to make the people of Rome to enjoy the effect of that hope which they conceived that very day, on which all the Centuries nominated and declared him with one voice the former Consul of the twain: and with fojoyous hearts they took their leave and departed thence, as if they were to bring tidings to Rome of a glorious victory; and not to make relation and report of a magnificent and barely preparation for war. Pleminius and all they that were likewise attaint and guilty, after they came to Rome, were immediately clapt up and laid fast in prison. At the first time when they were brought out before the people by the Tribunes, they could find no grace, no favour nor mercy amongst them, their minds were so forsalled and possessed aforehand, with the consideration of the wofull miseries and calamities of the poor Locrians. But afterwards, being produced ofner unto them, as the hatred conceived against him, began to wear and decay, fo mens anger grew to affwage and the hatred conceived against him, began to wear and decay, fo mens anger grew to affwage and the remembrance wital of Scipio now absent, gat him some favour with the people. Yet he died in prison, before his cause was judicially tried, and definitive sentence of him passed. Clodius Licinius reporteth in this third book of the Roman stories; that this Pleminius in the time of the games which L Africanus second time Consul, exhibited at Rome, according to a vow by him made, went about (by the help of some whom he had corrupted and waged for money) to set the City on fire in divers places, thereby to have opportunity to break prison and make an escape: but when his wicked purpose was once disclosed and brought to light, he was condemned and awarded by an act of Senat to the dungeon Tullianum. But as for Scipio, there were no words made of him, neither come he in question any where else but in the Senat: where all with one accord, both commissioners and Tribunes by extolling and magnifying with glorious words, the navy, the army and the Captain, brought it fo about, that the Senat thought good and were agreed, that with all convenient speed Scipio should over into Africk, and have liberty granted out of those armies which were in Sicily, to make choice of those whom he would himself transport over with him into M Africk, and whom he would leave behind for the guard and defence of the Province.

Whiles these things passed thus amongst the Romans: the Carthaginians also having spent all the winter time in much suspicion and continual fear, hearkning to all news, and enquiring fearfully of every messenger, and keeping watch upon all their promontories and high hills by the Sea side, bestirred themselves likewise, and procured the society and alliance of K. Syphax, a matter of no small importance for the safeguard and defence of Africk, in hope and confidence of whole amity and friendship especially, they were periwaded, that Scipio intended to fall over into Africk. Now there had been already between Asdrubal the son of Gisco and the King, not only familiar acquaintance by way of kind welcoming and reciprocal hospitality, since the time (as hath been said before) that Scipio and Asdrubal fortune to meet at one time together in the Kings house, N when they came out of Spain; but also some treaty was already begun of alliance and finity, and a motion made, that the King should espouse and wed the daughter of Asdrubal. For the assurance of this matter, and the appointment of a certain day for the solemnizing of the marriage (for now the Damoel was ready for an husband, and marriageable) Asdrubal took a journey, and seeing the King burning in love (as these Numidians of all other barbarous nations are most given that way, and exceeding amorous) he sent for the maiden from Carthage, and hastened the wedding. And among other congratulations that passed between to the end, that besides the private affinity there should be also a public league, there was an alliance concluded between the people of Carthage and the King, by giving and taking their faithful promise inter: hangably and obliging themselves by a solemn oath one to the other to observe it as well offensive as defensive, O and to have the same enemies, and the same friends for ever. But Asdrubal remembering both the friendship begun between Scipio and the King, and also how fickle and variable the natures of the Barbarians are; and fearing if Scipio should pass over into Africk that this Numidian Prince was en- not be strong enough to hold the King in: took the time whiles this Numidian Prince was all-flamed with his fresh love, induced him what with reasons, and what with the fair words and allurements of his young spouse, to send Embassadors into Sicily to Scipio, for to advise him not to pass

A pass over into Africk, nor to rely upon any confidence of him, nor yet to build upon his former promises. For himself was not only linked in matrimony with a Citizen of Carthage, the daughter of that Asdrubal whom he saw entertained as a guest in his court, but also joyed in a public league with the people of Carthage. And first he exhorted him that the Romans would war with the Carthaginians far from Africk, as hitherto they had done; for fear lest he should of necessity be forced to have an hand, and intermeddle in their quarrels; and fo while he desired to avoid the danger and hostility of one part or other, be driven at length to fight all one way: giving him more plainly to understand, that if Scipio would not forbear Africk, but needs come with an army against Carthage, then must he necessarily fight in defence of the land of Africk, wherein himself was born, and for the native country, for the father and house of his own wife. With this B commission and direction were certain Orators sent unto Scipio, who met with him at Syracuse, and there delivered their message. Scipio, albeit he was disappointed greatly of his ground-work that he had laid for his wars in Africk, and put besides his good hopes: gave the Embassadors letters into Africk unto the King, and sent them back again in all haste, before the thing were published and come abroad. In which letters he requested him earnestly to be advised and bethink himself that he brake not the rights either of friendship & hospitality begun with him, or of the league and society entered with the people of Rome: nor violated justice and fithfull promise made by giving right hands; nor yet beguile and abuse the gods, the witnesses and judges of all covenants and agreements made. But forasmuch as the coming of those Numidians could not be concealed (for they went all about the City, and were daily conversant in the Generall his lodging: and if it should have been kept secret whereabout they came, it was to be doubted lest the truth the more it was smothered and dissembled, the more it would break forth and come to light: and fo the army was to stand in fear, that they were to war at once both with the King and Carthaginians. Scipio therefore buzzed aforehand into mens heads, false devised matters, and fo withdrew them from the understanding of the truth indeed. He assembled all the time: bearing them in hand, that the C that now it was no longer staying and trifling out the time: bearing them in hand, that the Kings, his allies and confederates, importuned him to set over into Africk, with all convenient speed; that Masanesa beforetime himself in person came to Latinus, grieving and complaining that the time ran thus on in delays and doing nothing; & Syphax now sent his Embassadors, musing much and wondering what the cause should be of fo long temporizing: and requiring that either the army without more ado, should be sent over at once: or else if their minds and purposes were changed, to certify him so much, that he likewise might provide for himself and his kingdom. And D therefore he did them to wit and understand, that he intended now that he was sufficiently provided and furnished of all things; and considering that the impetrate might abide no farther (say,) to conduct his armada to Lilybannum, to wait the first good day of wind and weather, to take the seas for a bon-voiage, and with Gods grace and favour to set sail for Africk. His letters he dispatched to Marcus Pomponius to this effect, that if he thought fo good, he should repair to Lilybannum, to the end they might commune and consult together, what legions especially, and what number of soldiers he should transport over with him into Africk. In like manner, he sent a labourer at Lilybannum. Now when all the ships and serviceable men in Sicily were assembled E way at once to Lilybannum, fo as neither the City was able to receive the multitude of soldiers, nor the haven contain the number of the vessels, fo earnestly minded they were all, and fo hotly set upon their voiage into Africk, that they seemed as if they were conducted out to fight a war, but to enjoy the assured rewards of a victory. But especially above all others, the soldiers remaining of the Cannian army, were verily periwaded, that under this captain or else none, by valiantly quitting themselves in the service of the Common-weal, they should be able to end and finish their ignominious and shameful soldiery. And Scipio himself made no bare account of those kind of soldiers, as knowing full well that the defeat received at Canna, was not occasioned by their cowardice: neither were there throughout the Roman army any soldiers fo ancient and of fo long F tinuance, or fo well experienced not only in many and sundry toughen fields, but also in the assaulting of towns and Cities. And these Legions of Canna were the first and fix in order. Now when he had once resolved and given out, that he would transport them over with him into Africk, then he took a particular view of them, man by man. And having culled out those, and left them behind, whom he supposed unequal and insufficient, he substituted in their place those whom he had brought with him out of Italy: and fo fully he supplied and made up his number of those Legions, that either of them had six thousand and two hundred foot, and three hundred men of arms. He chose also out of the same army of Canna, both horsemen and footmen, of the allies and confederates of the Latine nation. What power of soldiers in the whole were set over into Africk, writers differ not a little in the number. In some authors I find, that they G were ten thousand foot, and two thousand and two hundred horse: in others, fifteen thousand footmen, and fifteen hundred horsemen. In some records again, they were more by one suite and better, namely, that have set down no number at all, amongst whom, as in a matter to doubtful and uncertain, I would my self be counted for one. But Calvus for his part, as he forebears to put down any number at all, so he seemed for to imply an infinite multitude of them, in that he saith that with a cry and shout that the soldiers set up, the very vaults of the air fell down to the ground: and and he that had seen the multitude of them when they went a shipboard, would have said there had not been a man left behind either in Italy or in Sicily. Well how many or how few (soever they were, Scipio himself took the charge to see the souldiers embarked in good order, and without any tumult. As for the sailors and mariners, who were forced below to shipboard, C. Laelius the Admirall of the navy, kept them still and quiet within their ships. M. Pomponius the Pretor had commission for to furnish the armada with corn and victuals: who made provision of food and sustenance for 45 daies: of which there was of baked meats and other viands already dreffed, as much as would suffice for 15 daies. Now when they were all embarked, he sent about to all the ships, certain pinnaces or cock-boats, and commanded all the pilots and masters of every ship with two souldiers apiece, to come into market place, there to receive their charge. When they were all met and assembled together, first he enquired of them whether they had provided and taken into their vessels fresh water sufficient both for man and beast, to hold out for many daies as their corn would serve? and when answer was made that they had water in their ships to last five and forty daies: then he charged and commanded the souldiers to keep silence and be quiet during their navigation, and without any strife and contention to be obedient unto the mariners, and willing to help in any ministry and service whatsoever, saying, that himself and L. Scipio would keep on the right wing with twenty strong ships with brazen beak heads, and C. Laelius the Admirall with M. Porcius the Treasurer on the left, with as many of the same sort, to wait over and guard the hulks and ships of burden: willing and requiring that there should be light in all their vessels, namely, that every brazen headed ship should have one: each Carrick twain: and the Admirall ship, wherein the Generall was, three lights, for a special mark, to be discerned from the rest in the night. And so he commanded the Pilots to steer and direct their course for Emporia. [The territory hereabout is most fertile and fruitful, whereby the whole country aboundeth in plenty of all things: the barbarous peasants (as commonly it falleth out in battell and plentiful lands) are cowards, and unfit for war, and it was thought they might be surpris'd and ludded before any succour could come from Carthage.] When these directions were given, they were commanded to retire to their ships, and the next morning at the signall, with the help of the gods to weigh anchor, hoist up sails and away. Many Roman Armadoes had aforetime set out of Sicily, and the very same port: but never any voyage all the time of that war, no, nor during the former, made so goodly a shew, and was so much looked on. And so marvellous for most of their other fleets were sent out only to rob and to fetch in booties and prizes. And yet if a man would esteem navies by the number and greatness of ships, there had been aforetime two Consuls together, who went over with a power of two complete armies: & in every of those fleets there were welneer as many war ships with brazen beak heads, as hulks & carricks in those that Scipio transported over. For besides fifty long ships of war, he had not all out four hundred ships of burden and passage to transport over his army with. But if we would compare both wars together, the second seemed unto the Romans more sharp and cruel than the former: both because it was fought within Italy, and also by reason of the great overthrow of so many armies, together with the losse and death of their Generall capitaine. Moreover great expectation there was of Scipio the Commander and General: of this voyage, a man much renowned and talked of, both in regard of his own noble acts of cavalry, and also of a special and singular fortune that followed him in all his exploits: where: M by he grew every day more glorious then others: which caused all mens hearts to be set upon him, beside his very resolution and mind that he carried, to pass in Africk, which all the while of that war entred into the head of any Captaine before him: in that he gave it out abroad, That he meant to go over, with intent to draw and fetch Annibal out of Italy, and to deliver and translate the war into Africk, and there to finish and make an end of it. There came running unto the haven to see the setting out of his Armado, the whole multitude, not only of the inhabitants of Lilybæum, but also the train of all the Embassages out of Sicily, which were come together for to accompany Scipio, and to do him honour, and also attended upon the Pretor of the province M. Pomponius. Over and besides, those legions also which were left behind in Sicily, went forward to bear their fellow souldiers company. So that not only the navy was a goodly prospect unto the beholders upon the land, but also the land loo overpread all about with numbers of people, made a brave and pleasant shew unto these passengers, that were in the ships. When day light once appeared, Scipio from out of the Admirall (after silence commanded by voice of the crier) praised in this wise: "O ye gods and goddesses all, that haunt and inhabit seas and lands both, I beseech and pray you to vouchsafe, that all that ever hath been done already, is now intended, or shall hereafter be enterprised, during my conduct and government, may speed well, and turn to the good of my self, the people and commonwealth of Rome, our allies, and especially those of the Latine nation: who by land, by sea, by rivers, follow the direction, command, government, and fortune of my self, and of the people of Rome, and that in all our actions ye would be good, gracious, favourable, and helpful unto us, and advance all our proceedings: that ye would grant us the victory over our enemies: and after we have subdued them, to continue safe and sound: and adorned with their goodly spoils, laden with their rich pillage to return home all together with glorious triumph: & give us the hand and opportunity to be revenged of our foes and mortal enemies: and design me and the people of Rome that power and strength, to execute upon the City of the Carthaginians those fearful examples of cruelty, which the people of Carthage intended to practise and bring upon our City and

A "and state. After these prayers thus pronounced, he took the row inwards and partenance of the beak killed for sacrifice (as the manner is) and flung them into the sea: and with that by sound of trumpet, gave the signall of departure.

Now were they under sail: having a good great gale of a forewind, they soon lost the sight of land. In the afternoon, there began to fall a thick mist; by reason whereof the ships could hardly avoid running one upon another. But when they were once in the main and deeper sea, the wind became more mild: and all the night following, the same dark mist continued still. After the sun was once up it brake and dispersed, and then the wind again grew big and high, by which time they might discover land. And not long after, the pilot laid unto Scipio, that they were not full too leagues from Africk; and that he saw well and discerned the cape or point of Moronium: and if his will and pleasure were thither to direct their course, presently the whole armada should be in the rode, Scipio so soon as he was within view of land, after he had made his prayers unto the gods, to bless this first discovery of Africk to his own good and the benefit of the common-weal: gave commandment to sail still, and to put with the shore and ride at anchor in some bay beneath. So they made way with the same wind. But about that very time as the day before, they were mist again, and lost the sight of land. And as the fog increased, the wind fell: the night also that came upon them besides, made all things more doubtful. Whereupon they cast anchor, for fear that the ships should hit one against another, or run aground. When day light awoke, the same wind was up again, but the foggy mist scattered; and then they might see plainly all the coast of Africk. Scipio then demanded what promontory it was that he saw next; and hearing that the name of it was The head Pelicurnum, [or The fair Cape.] the name (quoth he) please me, and the preface thereof I like full well; even thither put the ships afloat, and so the armada entred the bay, and all the host was set ashore. Thus have I reported that they had a prosperous voyage without any fearfull danger, or much trouble: giving credit hereunto very many writers, as well Greeks as Latines. Only Celms (setting aside that the ships were not call away and drowned amid the surging waves) writeth how other dangers both of water and weather encountered them in so much as at the last the Armado was driven by tempest from the coasts of Africk, and fell upon the land * Agimurum, from whence they had much ado to recover their direct course again; and finally when the ships were at hand to link under the water, then the souldiers faring like men at point to suffer shipwrack, without silence and commandment of their Generall and without their armor, in great fear made shift with boats to recover the shore.

The Romans thus being landed, pitched their tents among the hills next adjoining. By which time the terror and fearfull fright of this their arrivall was not entred only into the Maritime coasts and territories bounding upon the sea, first upon the discovery of the fleet, and afterwards by reason of the rumor and tumult of the army, as it came ashore; but also spread forward as far as to the good towns and very Cities. For not only the high waies were all filled and overpiled with multitudes of men, women and children, who went by heaps together one with another; but also the country peasants drave before them whole herds of cattell: as a man would have said that had seen it, how all Africk was like to be abandoned at once on a suddain: in such sort, as they put the Cities indeed in greater fear & perplexity then they were themselves, and especially Carthage above all others: where there was no lesse trouble and hurlyburly, then if it had been surpris'd and forced by the enemy. For since that time that M. Attilius Regulus, and L. Manlius were Coff, for the space almost of fifty years, they had not once so much as seen an army of Romans, but only certain fleets of rovers and men of war, who had landed at times, and made some rodes into the lands lying upon the sea side: and when they had harried some prizes, such as came next hand, they ever were retired again to the ships, before the alarme could be given to raise the country. The greater therefore now was both the flight and fright within the City. And to speak a truth, good cause they had; by reason that there was neither at home in readines an army of puissance to encounter the enemy, nor a captain of valour to conduct and lead an army. Asdrubal was the son of Gisco, for nobility and high parentage, for honour and renown, for wealth and riches, and besides for the new affinity then contracted with King, was of all others the personage by many degrees, yea, and the only man of the whole State. And him they remembered very well to have been foiled, discomfited and beaten out of the field in Spain, by the self-same Scipio in divers and sundry battels. Also they made account, they were no more able to match the Captains man for man, than to compare and set their tumultuary power raised in halt, with the staid and experienced army of the Romans. Therefore they gave the alarm presently, as if Scipio were ready to assault Carthage out of hand: the gates with all speed were shut and made sure: the walls manned with souldiers: the corps de guard set: watch and ward kept: and all the night following the Sentinels duly relieved and maintained. The next day, 300 light horse were sent out as espials and vancurriers to discover and scour the quarters to the sea side: and withall to impeach them that were a disbarking and coming: and who chanced to light on the Romans corps de guard. For Scipio had sent away the fleet already to Vicia, and before he was gone up into the land far from the sea, had encamped upon the next hills thereby, placed guards of horsemen in convenient places, and put out certain foragers into the fields and villages for to raise booties. These having entred skirmish with the Carthaginian cornet and horsemen, slew a few of them in the very conflict, but most of them, as they fled and were followed in chase, amongst whom was Hanno also the provost marshal, a noble young gentleman, Scipio not only walked the country all about, but also was a City of the Africans that stood neere it, and was of sufficient wealth: where besides other pillage, which was presently imbarked in the ships of burden and sent into Sicily, there were taken prisoners eight thousand polles of free and bond one with another. But the greatest joy and contentment that the Romans took in this new entrance, and beginning of their warlike actions, was for the coming of Masanissa: whom some report to have presented himself with 200 horse and no more: but the most do write that he came with 2000. But for as much as this Masanissa was of all other Kings for his time the greatest Prince and most puissant; and withall he that stood the Romans in best stead and helped their state, none like unto him: me thinks it were worth his labor, and would quit for all the paines, to digresse a little out of the way, for to shew and declare in what variety of alternative fortune he was tossed, both in the losse and also in the recovery of the inheritance of his fathers kingdom.

This Masanissa, while he was employed during the wars of Spain, in the defence and quarrell of the Carthaginians; his father, whose name was Gala, hapned to die: and then the kingdom fell by descent, according to the custome and manner of the Numidians unto Desalees the late Kings brother, a man of great years and very aged. And not long after, when Desalees also was departed his life, Capusa the elder of his two sons, (for the other was a very child) succeeded in his fathers kingdom. But for as much as he the foresaid Capusa maintained his royall state and throne, more by reason of the authority and reputation that he carried among his friends and favorites, than by power and strength: there arose up in arms one named Macesinus (who also was defended of royal blood, but of an house that was ever of the adverse and contrarie side) and contended in much variety of fortune about the crown, with those who then (wayed the scepter. This Macesinus having gathered a power of his tenants, followers, and peasants of the country (with whom he carried a great stroke and was highly esteemed, by reason of the hatred that they bare unto the Kings race) encamped openly and shewed himself in action, yes, and forced the King to come into the field, and to trye the title of the crown in a set battell by dint of sword. In which conflict, Capusa, together with many of his peers and nobles were slain, and the whole nation and feignory of the Massilians, was reduced under the rule and obedience of Macesinus. Howbeit he forbore to be called King, and contenting himself with the mean name of Tutor or Protector, gave the Kings title to the child Laenaxus, who only remained alive of the Kings issue and line. He took to wife a noble dame and lady of Carthage, Annibal his niece by his sister who had been lately wedded unto King Desalees, hoping thereby to enter into league and alliance with the Carthaginians: and besides, for to renew the ancient familiarity and amity with Syphax, he sent Embassadors unto him of purpose. Thus made he himself strong aforehand against Masanissa.

Masanissa likewise for his part, being advertised of his uncles death, and also how his cousin german was deceased, crossed the seas out of Spain over to Numisania, at what time as Bocherus was King of the Moors. At whose hands by humble sure and importunate prayers in most lowly manner, he obtained a power of 4500 Moores to accompany him in the journey, for otherwise to employ them in war he might not. And after he had dispatched a messenger afore-hand to those that were his fathers friends and well-willers to himself, by that time that he was come with them to the confines of his realm, there met him almost 500 Numidians. Having therefore sent back again the Moores from thence unto the King, according to covenant, albeit there was assembled together a smaller number of people than he hoped and looked for, and not so sufficient that he durst adventure upon so great an enterprise; and supposing withall, that by entering into some action, and by travell and endeavour, he should gather strength still to perform some great exploit, he encountered at Thapsus the young King Laenaxus, as he journeyed unto Syphax. And when the Kings company in great fear fled into the town, Masanissa both at the first assault won the said town, and also of the Kings train received some that yielded themselves, and slew other some that made resistance for their own defence. But the greatest part with the child himself the young Prince, got away in that tumult and escaped unto Syphax, unto whom at first they intended their journey. The issue of this small thing, so happily achieved in the first beginning and entrance of his affairs, caused all the Numidians to revolt and side with Masanissa. So as there flocked unto him from all parts of the country, and out of the villages, the old soldiers of King Gala, and incited the young Prince, and set him on to recover his fathers kingdom. Now in number of soldiers, Macesinus was a good deal superior: for both himself and the same army still entire, with which he had vanquished Capusa, besides, had some others that after the slaughter of the King, he had received upon their yielding: and also young Laenaxus the infant, had brought great aids from Syphax: so that Macesinus was fifteen thousand foot, and ten thousand horse strong. With whom Masanissa, albeit he were nothing so puissant either in foot or horse, fought a battell; yet achieved he the victory, through the approved valour of the old soldiers, and his own politick wisdom, being a captain well experienced and exercised both in the Roman and Punick wars. The young Prince together with his tutor and protector, and some small number of Massilians, fled and escaped, into the territories of the Carthaginians. Thus Masanissa having recovered his fathers kingdom, and foreseeing that there remained still behind a far greater bickerment and encounter with Syphax, & taking it to be the best course and policy for him to be reconciled and made friends with his cousin german: addressed certain messengers both unto the child, for to put him in good hope and assurance, that if he would submit and yeeld himselfe under the protection

A of Masanissa, he should live in as honourable place and degree with him, as Desalees sometime had done with his father Gala: and also to Macesinus to give their word and promise unto him, not only for impunity of all trespasses, but also for faithfull restitution of all things that were his. By which means he persuaded both of them to take part with him: who made choice of a mean estate at home in their own country, rather than to live in exile: notwithstanding the Carthaginians impoured all that ever they could to the contrary.

A Annibal hapned at that time when these occurrences fell out, to make his abode with Syphax who finding the Numidian King Syphax resolved upon this point, and fully persuaded, that he mattered not, nor imported himself much, whether Laenaxus or Masanissa were King of the Massilians, replied unto him and said, that he was foolishly deceived if he thought that Masanissa would keep himself within those terms, that either his father Gala or his uncle Desalees held himself contented with: No, no, (quoth he) there is much more to be towne and in him, far greater signs of bauty mind and forward wit, and spirit appear in him, than ever shewed in any of his house and line before him. Full often hath he in Spain made good proof of rare valour and singular prowesse, as well unto his friends as his enemies. And let both Syphax and the Carthaginians look as well about them as they can, for unless they put out this sparkle of fire betimes, and even at the first beginning, it will be their chance to be caught therewith, when it shall burn forth; and altho they shall not be to help the matter and quench the rage thereof. Mary, as yet his strength is small and slender, his forces frail, tender, and feeble, and not well united together to maintain his state, unless as he is in his kingdom. Thus he importuned him still by reasons and persuasions, until at length he reduced him to lead forth an army into the confines of the Massilians and there in that territory, about the title whereof he had oftentimes not only contended by plea and words with Gala, but also by arms and dint of sword, to encamp himself as in his rightfull and undoubted inheritance: with this director, that if any came against him to warn him off the ground, then to trie his interest by sword: which was the only way to be taken and most for the purpose: but in case for fear of him they quit the possession quietly, then to advance forward into the heart of the kingdom: for either the Massilians would without battell render themselves under subjection, or else in a pitched field not be able to stand out against him. Upon these suggestions Syphax was incited and pricked on; inso much as he made war upon Masanissa, and in the first battell discomfited and put to flight the Massilians. And Masanissa with some few horsemen fled out the held and escaped unto a mountain which the inhabitants call Balbus. Certain wofull families and households with their sheeds and tents, together with their cattell (which is all their riches) went after and followed the King. But all the multitude of the Massilians besides, did homage unto Syphax and came under his obedience. This mountain afore said, which the exiles that fled their country were possessed of, was plentifull of grasse well watered; and being so good for pasture to feed their cattell, it yielded sufficient maintenance and food abundant, for the people that used to live upon flesh and milk. From hence they began at first to steal out by night and make roades out afterwards in open day light to rob and spoil all the country about: but above all others to fire and burn the territory of the Carthaginians: both because there were more prizes to be had from thence, than from the Numidians; & also for that it was more safe robbing and harrying there without danger. This they practised so long, so licentious, and in such scornfull manner, that now they would, carrie their booties to the seaside, and make markets & sale thereof to the merchants: and for this purpose divers ships arrived thither to traffick: yes, and other whiles there were many of the Carthaginians cut off and came short home, and more of them were either slain or taken prisoners then oftentimes in open war and set battels. The Carthaginians bewailed and complained of these ravages unto Syphax, and spurred him forward (disposed well enough as he was of himself to revenge) for to pursue the reliques of the war, in his own person. But forasmuch as he was not thought to stand with the royall Majesty of a King, to chase and hunt a rabble of vagrant thieves about the mountains; therefore Bocher one of the Kings Captains, a right hardy and valorous man, was chosen to do the feat, and to perform that service. Who had the conduct of four thousand foot, and two thousand horse: and was promised besides, great gifts and mighty rewards, in case he brought away the head of Masanissa: but if he could take him prisoner alive, that were alone indeed, and a peevish piece of work, of inestimable joy beyond all measure. He waiting his time when the enemies were dragging reticlessly abroad came upon them at unawares and charged them, and having singled from the guard of the armed soldiers, a huge number both of people and cattell, he forced Masanissa himself with some few horsemen to take the top of the mountain. From whence after he had sent away unto the King (as if the war had now been at point of an end) not only a great body of people and cattell, the which he had taken, but also part of his forces, as being much greater in proportion, then for to dispatch the remnants of a war, accompanied with no more then five hundred foot, and two hundred horse, he pursued Masanissa being come down from the hill tops, and there having beset and stopped the passages at both ends, enclosed him within the freight and narrow valley. Where there was committed a great execution and slaughter of the Massilians, but Masanissa with fifty horsemen and not above, got away through the unknown and hidden cranks of the mountain, and escaped the hands of the pursuers. Howbeit, Bocher traced him still, and followed him at heels so narrowly, that neer to the City Clupes he overtook him in the plains, where he so freightly environed him about, that he killed all his company every one, save only four horsemen.

With whom in that tumult he let slip as it were out of his hands Mafaniffa also himself fore H wounded and loit him clean. As he fled, he had fill in his eye certain comets of horsemen dispersed all over the plain, and some of them crossing the waies overtoward to meet the enemy at every turn, and to intercept him. But he and the four horsemen with him fled forwards fill, and took the great river before them: for their fear and fright was greater then to make any stay at the bank side, but to put their horses to it, and plunge in: where they were carried with the current of the stream and born to a side: two of them in the fight of the enemies were swallowed up of the deep whirlpits: himself also was supposed to have perished with them, but he and the other two horsemen besides caught hold of certain twigs of osiers that grew under the banks on the farther side. So Bochar made an end of farther pursuit, as neither daring to take the river, nor believing that he had any enemy for to chase. And thus returned he to the King with false news, that Mafaniffa was drowned. And divers poets and curriers were sent out to Carthage, to report these exceeding joyfull tidings. This rumour and fame of Mafaniffa his death being noised all over Africke wrought diversly in the minds of men. But Mafaniffa keeping himself close in a secret cave, whiles he cured his hurt with certain herbes, lived for some daies by the foraging and robbery of the other two horsemen. So soon as the wound was once healed up and skinned over, and that he thought himself able to abide the sitting and making of his horse, with exceeding courage & boldness he set forward again to claim and recover his kingdom. And having in the way as he passed gotten together unto him not above forty horse, by that time he was come among the Maffians, and gave out openly who he was, he prevailed to much with them, that as well in regard of their ancient favour and love toward him, as also for the unexpected joy that they saw him alive and found, whom they verily beleieved to have been dead: within few daies there were gathered and assembled unto him 6000 foot, and 4000 horse. So as not only he was restored again, and put in full possession of his fathers Kingdom, but also waited and spoiled the confederat nations of the Carthaginians, yea, and the frontiers and confines of the Maffiys, which belongeth to the Kingdom and dominion of Syphax. Having thus provoked Syphax to war, he set him down and encamped between the Cities of Cirta and Hippo, upon the ridge of certain hills, places of advantage and commodious in all respects. Then Syphax supposing it a greater peece of work, and of more importance then to be managed by his captains, sent part of his forces under the conduct of his son, the young Prince named Vermina, and gave order unto him to wheel about with his power, and whiles the enemy was amused upon himself one way, to charge upon him behind another way. So Vermina set forth, and took his way by night, because he was to give the charge secretly, and in secret. But Syphax, who was to show himself with banner displayed, and to bid the enemy battell, marched openly by day light, and advanced forward. And when the time (as he thought) was come, wherein they that were lent about to fetch a compass, might reach to the place appointed, himself also truiting as well in the multitude of his men, as in the ambush laid before at the enemies back, set his battell in array: directly upon the side of the hill, which with gentle and easie ascent ariseth, and leadeth towards the enemy. Mafaniffa likewise arranged his men, presuming most of all in the plot of ground, which served much better for his advantage to fight. The battell was sharp and cruell, and for a long time doubtfull. Whiles the sit of the place, and valour of the souldiers much helped Mafaniffa, and the number again on the other side, which M exceeded beyond all measure, and made too great odds, availed Syphax. This multitude divided into two battallions, whiles the one was opposed against the enemy, and the other compassed about their tail and back part, gave the victory cleer unto Syphax: inomuch, as the enemy thus enclosed both before and behind, had no way in the world to escape. Whereupon all the footmen and horsemen both were either killed or taken prisoners. Only two hundred horsemen of very near to many, which were gathered in a ring together about Mafaniffa, he commanded to cast themselves by troops and squadrons into three severall companies, and so to pierce and break through; but first he appointed them a certain place before, where they should rally and meet together again after their scattered flight. Himself in person, on one side which he had proposed to himself before, made means to pass through the very pikes and darts of the enemies, and escaped. Two of those squadrons rallied still behind, the one for fear yielded to the enemy, the other sticking to it, and making more resistance, was overcharged with shot of arrows and darts. But Mafaniffa winding in and out, and to and fro, deluded Vermina, who pressed hard upon him, and followed him self at heels: and after he had wearied him out at length in tedious travail and desperate pursuit, caused him perforce to give over the chase. Whiles he himself with seventy horsemen away as far as to the left of Syrtes, where he set up his rest, and quieted his conscience, in that he hadio often right valiantly fought to recover the inheritance of his fathers Kingdom: and led his life between the Panick Emporia and the nation of the Garamants, until the arrival of the Roman navy, and C. Lelium into Africke. These presumptions induce me to think and believe, that Mafaniffa came afterwards also unto Scipio with a small power of horsemen, rather then with any great aid. For that multitude was befitting the state of a Prince, established in his Kingdom, but this small number beleemed the mean condition and fortune of a poor exile and banished man.

Now to return again unto our story. The Carthaginians having loit the corner of horsemen aforeaid, together with their captain, and raised another power of horse, by taking new multiers made Hanno the son of Amilca commander over them. And first by messengers and letters misjive

A misjive they sent for Afrubal and Syphax one after another, and at last also even by Embassadors and Orators. As for Afrubal, they required him to succour his native country, beset in manner round about: Syphax they beought and requested to provide for the safety and fence of Carthage and all Africke.

At that time Scipio was encamped near Frica, within a mile of the City: for he was removed from the side, where some few daies, he kept a standing camp close to the fleet. Hanno having received a power of Cavalry, nothing sufficient and strong enough to charge upon the enemy, nor so much as to guard and defend the country from waiking and spoiling, first before all other things c it about and devised, how he might augment his number of horsemen by a new levy and enrolment. And albeit he rejected none of other nations, yet he levied and waged the Numidians especially, the best horsemen simply in all Africke. Now had he gathered together upon four thousand and five, when he surprised a City named Salera, almost fifteen miles from the Roman camp. And when word was brought to Scipio, that so great a Cavalry tooked their summer standing harbour within a town; I tell you (quoth he) I pause not, if they were more then they are, so long as they have such a one to be their leader. And thinking with himself that the more slowly the enemies went to work, the lesse he was to slack his business, he sent Mafaniffa before with the horsemen, and gave commandment to ride up and down before the gates, to brave the enemy, and to train him forth to fight: with this direction, that when their whole multitude was sifted forth, and the skirmish grown to hot, that he might not well endure the charge, he should give ground and retreat by little and little, for he would himself come in due time to the battell. And laying no longer behind, than whiles he thought Mafaniffa who was gone before, had time enough to train the enemies forth, he followed after in person with the Roman horsemen, & marched closely under the hills (which stood fitly for the purpose, opposite between him and the enemy) about every turning of the way. Mafaniffa for the purpose according to the direction given him, one while right couragiously galloped before the gates, as one that would brave and terrifie the enemy, another while as it had been afraid himself, gave back; and by this counterfeit shew of feartfulness, he made the enemies more bold and venturesome, and drew them on to pursue him rashly. But as yet they were not all gone forth, and their captain was diversly troubled, and had much ado with them, while he was faine to force and compell some that had taken their load of wine, and were heavy-headed and sleepy withall, to arm themselves and to bridle their horses, and to fly others D from running out of the gates at once confusedly, without order or array, and without their colours. Mafaniffa caught up thole, and cut them short, that a part from their company at the first setting out, rode venturously forward, and took no heed to themselves: but when more of them rushed forth at once out of the gate, the skirmish was maintained with equal valour on both sides and at last, when the horsemen were shod and joyaned in battell, Mafaniffa was not possibly able to hold out any longer. Howbeit he did not outright, but as he gave back leisurely, he received them as they violently charged upon him: so long, until he had trained them to those hills, under which the Roman Cavalry lay hidden. Then rode the horsemen from out of their ambush, themselves in heart, and their horses fresh, and environed Hanno and the Africans, who with fighting and following were tired out and overwinded: Mafaniffa likewise turned his horses suddenly, and made head again, and returned to battell afresh: so there were environed, intercepted, and killed in the place together with Hanno himself the General, full upon a thousand, even as many as were in the vanguard, and could not well retire themselves backward. There left affrighted with the death of their leader, fled with bridle on horse neck: whom for the space of three miles the conquerors followed in chase upon the spur, and either slew and took prisoners two thousand horsemen of them besides. Amongst whom there were, as it is for certain known, no fewer than two hundred natural Carthaginians, men of armes, and divers of them of good mark, both in regard of wealth and riches, as also of birth and noble parentage.

It rumored that the very same day when this happened, the ships which had transported over the booty in to Sicily, returned back charged with provision of victuall, as if they had prelagged & foretold by their arrival, that they were come for a new pillage and fresh prizes. But all writers do not record, that two Carthaginian captains of one name were slain in two battels, of the Cavalry: for fear as I verily take it, left by telling one thing twice, they might seem to deceive and abuse the reader. Centes Calvus and Valerius report that Hanno was taken prisoner. Then Scipio bestowed rich gifts upon the captains and horsemen according to their good service, and as they every one deserved: but above all the rest, he highly rewarded Mafaniffa. And when he had placed a strong garrison in Salera, himself with the rest of his army made rode: and not only waded and spoiled the lands and villages all the way as he went, but also forced and won certain Cities and borough towns: and so having filled all places far and near with the terror of war & hostilities, he returned to the camp: the seventh day after he set forth, bringing with him great numbers of people, much store of cattell and prizes of all sorts, and so dispatched away the ships. Second time G freight and laden with spoils of the enemies. After this he set aside all light expeditions, small rides and escape of the country towns, and bent his whole power and all his forces against Frica: intending if he had once won it, to settle himself there, and to make it his seat from thence forward, and a sure place of defence in all his other exploits that he meant to perform. Thither at onetime were the sea-servitors brought from the armada, to that part of the City where the sea beateth upon the wals: likewise the land souldiers advanced from the hill that overlooketh the

* Golfo di Capo. These Syrtes, as well the lesse, are in the Mediterranean sea near Africke full of shelves and bars: and are called Scythae or Bassae of Babylon. The sea coasts near the Syrtes, be called for their fertility, as Ortelius hath noted out of Polybius.

During the time of that summer, wherein those occurrences passed in Africa, P. Sempronius

During the time of that summer, wherein those occurrences passed in Africa, P. Sempronius the Consul who governed the Province of the Bruttii, astonished suddenly in a disorderd manner with Annibal upon the very way, within the territory of Croton, where the fight was maintained rather by squadrons and companies, one to one, then by any set body of a ranged battell. The Romans were discomfited; and having lost in this conflict (which might more truly be called a turbulent scuffling, than a full fight) upon 1200 of the Consuls army they retired in great haste and terror to their camp. Yet durst not the enemies make an assault upon them within their hold. But the Consul dislodged from thence in the dead time of the next night, and having dispatched a courier before unto P. Licinius the Vice-consul, to come forward with his legions, he joynd his M power unto them, so they returned again unto Annibal, being now two Generals, and two entire armies. And without any stay, to battell they went: whilst the Consul on the one side flood upon this his power redoubled and reinforced, & Annibal on the other side took heart for his fresh victory alreadie. Sempronius advanced with his legions into the vanguard & P. Licinius with his, kept the reerward. (The Consul at the very first flock and beginning of the conflict, showed a chappell to Porcius, under the name of Primigenia, in case he might have the honour of that day, and vanquish his enemies. And surely his vow was heard; and he obtained his desire: for the Carthaginians were discomfited and put to flight, more than four thousand armed men flaine, three hundred or somewhat under taken prisoners, forty horse of service got alive, and 12 ensignes won and carried away. Annibal dismayed and daunted at this adverse and unlucky battell, withdrew his forces to Croton.

At the same time M. Cornelius the Consul, in another side of Italy held in awe Heiraculus so much by force of arms; as by rigorous punishment of law and severe justice: for all that country in manner was turned to Mage, and by his means and favor hoped for a change, and were altogether set upon novelties & an alteration of the state. The examinations and judicial trials of these matters the Consul followed by virtue of commission from the Senat, and not upon his own motive and feeling: and went through there withy, letting aside all partiality, nor treating respectively of favour or displeasure. In such fort, that many of the nobility of Italyana (such as either had repaired themselves in person, or had sent their agents unto Mage, for to treat with him about the revolt and rebellion of the States wherein they lived) were at first, as many as made personal appearance, condemned: but afterwards, such as had guilty confessions, went into voluntary exile: and being condemned in their absence, in stead of their bodies which were generous of the way, they yielded and left behind them their goods only, which might be forfeit and confiscate a pawns to pay for the punishment of their perions.

Whiles the Coff. was thus employed, in divers places one from the other, the Centors in the mean

A mean time at Rome, M. Livius and C. Claudius held a new choice and review of Senators: and Q. Fabius was once again elected the principal Senator and President of the Senat. Seven in number of them were noted with ignominy and disgrace, but not one of all those had fitten in the ivory chair and born office of state. They looked narrowly and most faithfully to the Publicans, that had the charge of the City-buildings to see them kept wind-tight and water-tight, and in sufficient reparations. They publicly gave order for a paved caufie to be made, from the beasls market unto the temple of Venus, and all about the shops and scaffolds in the shew-places. Also the church Magna Mater (the great mother of the gods) they cued to be built in the mount Palatine. They instituted also a new tax and impolent out of the provision of salt. And whereas both at Rome and throughout all Italy, talk was told at a Sextant by the Modus, they let and farmed this common-Burrow, he inheritance of the two Caesars.

Surely that reciprocal debate between the two Censors, in depraving and defaming one another but as a lewd and naughty part by them plaid: but this chastisement of the peoples levity and incontinency, was a worthy thing, and befitting the Censors gravity of that time. While the Censors stood thus in exceeding disgrace and hatred with the people, Cn. Bibulus a Tribune of the Commons taking his time and occasion hereby to rise and become great, ended them both and commenced an action against them before the body of the people. But this deignement of his was for naught and came to nothing, though the general accord and content of the L. of the council, to the end that in time to come, no such example might be extant upon record, that the Censors dignity should be expoled to the variable and inconstant pleasure of the people.

The same summer in the Britains country, Cornelius had been already forced and won by the Cos, when as Consuetus and Pandulus, with other mean and base peepes, willingly yielded themselves to his devotion. Now when the time drew neerer of the election of new magistrates, it was thought good that Cornelius should be sent for to Rome out of Tifensy, where there was no war at all, rather then the other Conful out of his province: who being come, created for Consuls Cn. Servilius Caelus, and Cn. Servilius Geminus. After this, the court was assembled for the chusing of Pretours, where wherein were elected P. Cornelius Lepidus, P. Quinctilius Varus, P. Aelius Pains, and P. Villius Tappus. These two last were Ediles of the Commons when they were chosen Pretors. The Consul after these elections were finished and past, returned unto his army again in Hispania. Certain Knights and Prelats that year died, and new were chosen in their rooms. P. Veturius Philo, Flamin Asiarius was created, installed and inaugurated; instead of M. Aemilius Regillus, who deceased the year before. And in place of M. Pomponius Mator, who was both Augur and Decemvir there, was advanced into dignity of Decemvir, M. Atridius Cato: and into the office of Augur, Tit. Sempronius Gracchus, a very young man: a rare thing to be seen in those daies, in the bestowing of lacedaemonian and church promotions. In that year was let up in the capitol a chariot drawn with 4 steeds, all of beaten gold, by C. Livius and M. Servilius Geminus, Ediles of the chair for the time being. The Roman games also were exhibited & renewed again for a daies: likewise the plais & pastimes called Plebei, for other 2 daies by the Ediles of the Commons, P. Aelius & P. Villius. I And for the great honour of those games, the feast of Jupiter was solemnly kept and celebrated.

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

IN Affrick, Scipio by the help of Malanilla in sundry Battels vanquished the Carthaginians, together with the afore-said Syphax King of the Numidians, and Adrubal. He won and sacked two camps of the enemies, wherein there perished by fire and sword, to the number of 40000 men. By the means of C. Lelzius he took Syphax alive. Malanilla whom he had taken prisoner queen Sophonisba, the wife of Syphax and daughter of Adrubal, by and by fell in love with her, and by way of marriage took her to wife: but being chafed and rebuked therefore by Scipio, he sent unto her a cup of poison, which she drank, & thereof died. By manifest victory of Scipio it came to pass, that the Carthaginians driven to despair, were faine to call for Annibal out of Italy, to save the main chance, and defend their towne & state. Who, in the 16 year of the war, departed out of Italy, sailed over into Affrick, & assailed by means of conference, to make peace with Scipio. And when they could not agree about the conditions & capitulations thereof, he fought, & was overthrowen in the plain field. The Carthaginians at their faint strength had peace granted. And when Gilgo dissuaded that peace, Annibal struck him back with his hand, & after some excuse made of his rudeness, in that behalf himself spake for peace. Mago who had fought with the Romans in the country of the Insubrians was grievously wounded, & being sent for home in to Affrick by certain ambassadors, in the way died of his hurt. Malanilla was fully restored to his kingdom. Scipio being returned to the City of Rome, had the glory of a most honourable and noble triumph: whom, Q. Terentius Colles, a Senator, followed with a cap [of freedom] upon his head. Scipio was surnamed Africanus: but doubtful it is, whether he came by that title through the favour of his soldiers before, or the general applause and affection of the people. But this is certain, that he was the first general that ever was intitled in his title, with the surname of a nation by himself conquered.

The thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

Vhen Cn. Servilius Caelio, and C. Servilius Geminus (Cons. in that year, which by computation was the 16 of the 2^d Punic war) propoed unto the Senat, concerning the affairs of the State, the managing of the wars, and the government of the provinces: the LL. ordained and gave order, that the Cons. should either agree between themselves, or else call others whether of them should go into the Brutian land against Annibal, and whether should take upon him the charge of the province of Hispania and the Ligurians: with commission for him, whose hap it was to rule the province of Bruttii, to receive the army from P. Sempronius the Consul; and the said P. Sempronius (for he also as Vice-consul was to continue in place of government one year longer) to succeed in the room of P. Licinius, who was to return home to Rome. This P. Sempronius among other commendable parts (wherein no Citizen in his time was counted more sufficiently furnished than himself) was taken also for a brave warrior and man at arms. For being richly endued with all those good blessings that either nature or fortune can afford unto a man, he was both noble in birth, and wealthy in substance. In his usual personage he excelled, for strength of body he far surpassed. Of tongue and speech he was thought most eloquent, whether he were to plead a cause at the bar, or occasion offered either in Senat house or before the assembly of the people to persuade or dissuade, to give counsel one way or other. In the Pontifical canon and laws, he was singularly well learned and skillful. Besides all these positive worthy qualities (Livy) his Consulship had given him experience also in military affairs, and made him a worthy soldier. The same order that was taken for the Brutians pro-

A vince, was also decreed for Hispania and the Ligurians. M. Cornelius was commanded to put over and deliver up his army to the new Consul: and himself to continue still in government, and to rule the province of France with the strength of those legions which L. Scribonius the Pretor had under his charge the year before. After this, the Consuls call lots for their provinces. Unto Caelio fell the Bruttii, unto Servilius Geminus, Hispania. Then the Pretors provinces also were put to the choice of lottery. And P. Aelius his lot was to have the jurisdiction of the City of Rome: P. Lentulus to rule Sardinia: P. Villius to govern Sicily: and Quinctilius Varus to have the charge of Arminum with two legions, which were commanded by Sp. Lucretius. And Lucretius had his commission revived again for a longer time, to the end, that he might redifie the towne Genoa, which by Mago the Carthaginian had been rased and destroyed. As for P. Scipio his commission and government was not limited by any expresse time, but only with the end of the wars, and to continue until those wars in Affrick were fully determined. A decree also passed, that there should be a solemn procession and supplication for this effect, and in these terms, that whereas he had sailed over into the province of Affrick, this voyage and expedition of his might turn to the safety and good of the people of Rome, of himself, and his army. In Sicily were enrolled three thousand soldiers. And for as much as the whole strength and manhood of that province had been shipped over into Affrick: for fear lest some Armado should cut over out of Affrick, it was thought expedient to guard all the sea coasts of Sicily, with a fleet of 40 sail. And Villius had with him into Sicily 13 ships, newly built; the rest of the old ships in Sicily were repaired. For Admirall of that armado was appointed M. Pomponius the Pretor of the former year, whose government was prorogued, and he embarked the new soldiers brought out of Italy. The like number of ships the LL. of the Senat assigned unto Cn. Octavius the Pretor of the former year, with the same commission of government, for to defend the coasts of Sardinia. And Lentulus was commanded to allow unto the Pretor 2000 soldiers for to man and furnish those ships. Moreover, the sea coasts of Italy, because it was uncertain to what parts the Carthaginians would make out their navy (and like it was, that where they should cipy any place weak and destituted of sufficient strength and garrison, thither they would direct and bend their forces) were committed to M. Marcius the Pretor of the former year, that he should scour the seas, and keep that tide, with as many ships as the other. And for to furnish that fleet of his, the Consuls by order from the Senat enrolled three thousand soldiers, and reserved two legions besides, against all doubtful chances of war.

D whatsoever. As for the two provinces of Spain, together with the armies there, and the whole government they were appointed to the old Generals, L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus. So the Roman war for that year were maintained with 20 legions in all & with a hundred and sixty ships of war. Then the Pretors were commanded to take their journey into their several provinces. But the Consuls were charged before they departed from the City, to exhibit those great Games, which T. Manlius Torquatus the Dictor had vowed against the 5 years end, if it be the Commonwealth remained in the same good and fortunate estate, during that time.

Now there entered into mens minds new doubts and strange scruples of conscience, by reason divers prodigious sights and tokens reported out of many places. For believed it was that certain ravens not only pecked and raled with their bills, but also eat and devoured the gold in the Capitoll. At Antium the mice and rats gnawed a crown of gold. About Capua, a huge number of locusts (but from whence they came, no man knew for certain) overfed all the grounds, and filled the fields. At Reate there was a horie-colt foled with five feet. At Anagnin were seen in the element, at the first divers fire-lights shooting and flashing here and there; and afterwards a mighty blasing comet burning. At Fusina a certain arch compassed the sun with a thin circle like a line: and afterwards a greater circle of the sun enclosed the said rundle from without forth. In the territory of Arpi, the earth in a plain champaign field settled and sunk down and made an exceeding great chink. As one of the Consuls killed the first beast for sacrifice, the liver thereof was found headless. These monstrous tokens were expiat and purged with sacrifices of the bigger sort: and the collidge of the Priests and bishops shewed unto what gods the sacrifice should be made. These things once done and performed, the Consuls and Pretors went forth into their provinces: yet so, as all of them had a special regard of Affrick, as if it had been their own province fallen unto every one of them by lot; either because they saw that therein reposed and consisted the whole importance of all affairs, and the main fate of the war: or else because they would gratifie and currie favour with Scipio, whom now the whole City made count to, and chiefly respected. And therefore not only out of Sardinia as before said, but also out of Sicily and Spain there was transported thither raiment and corn: yes, and armour also out of Sicily, and all kind of victuals, for the maintenance of the army. And albeit it was winter season, yet Scipio flaked no affairs and works of war: which being many, amidst his mind at once on every tide, and kept him continually occupied. For Vtica he beliggied and encamped he lay opposite to Annibal, and even within his sight; the Carthaginians were with their ships about, and put to sea, and a navy they had rigged, furnished and trimmed, for to intercept all victuals that came. Amid these cares he forgot not to win again the love of Syphax, if haply now he had his fill of love-deights with his fresh wife, since he had the plentiful fruition thereof, as much as heart could desire. But Syphax rather tendered conditions of peace between the Romans and the Carthaginians, to wit, that the Romans should depart out of Affrick, and the Carthaginians out of Italy; than seemed to give any hope, that he would revolt from the Carthaginians, in case the war conasce ptable in that amidst so many continuall losses and plenteous tears of theirs, one only joy as small as it was, shining upon them beyond their expectation, cald and lightened their hearts: considering withall how neer by all likelihood and appearance the Roman armado was to a mischief and finally destruction, had not the captains of their own gallees foreflowed so much, and Scipio come in time to help.

It fortun'd about the same time, that Lalius and Masaniissa were come within 15 daies into Numidia; the Masaniissians rendered Masaniissa the ancient realm belonging to him by inheritance from his father, and received him with joy, as their King whom they had long time desired. Syphax seeing his captains and garrisons diltized and displaced, kept himselfe within the ancient limits of his own Kingdome, but was not like to be long at rest and quiet. For his wives father on the one side, and his wife again on the other, set him on her forward continuall ally to make arms against the Romans; and so doted he on her in excessive love, that needs he must yeeld to her, there was no remedy. Besides, so mighty he was in numbers of men and horse, that the puissance of a Kingdome flourishing for many years together, offering and presenting it self daily to the eie, had been enough to have made a Prince proud, that was not so barbarous and uncivil as he, and had some better rule and makry of his affections then himself had. When he had assembled together as many as were able for service, he furnished them with horse, and with armour, as well offensive as defensive. The Cavalry he sorted and divided into small troops and cornets, the infantry into the cohorts and squadrons, according as he had learned long since of the Roman censurers. And thus having raised an army, equal for number to the former, but standing altogether in manner, of new and untrained soldiers, he put himself on his journey against the enemies. And after he had encamped neer unto them, at the beginning some few light horsemen advanced forward from the corps de guard, in espiall, to see as they might with safety, but being let back from thence with arrows & javelins, they retired unto their companies. After this they began on both sides to make out one against another, and to maintain light skirmishes; and when of any part they had taken the foil, they would again for anger return in greater number which is the wonted manner to kindle a battell between horsemen: for whiles the winners hope still of better, and the looser chafes for having the worse, the company ever concentrates on both sides. And thus now, after some few had scuffled and blowed the coals, at length the whole army of either part, came forth into the field eager of fight, and to strike a set battell. So long as the horse service, the Masaniissians were so many, as there were hardly any dealing with them, Syphax sent them out in such great troops: but after that the Roman footmen once had gotten faire footing between the cornets of their horsemen, which gave way as they came, and had suddenly sent footing and made head, and so frighted the enemy charging so free upon the spur as he did then, the Barbarians began to ride their horses more easily, and within a while gently to stand still; and in the end, not only to give ground to the footmen, but also to retreat from the horsemen, who now were the more bold and hardy, being flanked with a guard of footmen.

And now by this time the standards of the legions advanced forward, and approached neer hand. But when the Masaniissians were so far from receiving and enduring their first charge, that they might not abide the very sight so much, as of their ensigns and armour, so mightily wrought with them either the remembrance of former overthrowes already past, or the present fear of imminent danger. Where Syphax, whiles he rode bravely in the face of the enemies troops and squadrons, if happily for very shame, or for the perill of his own person, he might stay his men from running away, had his horse under him fore wounded, and being cast off his back to the earth, as overpressed with the number, taken prisoner, and brought alive unto Lalius, for to represent unto Masaniissa above all others a goodly shew and joyfull sight to behold. Now was Ciriba, the head City of all the Kingdome of Syphax; and thither after the fight, betook themselves a mighty multitude of people. The slaughter in this battell wasles in proportion, then the victory, because the horsemen only maintained the conflict. Not above five thousand were slain, and not halfe so many taken prisoners. And when they had made an assault upon the camp whether the frighted multitude after the losse of their King, had retired, Masaniissa came unto Lalius and said, that for the present there could be nothing more pleasing and honourable unto him, then upon his victory to visit and see his fathers Kingdome, which he had recovered and won again after so long a time. But as in adversity, so like wise in prosperity (qd he) tract of time and delays are never good. In case therefore Lalius would permit him and his horsemen, together with conquered Syphax to go before unto the City Ciriba, he would surprise them on a suddain, finding all out of frame and to feele by reason of this so suddain and unexpected fear: and Lalius with his footmen might travell fair and safely, and come after with ease journeys. Lalius yeilded hereunto. Whereupon, being gone afore unto Ciriba, he commanded the principall Citizens of Ciriba to be called forth unto a parle. But all the whiles that they were ignorant of the Kings unhappy fall, and so long as Masaniissa uttered nothing of that which was hapned, he might not prevail either with threats or faire words and perswasions untill he presented the King before them a bound prisoner. Then at so heavy an object and miserable spectacle, they lift up a pitifull cry, and made great lamentation. And partly for fear they abandoned the defence of the wals, and partly by a general consent to court the Conqueror, and to seek for grace and favour at his hands, they let the gates open. Then Masaniissa, after he had belowed about the gates, and in convenient places of the wals, certain strong guards, to keep that no man should stir and make an escape, he rode a gallop to the

A royall palace, for to be possessed of it. As he entred within the fore-gates thereof, even in the very entrance of the porch, Sophonisba the wife of Syphax, and daughter of Afrabal the Carthaginian, met him on the way: and cyping in the mids of the armed train Masaniissa full gorgeously dight, as well in his brave armor, as in other goodly array and ornaments, imagining him to be the King (as he was indeed) she fell down prostrate at his feet, and spake in this wise: "True it is (I have quoth the) O Masaniissa, that the Gods above, together with your own verue and fidelity "it is given you full power and puissance, to doe with us according to your pleasure: but if it be "lawfull for me a poor prisoner and captive woman, to open my mouth and make an humble "speech unto my Lord, and in whole only hands lieth my life and death: if I may be to bold to "touch your knees, and that victorious right hand of yours: I would beseech and pray you for "the honour of the royall majesty of a Prince, wherein we also our selves ere while were interest- "ed; in the love and name of the Numidian nation, which now is common to you and Syphax, "by the domestical gods, protectors of this regal house and princely palace, who vouchsafe to "receive you into it at this present with better prels and more fortunat tokens, then lately they "sent Syphax out of it; to deign me a lowly supplicant this favour, and I graut me this petition, as to "determine your selfe of me your captive what ever pleaseeth you & not to suffer me to fall into the "proud hands and inhumane disposition of any Roman. If there were nothing else out this, that I "was sometime wife and Queen to Syphax, yet would I rather trie the courtie and humanity of "a Numidian, and one born in Africa as well as my self then of a stranger and alien. But "what hard measure a Carthaginian lady, and the daughter of Afrabal, may fear at a Ro- "mans hand, you see and know full well. Wherefore once again I request and intreat your high- "ness upon my knees, to regard my suit: and if there be no way else to save and keep me from "the will and appetite of the Romans, to put me to death of her, in the very best of her age. And therefore when as now she was incomparable: for years lully, and in the very best of her age. And therefore when as now she held him fast by the hand, and requested his protection and honourable word, only for this, that he might not be delivered and betrayed to a Roman, placing & setting her words, so well, and couching them so cunningly, that they sounded neerer to speeches for to win love, then prayers to crave pity: and see the fanie and affection of this victorious Prince: he inclined presently not only to mercy and compassion, but also (as all the kind of these Numidians are full of love, and have no stay of their wan- "ton lust) a conqueror otherwise though he were yeilded himself prisoner to the love of his captive: "D and after he had given her his right hand for assurance to perform her request, he went into the "lace. This done, he began to talk about with himself how he might make good his promise unto "himself, but finding no meanes else to compass and bring it about, he borrowed foolishly, rash, "and shameles counsell of blind love. He made no more ado, but commanded in all hast to pre- "pare that very day for the solemnization and marriage with Sophonisba, because he would give nei- "ther Lalius, nor Scipio himself, any liberty at all to proceed against her as a prisoner, after the were "once the wedded wife of Masaniissa. The wedding was no longer due, but behold Lalius came, "a guest unfent for and nothing welcome: who so little dissembled how much he disliked the thing, "that he was once about to have plucked her forth of the bride-bed, and sent her away even with Syphax and other prisoners to Scipio. But matter over to Scipio, for to arbitrate and decide unto whi- "E ber thought and importuned him to refer the matter unto him, for to mend their state, and better their for- "tune, the sent away Syphax alone with the rest of the prisoners, and by the help of Masaniissa, wan- "and recovered the other Cities in Numidia, which were held by the garrisons of the King. When "news came into the camp that they were bringing Syphax thither, all the multitude went forth "as it were to behold a triumph. Himself went bound before all the rest, and a number of Numidi- "an noblemen and gentlemen followed after. Then every man to let forth and amplify this victo- "rie, magnified what he could the greatnes of King Syphax, and the glorious renown of the "nation, in these termes: That he was the King, unto whose majesty the two most mighty and "puissant states of the world, to wit, the Romans and the Carthaginians attributed so much, that "F Scipio the General of the one, for to seek his amity, left the province of Spain and the army "there, and with two Caravals or Gallies ruled with five banks of oars, only repaired himself in per- "and Afrabal the great commander of the Carthaginians, not only failed himself in per- "son unto him into his Kingdome, but also gave him his daughter in marriage: so as at one time "he had in his power the two grand-captains, of Carthaginians and Romans both. And like "as both these nations killed sacrifices unto the immortal gods, and craved thereby their grace "and favour, so of both parties it was so great, that he expelled Masaniissa out of his own Realm, and "his power and puissance, it was so great, that he expelled Masaniissa out of his own Realm, and "drew him to this narrow point, that the best meanes he had to preclieve his life, was either the "running rumour of his death, in the lurking holes of the wild woods, wherein he was glad to live "G by rapine and stealth, after the guise of savage beasts. The King thus talked of in every mans mouth "that stood about him, was brought at length into the Praetorium or Generals pavilion, and there "presented unto Scipio. And Scipio verily was much moved in mind to consider the former state "and fortune of the man, compared now with his present condition: and to remember withall "and call to mind the hospitall intertainment, the giving interchangeably of the right hand, and "the covenant between them made both in publick and private. In these regards likewise Syphax "took heart, and spake more frankly unto the conqueror. For when Scipio demanded of him

"What he meant, and for what intent he not only renounced alliance with the Romans, but also began himself first to make war upon them: he made answer again and confessed, That he had indeed done amiss, and plaid the fool. As for his taking arms against the people of Rome, that was not the beginning of his folly, but rather the very end of his frantick fortifollies. Then it was, and never else but then, that he went besides himself and was bereft of his wits; then he abandoned out of his mind and clean forgot, as well private enmity by a hospital entertainment, as all public alliance by solemn covenants; when as he received into his house a Carthaginian lady for his wife: then his royl court and palace was set on fire & burned with those nuptial torches. That furious fiend it was (quoth he) and pestilent dame, that by all kind of picaunt alluring baits, and flattering enticements possessed my mind, drew away and alienated my heart; and never relted till, until with her own hands she laid upon my body impious and ungodly assault against my owne guest and loving friend. And yet as desperate and as wilful as my case is, in all my miseries and calamities, this one thing doth me good and enjoyeth my heart, that I see the same pestiferous fury, that fiend of hell, and him of the Devil, gotten into the house and family of him, who is the most deadly and mortal enemy that I have in all world. Neither surely will Masinissa demean himself more wisely, soberly and cautiously then Syphax: nay, considering his youthful years, he will be as apt to be misled by love, and more subject to the temptations of a woman. Certainly in this adion of espousing her, he hath bewed more folly a great deal, and want of government. When he had uttered these words not only upon a spitefull hatred against an enemy, but also upon the new pricks of jealousie rising in his heart, seeing her whom he loved, in the possession of his concurrent, Scipio was driven into no small dumps, and with not well what to make of it. And as he began to be suspicious of Masinissa for this marriage, so, to speak a truth, the circumstances thereof hammered in his head, and made him conceive hardly of him; for fear that another day by the suggestions of the lame woman, he would play false, and treaspas as well as Syphax. The marriage was so huddled up as it were in the mids of war and hostility, without the advice, without the privacy, and without the expectation of Lelius his company. Such hath he made all on the head, & without advisement, the very same day that he let eye first upon the queen his prisoner, he must needs espouse and marry her out of hand, and in the very house of his greatest enemy consummate and consummulate the complements of sacred wed-lock. Moreover to aggravate these matters and make them seem more foul and shameful, Scipio knew full well, that Masinissa during the time that he remained in Spain a lusty young gentleman, it was never known that he was enamoured upon the lovely beauty of any captive woman. As he toiled and revolved these things in his mind, Lelius and Masinissa chanced to come in place. And after he had welcomed them both alike, and shewed them a loving and gracious countenance, yeas and honoured them with singular praise and commendations openly in a frequent audience and court, he within his lodging took Masinissa into a secret place apart, and began to speak unto him in this manner: I suppose Masinissa, that you saw in me some good part, for love whereof both at the first you were induced to come into Spain and contract amity with me; and afterwards also in Africa, you repented our self and all your hopes in my fidelity and protection. But of all those virtues, for which I have seemed worthy of your affectionate love, there is not one wherein I may so much glory and take joy and take comfort, as in temperance, continency, and the bridling of carnall delights, and fleshly pleasures. This virtue Masinissa, I wish that you also would have joyned unto the rest that are in you so rare and excellent. For our ages (truly we truly) standeth not so much in danger of armed enemies, as of those earthly pleasures that compasse us on every side. And he that by his sobriety and governance hath been able to rule and tame the same, hath won himself more honour, and gotten a greater victory, then we have done by the conquest and subduing of Syphax. What valiant exploits and worthy acts you have achieved in mine absence I have willingly reported, and still remember. For the rest I had rather you would consider of them by your self, then change colour and blush at my rehearsal of them. Syphax through the good fortune, and by the forces of the people of Rome, is vanquished and taken prisoner. And therefore himself, his wife, his realm, his lands, his towns, the inhabitants thereof, and finally all things else whatsoever that belongeth unto Syphax, are become a booty to the people of Rome. The King himself, and the Queen his wife, in case he had not been a citizen born of Carthage, in case we had not seen her Father to be at the great Captain of our enemies, ought by right to have been sent to Rome; that the Senat and people of Rome might passe their censures, award and judgement of her, who is reported to have alienated a confederate King from us, and to have caused him rashly and inconsiderately to take arms against us. Strive then to rule and master your humors and affections, take heed you stain not many good virtues with one bad vice. Marre not the grace, deface not I say, the thank of many worthy deserts, by one fault; and trespass greater indeed, then the subject cause and occasion thereof. Masinissa, whilst he heard these words, not only blushed as red as fire, but also began to water his plants. And when he had promised for his part to be overruled and set down by the Generall, and requested him withall, so far forth as possibly the case would permit, to tender and regard his promise, wherein rashly and inconsiderately he had entangled himself, (for given his faithful word he had, that he would not deliver and betray her into the hands and power of any other) he departed out of the Pretorium or Generall his court, all dismayed and exceedingly troubled in spirit and betook himself to his own pavilion. Where all solitary and alone by himself, after he had passed over some time, with

A with fetching many deep sighs and sobs, so as he might easily be overheard by them that stood about his tent, at the last he gave one grievous groane above the rest, and with that called for one of his truly grooms, who had under his hand the keeping (as the manner was of Kings and Princes) of a speciall poyson, against all doubtfull chances, that might happen. Which he commanded him to temper in a goblet of wine, and to carry it to Scipio, and withall to tell him thus much from him. "That Masinissa would have been most willing to perform his pledged troth and lift promise, which a husband ought unto his wedded wife. But since that the superiour powers, and those that were mightier than himself, had bereft him of their puissance and liberty, he was ready and able yet to accomplish a second behest, namely, that he should not come alive into the hands of the Romans: and therefore he advised her, that in remembrance of her father a noble warrior and Commander, of her native country, of two Kings to whom she had been married, she would provide for her self, and save her own honour. This credence and message, together with the poyson, the servant when he was come unto Scipio, delivered unto her. Whereat, I accept (quoth she) this marriage present, and welcome be it to me, if this be the best token that a husband could find to send unto his wife. Yet thus much signifie unto him from me again, that better content I would have been to die, if my marriage had not stood too neer to my grave. She spake not the word to floutly, but she did the deed as resolutely: for she took the cup in hand, and shewed no sign at all of fear, she roundly drank it off. When tidings hereof came unto Scipio, for fear lest the hot, humorous, and passionate young Prince, might do him self some mischief, he presently sent for him. One while he gave him good & comfortable words; another while he gently rebuked him, so that he would seem to make amends for one folly with another, and to play a more cruel and tragical part then there was need. The next day after, to the end that he might withdraw his mind away from this present ill of troublesome fancies, he mounted up into his Tribunal seat, and assembled an audience. There first, he openly styled Masinissa by the name of King, and honored him with singular praises and commendations: which done, he gave him a golden crown, a fair cup likewise of gold, a chair of estate and a scepter, both of ivory, a rich long robe imbroidered of divers colours, and a coat wrought with needle work, representing the Date tree. These honourable presents wanted no words to tell them out. For as (quoth he) there is nothing among the Romans more stately and magnificent than triumph, so they that ride in triumph, have no ornaments more rich and luscious then this, which the people of Rome esteeme. Then Masinissa only of all strangers and aliens to be worthy of. After this he gave Lelius also his due and deserved praises, and bestowed upon him a coronet of gold. Other martial men likewise according to the service which they had done, were rewarded with lundry gifts. The King having these honours done unto him, was quietted and contented in mind, and conceived some assured hope, now that Syphax was displaced and rid out of the way, shortly to compass and enjoy the whole kingdom of Numidia. Then Scipio having sent C. Lelius with Syphax and other captives unto Rome, accompanied also with the Embassadors of Masinissa, returned himself with his power again to Tarent, And there what fortifications and works he had begun afore, now he finished perfectly and brought to an end.

The Carthaginians who were filled with a kind of joy that was not only short, but also in manner vain and foolish, grounded upon their late assault of the Armado, which (considering their present state) was fortunat enough; after they heard that Syphax was taken prisoner, in whom they had reposed more hope (well neer) then in Asdrubal and their own army, were mightily affrighted and daunted, and would give no more ear to any that pertwaded war, but as one orators to sue for peace, thirty of their principall ancients; and they amongst them were (as one would say) their privy councill of state, and had the greatest power and authority to sway and overrule the whole body of the Senat. Who being entered into the Roman camp and the Generall his lodging and pavilion, fell down prostrate (after the manner and guise as I take it, of the country) from whence they were first descended like those that worship & adore the gods. And to this their humble reverence, their language was suitable and correspondent; not extolling themselves and their fault, but transferring the beginning and occasion thereof, upon Asdrubal and his favorites about him, and footed him and bare him up in his wilfull pride and insolent ambition craving pardon for their City of Carthage, which twice already had been subverted and overthrow by the inconsiderat folly of her own citizens: yet once again you would gladly be faved and stand upright by the meannes and goodnesse of their enemies: for as much as they knew full well, that the people of Rome fought not the utter extermination and destruction of those whom they had vanquished by force of arms, but only the sovereignty and rule over them: promising fealty and homage to them ready to serve in all loyalty, and to perform whatsoever it should please them to impose and lay upon them. Scipio made them this answer again, and said, that as he came into Africa upon hope to return home with conquest and not with peace; so that hope of his the prosperous and happy successe of his war is hitherto, was much bettered and augmented. However although he assured himself of the absolute victory, as if he had it fast enough in his hand, yet a good accord he would not refuse: that all nations of the world might know, that the people of Rome can both begin wars rightfully, and also end the same as justly. My will therefore (quoth he) and pleasure is, that the conditions of peace shall be these. Imprimis, that the Carthaginians shall reitore and deliver back all the prisoners that they have taken in the wars; with all the renegates and fugitives that have fled to their side from us. Item, that they remove their forces rest that year, he together with M. Servilius the Generall of the horse, spent in per gresse and visiting all the Cities of Italy which in time of war had shaken off their allegiance, and in taking due knowledge of all their causes and reasons severally.

During the time of the truce, there let forth all out of Sardinia from Leontius the Pretor, an hundred hulks laden with victuals, together with a convoy and guard of twenty gallees of war, and sailed over into Africk, both from the danger of the enemy, and also from the perill of tempests by sea. But Cn. Octavius as he was in his voyage from Sicily, with a fleet of two hundred hulks and thirty strong gallees, had not the like good speed. For as he sailed (well near) within the kenning of Africk, first he was calmed; then the wind turning South, troubled and disordered his ships, yea, and scattered them over the sea one from another. Himself with his gallees of war wrought against the wind and the current, and with exceeding toil and labour of the oare-men, I doubt led the point of the cape of Apella, &c. there in the bay rode at anchor; but the hulks for the most part fell with the lland Egmontus (which shuteeth upon the foreland, and lieth in the very mouth of that creek from the sea wherein Carthage standeth) almost ten leagues from the City: and some were driven by wind to a place called the Hotwaters, over against the City. All this hapned within the sight of Carthage. And therefore out of all parts of the City, was great running to the market place. The magistrates assembled the Senat; the people at the entry and porch of the Council house, called upon the Senators and cryed out, that they should not let slip to great a booty out of their eyes and hands. Some alleged against them, the fidelity of tresting of peace: others also objected the faithfull promise of truce (the terme whereof was not yet expired.) But at last when both Senat and people were intermingled all in manner together, agreed it was by a general consent, that Asdrubal with a fleet of fifty sail, should cut over to Egmontus and so forth thence rally and gather together the Roman ships dispersed along the coasts and the havens. And the hulks (abandoned of their mariners that were fled, first from the lland Egmontus, and afterwards from the Hotwaters aforesaid) were drawn and towed as it were at the tails of their own ships to Carthage. As yet the Embassadors were not returned from Rome, neither knew they what the resolution of the Roman Senat was concerning war or peace, nor the day of the truce determined. Scipio taking the wrong and indignity to be more hainous, in that the hope of peace and the assurance of truce should be violat by them first, who fought both for the one and the other; presently dispatched an embassage to Carthage M. Bebinius, L. Servilius, and L. Fabius; who being by the concourie and running together of the people, meet to a shrewd turn and mischief: and foreseeing their return like to be dangerous, craved of the magistrates (who saved them from violence) to send certain ships to wait them. So they were allowed two gallees called Tiremes, which having conducted them until they were arrived at the river Bagrada, where they were within sight of the Roman camp, returned back again to Carthage. Now the Carthaginian Armado lay in the rode before Pica. From thence there made out three gallees of four ranks of oars; whether it were upon some secret direction from Carthage to do so, or that Asdrubal the Admirall of the fleet, upon his own head adventured to foul an action (the state having no hand therein, and therefore not to be blamed) and espying the Roman Gallies of five banks of oars past the point of the cape, suddenly assailed her from the main fea. But neither could they invade and strike her with their beak heads, making her good way, and shifting to well by reason of her swiftness; neither could the armed souldiers from out of their lower vessels board her being so tall a ship over them. And right valiantly she defended her self as long as (shot lalled); which when it once failed, and that she had no other means to help her self, but only the nearness of the land and a number of souldiers who from the camp were run to the shore, with the losse only of the ship all the passengers escaped safe to land.

Thus the truce being doubtles broken with one wickedness coming in the neck of another, Leontius and Fabius came in the very nick from Rome, together with the Carthaginian Embassadors; unto whom Scipio, having given his word, that though the Carthaginians had not only broken the faith and assurance given of the truce, but also the law of arms, in abusing and evil intreating the persons of the Embassadors, yet himself would do nothing to them unworthy either the order of the people of Rome, or unifying his own manner and custome, dismissed the Embassadors, and made preparation for war.

When Annibal now approached the land of Africk, one of the mariners was commanded to climb up to the top of the malt to discover the coast, and to give what part they were directed to: and when he made answer and said, that the prow made head upon a place called, the Ruinat (sc. scapellato); he mistaketh the omen and preface of that place, and commanded the pilot to passe by, and leave it: and so he put his fleet within the bay of Leptis, and there set his army ashore. And there were the affairs of Africk for that year. The acts ensuing, reach to that year, wherein M. Servilius Geminus, who then was Generall of the horse, and J. Claudius Nero were made Consuls. But in the end of that former year, when the Embassadors of the confederat Cities of Greece made complaints, that their territories were waited by the Kings garrisons: and when they sent their Embassadors into Macedonia, for to demand satisfaction and restitution, they could not be admitted unto the King, nor have audience: and moreover, they gave intelligence, that there were four thousand armed souldiers transported over into Spain, under the conduct of Sopater to aid the Carthaginians: and certain summes of money likewise lent with them: the Senat gave order, that Embassadors should be addrest unto the King, to give him to understand, that

At that the LL. of the Senat took all this to be done against the tenure and form of the league. So there were sent C. Terentius Varro, Cn. Manlius and M. Aurelius. And three gallees of five course of oars they were allowed.

This was a year of special note, for a great scare-fire, whereby the publick cliff was burnt to ashes down to the ground: also for much abundance of rain and many floods, and exceeding cheapens of victual. For besides that all Italy was open by reason of a general peace throughout, M. Valerius Falto, and M. Fabius Buteo, Ediles of the chair, divided the great store of corn that was sent out of Spain, among the people, street by street, and let the price at four Asles the Modius. The same year Q. Fabius Maximus departed this life, a man of great years and exceeding old, if that be true which some writers report, that he was Angur 42 years. But certain it is that he was a man worthy of so great and honourable a surname, yea, and if it had begun first in himself. He surpassed the dignities of his father, he was equal in honor to his grand-father: Rullus his grand-father, I must needs say, had more tides of victories, and of greater battails: but one enemy of his, Annibal, may countervail them all, as many as they were. Howbeit, this man was counted more wary and advised, than hardy and forward: and as a man may well doubt whether by natural disposition he loved to take leisure in all his actions, or that it was a policy of his agreeable to the wars properly then in hand; so verily nothing is more certain than this, that as the Poet Ennius saith:

This only man by wife delay, Restor'd our fate full'n to decay.

His (on Q. Fabius Maximus was invited or installed Angur in his place, and for Bishop in his room (for two sacred dignities he had) Ser. Sulpicius Galba was chosen. The Roman plaies were exhibited one day, and the Plebeian Games thrice wholly renued by the Ediles M. Sextus Sabinus and Cn. Tremelius Flaccus. They both, were made Pretors; and with them C. Livius Salinator, and C. Aurelius Cotta. The solemne election of the Magistrates for that year, whether Cn. Servilius the Consul held, or (because of important busines in Tuscan, about the examinations of the conspiracies there of certain great men, by commission from the Senate, which might keep him there) P. Sulpicius the Dictator by him nominated; it is uncertain, by reason of the variety and difference of writers in that behalf.

In the beginning of the year next following, M. Servilius and T. Claudius, after they had assembled the Senat in the Capitol, moved concerning the Provinces. And for asmuch as both of them desired Africk, they were willing that Africk and Italy, should be put to the choice of a Lottery. But by the especial travail of Q. Metellus, the Province of Africk was neither granted nor denied to either of them. And the Consuls were commanded to deal with the Tribunes of the Commons, that if they thought fit good, they would prefer a bill unto the people, to know whom they would have to war in Africk. So all the tribes in general gave their voices with P. Scipio. Nevertheless, the Consuls (for to the Senat had decreed before) cast lots for the Province of Africk. Thus Africk befall unto T. Claudius, namely, that he should sail over thither with an armado of fifty ships, all gallees of five ranks of oars, and be joyned in equal commission with Scipio. And M. Servilius had Herronia allotted unto him. In the same Province Cn. Servilius also was to continue in government, in case it pleased the Senat to stay the Consul in the City. Of Pretors, M. Sestius by lot had the rule of Gallia, with order, that P. Quintilius Varus should make over unto him the Province and two legions. And C. Livius took the charge of the Bruttii with the two legions, which the year before were commanded by P. Sempronius the Vice-consul. Cn. Tremelius was appointed to govern Sicily, and to receive of P. Villus Tappulus the Pretor of the former year, that Province and two legions. And ordered it was, that Villus as Propretor, should keep in obedience and defend the coast of Sicily with twenty ships of war, and a thousand souldiers; and that from thence M. Pomponius should in the twenty ships behind embark one thousand and five hundred souldiers, and transport them over to Rome. Unto C. Aurelius Cotta was the civil jurisdiction of the City assigned. All the rest continued still in their government, and had their commissions newly signed, according as they had either provinces or armies under their hand. And with sixteen legions and no more, was the State of Rome that year maintained. Now to the end they might begin all enterprises in the name of the Gods and proceed therein with their grace and favour, order was given, that the Consuls before they went out to war, should let forth those games and plaies, and sacrifice those greater beasts which T. Manlius Dictator, in the year that M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintius were Consuls, promised by solemne vow, in case the Common-weal continued for five years following, in the same good estate as then it was. So the games were exhibited in the great Cirque or show-place four daies together, and the sacrifices slain accordingly, as they were vowed to the Gods.

But all this while, as mens hope, for their fear all encreased daily more and more, whiles they could not certainly resolve with themselves, whether they had more cause to rejoyce, that Annibal after sixteen years had abandoned Italy, and left the possession thereof free unto the people of Rome; or to be afraid, for that he had passed over into Africk with the safety of his army. For why? the place was only changed, and the danger all one. And surely Q. Fabius late deceased, no vain Prophet of so great a perill and hazard, was wont to foretell, and this was ever his song, That Annibal would be a more dangerous enemy at home in his own country, than he had been abroad in a forraign Land. And Scipio should find, that he had to deal neither with

"Syphax (King of a rude, untaught, and barbarous country, who was wont to lead armies of stale H "grooms, and little better than water-bearers and camp-slaves to keep one place, and not re"move) nor with Adrubal his father in law, a Captain of all others most light of foot, and re-
 "dient to run away, nor yet with tumultuary armies taken up in haste and raised suddenly, confit-
 "ing of a rabble of rustic clowns and peasants armed by the halves; but with Annibal, born in man"ner within the camp, yea, and in the royal pavilion of his father: a most valiant Captain, bred "and brought up amongst armed men: who long ago was no sooner a child, but he was a soldier,
 "and before he came to the prime and flower of youth, became a General: who growing to be
 "old in a continual course and train of victories, hath filled Spain and France from the one side
 "to the other, and Italy from the Alpes to the narrow seas, with the marks and memorable monu"ments of worthy and noble exploits: and leadeeth still an army of as long standing and continu"ance in warfare as himself, hardened and beate to endure all those things which hardly one "would believe, men could abide and suffer, embured and bathed a thousand times in the blood of "Romans, and carrying with him the spoils not of common soldiers only, but also of most brave
 "Generals themselves, Scipio should be sure to encounter and meet in battail those who with their "own hands had slain Pretors, and killed Consuls of Rome: all bedight and goodly to be seen in "mural and vallare coroners, for their good service in scaling of walls, and mounting over rampiers;
 "those I say who at their pleasure have ranged through the won camps and forced Cities of the "Romans. Neither at this day have the Magistrats of the people of Rome so many bundles of rods,
 "with axes born before them, as Annibal hath taken from the Roman Generals whom he hath slain,
 "and can it he list he wear and carry before him, casting and tossing these doubts and fears in their mind, K
 "they themselves encreased their own care, and doubled their dread in this point also, that whereas
 "they were wont for certain years to make war in fight of home, in diverse and fundry places of "Italy, with a lingering kind of hope, without regarding any issue thereof like presently to enforce now
 "Scipio and Annibal, Captains matched together (as one would say) to make a final end & tryal of al,
 "had set all mens minds a work to expect the event now or never. And even they also who had re"posed exceeding confidence, and grounded no small hope of victory in Scipio, the more their spir"its were amited upon it, and desirous to see a speedy effect, the greater was their care and doubt "of the sequel. The Carthaginians for all the world were likewise affected and disquieted in mind, "One whiles, beholding Annibal, and considering his noble and worthy acts, they repented that "they sued for peace. Another while again, when they looked back and remembered, how twice L
 "they had been defeated in battail, Syphax slain, themselves driven out of Spain, chased and hunted
 "out of Italy, and all this by the valor and policy of one man Scipio: they trembled for fear of him,
 "as if he were the fatal Captain born for their ruin and utter destruction.

Now by this time was Annibal come as far as Admetum: from whence, after he had bestow"ed some few dayes in refreshing his sea-fight soldiers, he was roused with fearful thoughts that "brought news, how all about Carthage was full of enemies and hostility: whereupon he made "long journeys till he came to Zama. This Zama is a Town distant from Carthage five dayes jour"ney. From thence he sent out espials, who being taken by the Roman wardens, were brought be"fore Scipio, and he caused them to be delivered unto the Tribuns or Marshals, with command"ment, that they should be led throughout the camp: and suffered without all fear, to see whatso- M "ever they desired. And when he had asked of them whether they had perused and considered "everything to their content, and enough to serve their turn: he sent them back again to Annibal,
 "with a safeconduct to accompany them. Annibal took no pleasure at all in hearing of any thing
 "that they reported: for (among other particulars) they brought news that Masaniissa chanced "that very day to come thither with six thousand foot and four thousand horse. But most of all,
 "he was troubled and cast down with the resolute confidence and assurance of the enemy: which "no doubt (he thought) arose not of nothing. And therefore albeit himself was the only cause of "that war, and by his arrival had disturbed the truce concluded, and the hope of peaceable cov"enants: yet supposing, that a more indifferent accord might be obtained, in case he lived therefore N
 "while he was entire and unfoiled, rather than after he were vanquished and overcome: he address"ed a messenger or pursuant unto Scipio, requesting that he might confer and commune with him.
 "Whether he did this of his own accord, or by direction from the publick Council of the State, I "have no reason to set down or avouch for certain, either the one or the other. Valerius Antius
 "writeth, That he was by Scipio defeated in the first battel, wherein were slain in field 12000 armed "men, and 1700 taken prisoners, whereupon himself in person came as Embassador, with other ten "Orators into the camp unto Scipio. But howsoever it was, Scipio refused not to emparle; and so,
 "both Generals of purpose advanced forward and approached with their camps, to the end they "might be neerer one to the other when they should meet in conference. Scipio made choice of a "plot of ground not far from the City Nadagara: which as it was handfome and meet in "other respects, so especially in this, that it had a watering place within an arrow throw. Annibal O
 "took an hill four miles from thence, sure enough and commodious otherwise, but only that they "were far from water. In the mid way between they chose a plain, open on every side, where they "might disciver and see all about them, that no ambush there were laid: and after they had caused
 "their armed soldiers to retire a like distance from either party, then came together with one
 "truch-man or interpreter apiece, not only the greatest and bravest Captains of their time, but al"so equal to the mightiest Kings or Emperors of realm or nation that ever had been afore them
 "in

The enter-view of Scipio and Annibal.

A in any age and remembrance of man. For awhile they stood one beholding the other, and said "never a word, ravished and atonied with a mutual admiration: and at last Annibal began and "spake in this wise. "If the Gods by destinies have so appointed, that I who first levied war against "the Romans, and who so often have had the victory as it were in mine own hands, mult needs
 "of my self and mine own motion, come now first likewise to sue for peace: glad I am and well "pleased, that it is my good hap to meet with you above all other men, at whose hands I should "seek the same. And certainly, you also for your part among many your singular and excellent "praises, may score up this for none of the least, namely, That Annibal (unto whom the Gods "have vouchsafed the upper-hand over so many noble Captains of the Romans) hath yielded the
 "bucklers, and given place unto your self: now that you have had the honor to end this war,
 "more notable and renowned at the first for your losses and overthrow than ours: and that "fortune (as it is fallen out) hath made this pretty sport with me, who at the beginning took "arms when your father was Consul, gave him battail first of all other Roman Generals, and am "now come unarmed unto his son to crave peace. Verily much better it had been, and simply the "very best, that the Gods had inspired into our fore-fathers this mind, That both you might "have contented your selves with the Dominion of Italy, and we likewise of Affrick. For truly, "Sicily and Sardinia both, are nothing sufficient to make amends and satisfaction, and it were but "only of your part, in recompense of so many brave fleets, so many puissant armies, and so many "noble Captains that ye have lost. But faults done and past may well be blamed and reproved,
 "when they can not be corrected and reformed. So greedy were we on both sides to conquer
 "the Lands of others, that in the mean time we have hazarded our own. Neither had ye war in "C Italy only, or we again in Affrick alone: but both ye have seen the enigma and armies of ene"mies liard at your gates, and in manner under your own walls: and we likewise from Carthage
 "have heard the noise and bruit of the Roman camp. Now then, that which we have caused most
 "to detest and abhor, and you to wish above all other things in the world; the treaty of peace is "fallen out in time of your better prosperity, and more favourable aspect of fortune unto you.
 "We again are the agents therein, whom it most flattereth upon and importeth that there should "be peace: and who are assured, whatsoever we conclude, that the States and cities from whence
 "we come, will approve and ratifie the same. There needs no more but a willing mind, well "affected and inclined to those courses which tend to repose and quietnes. For mine own part,
 "one while age hath taught me, who am returned an old man into my country, from whence
 "D I came a child: another while prosperity and adversity both, hath schooled me, that I would "now rather be ruled by reason, than I wayed by fortune. But I fear me greatly, that you as well in "regard of youth, as also of your continual felicity and fortunat train of success, are over-hasty
 "and stout, for to yeeld unto any peaceable wayes. For commonly he fore-calleth no variable "chances, who never tasted of adversity of fortune. And the time are you at this day, that sometimes
 "I was at Thrasymenus and at Cannae. You being hardly come to that age which is meet for war-
 "service, had the charge and command of an army: and look what enterprises you took in hand
 "most venuously, the same you ever exploited as happily. You purified the vengeance of fathers "and uncles death, and wan by the calamity of your house and family a notable name and reputa"tion of singular verue and piety. Spain full and wholly you have recovered and conquered a"gain: four armies of Carthaginians you have chased from thence: no sooner were you created
 "E Consul, but when all other mens hearts failed them to defend and keep Italy, you failed never
 "the less, hither over into Affrick: and after you had defeated here two armies, forced and burnt
 "in one hour two camps of your enemies, taken Syphax prisoner, a most mighty and puissant
 "Prince: wan so many cities both of his Kingdom and of our dominion: you pulled me mangle
 "my head out of Italy, whereof I had been now fifteen years possessed. Well may your haury

 "example & mirror of accidents of fortune whatsoever. For, whom not long since you either saw
 "or might have seen encamped between the river Anio and your City, and ready in manner to "scale the walls of Rome: you see me now after the loss of my brethren, two right valiant warriors
 "and most renowned Generals, even here before the walls of my country little better than be"sieged, making means in humble manner to avert and avoid those dangers from mine own City,

The Oration
of Annibal to

long, peace of service it was to besiege a City so strong and so well fortified: and for that Scipio himself was troubled in mind with the expectation of a succour, who should come to win the credit and honor of finishing the way which indeed was gotten by the travail and hazard of another: all their hearts were turned and inclined to peace. The morrow after the Orators were called again before them: and after they had been well checked, rebuked, and plainly told of their treachery and warned withal, that after so many losses and overthrows which they had received, they should now learn to be wile, and at length believe that there were Gods in Heaven. And there an oath was to be regarded, these conditions of peace were tendered and offered unto them, Imprimis, it was capitulated, That they might live free, according to the form of their own Laws: Item, What Cities, what territories (and within what bounds and limits) they held were possessed before the war began, the same they might keep still. Item, That Scipio and the Romans I from that day forward should not waite and spoil the country. Item, That the Carthaginians should deliver all renegade traitors, all fugitive persons, all captives and prisoners, yea, and yield unto them all ships of war with brassen heads, above ten triremes or galleys of three ranks of oars. Item, That they should put into their hands all those Elephants which they had already tamed and manned and should break and tame no more of them. Item, They should make war neither in Affrick, nor without Affrick, but by order and warrant from the people of Rome. That they should make restitution and amends to Masaniissa for all harms, and enter into league with him. Item, That they should find corn and money for the maintenance of the aid-souldiers, until their Embassadors were returned from Rome: yea, and tender payment of ten thousand talents of silver by even portions in fifty years. Item, That they should put in a hundred hostages at the pleasure of Scipio, and none of them to be either under fourteen years of age, or above thirty. Last of all, they would grant a truce upon this condition, That the ships which were taken during the time of the former cessation of arms, should be restored back again, with all things else that were therein: otherwise no truce for the present, nor hope of peace hereafter. These articles and conditions the Embassadors were willed to return home withal. Which after they had related in the general assembly of the people, Cicero mounted up the pulpit to disswade peace, and had audience given him with great applause of the multitude: who as they were heartless and unmeet for war, so they were as preevish and unmyly and could not long continue in repose. Hereat, Annibal took great indignation, and was highly displeased, that in such a time, those things should either be delivered or heard: and he made no more ado, but stepped to Cicero, laid hand upon him and pulled him down from the pulpit out of which he spake: whereat the people were moved and gumbled in great discontent to see so strange a sight and unusual, in a free City. Then Annibal as he was a meer martial man and could not skill of civil affairs, nor well away with these citizens' liberty. "I went, quoth he, from you when I was but nine years old, and now after 36 years I am come again. All military skill and knowledge, which fortune sometime in my private matters, and otherwiles in publick affairs hath taught me from my childhood, me thinks I have learneded off by many, for the rights and privileges for the laws, customs and fashions of this City and the common Hall I must be informed and instructed by you. Thus having pleaded ignorance for his excuse, he discomfited at large of peace, arguing how reasonable and equal, yea, and how necessary it was, the greatest point of difficulty in all the capitulations mislaid unto them was this, That touching the things above said which were taken during the absence of arms, there was nothing now forth-coming and to be seen but the bare vessels: and no easy matter was it to seek up the rest. Now when as they that gained the peace were convinced and put down by reason, agreed it was that the ships should be redelivered, and the men likewise be fought out and found: as for all the rest that was wanting, there should an estimate be made according to the value, at the discretion of Scipio, and to the Carthaginians to make all good in money. Writers there be that have delivered how Annibal presently from the field sped him to Sea, and there finding a ship ready prepared for him, straight-ways embarked and went directly to King Antiochus: Also when Scipio demanded above all other things that Annibal should be yielded into his hands, answer was made, that Annibal was not in Affrick. After that the Embassadors were returned to Scipio the Questors or Treasurers were commanded to draw an exact account of their books upon records, of all such things as were in the ships, and appertained to the City: and look what belonged to private persons, the owners thereof were willed to declare and testify. In consideration and recompense whereof, there was a sum of money set down, amounting to 25000 pound weight of silver, and the same to be paid presently out of hand by the Carthaginians. Thus a truce was granted to them for three months: with this clause annexed over and besides, That during the said term they should send their Embassadors to no other place but only to Rome: and what Embassadorssoever came to Carthage, they should not let them depart before they had certified the Roman General be who they were, and what their message and errand was. Then with the Carthaginian Embassadors were sent to Rome, L. Veturius Philo, M. Minucius Balbo, and L. Scipio, brother to the General. At that time there came such store of grain and victuals out of Sicily and Sardinia, and thereby corn was so cheap, that the Merchant was bin to leave corn behind him to satisfy the Shipmen and mariners for the portage and carriage thereof.

Now there had been much trouble and fear at Rome upon the first news and alarm, that the Carthaginians had taken arms again: and T. Claudius had commission to conduct a fleet with all speed

A speed into Sicily, and from thence to pass over into Affrick: likewise the other Consul was commanded to stay still at Rome, until it were certainly known in what terms all matters stood in Affrick. But T. Claudius went but slowly to work either in preparing and rigging an armada, or in putting it to sea: because the L.L. of the Senat were of opinion, that as touching the peace and the conditions thereof, it was rather at the disposition of Scipio than of the Consul. Moreover, there were certain prodigions signs reported even presently before the very remour of the foresaid rising and infurrection, which caused men to fear greatly. At Cumes, the circle and compass of the sun appeared less: and it rained a good shower of stones. Also in the territory of Calvus, the earth fetled and sunk, and made huge hollow chinks, in so much as trees were quite swallowed up under the ground. At Arivia the market-place and the shops all about, likewise at Phisip the wall of the City in divers places, yea, and the gate, were smitten with lightning from heaven: and in mount Palatine it rained stones. This wonderous sight left rehearsed, was expiate after the ancient custom, by keeping a Novendial sacrifice and fast for nine days: the rest by blinding of greater sacrifices. Among all, there were unusual deluges and inundations of waters, which troubled the minds and confidences of men: for the Tyber so swelled and rose so high, that by reason that the shew-place of the Circus was overflowed, preparation was made for the setting forth of the games Apollinaries, without the gate Collina, near the chapel of Venus Erycina. But upon the very day when the plaies should be exhibited, it grew to be so fair weather of a sudden, that the pageant and pompous train of the shew, which was going to the gate Collina, was called back, and conveyed into the Circus: and word brought, that the water was fallen and gone clean out from thence: so the people were more joyous, and the patimes celebrated with greater rejoyce: for that the usual and ordinary place served again for the solemnity to be performed.

Claudius the Consul at last departed from the City of Rome, and went to sea: where between the havens of Cos and Lauretum, he was overtaken with a terrible and fearful tempest that arose and put him in exceeding fear. From thence he came to the Populonia, and there waited until the tempest was overblown and gone. Then he fell with the Ile * Ilus, and from Ilus he sailed to Corfica, and from Corfica he passed over to Sardinia: where, as he doubted the point was passing the race of the mountains called * Infans, there arose a far more cruel gull, and in places of more peril and hazard, which scattered the fleet. Many of the ships were weather beaten and sore shaken, many lost their tackling quite, yea, and some were cracked and split. Thus the Armado being much rolled and torn, arrived at length at Carales in Sardinia, where, whiles the ships were drawn up into the dock to drie Land, and there a repaiting, the winter came upon them, and they ear tumbled about. And to T. Claudius (as a private person, by reason that no man renewed his commission for a farther time), brought the Armado back to Rome. But M. Servilius, because he should not be called home to the City for the solemn election of Magistrates, after he had declared Dictator. Cn. Servilius Geminus, departed into his Province. And the Dictator chose P. Aelius Paetus General of the Horsemen. Oftentimes went the writs out for publishing of the election, but by reason of tempests it held not, nor was performed. And therefore when the old Magistrates left their office after the Ides of March, and no new substituted in their room, the City was clean without any Magistrates of state to sit in the ivory chair. L. Marius Torquatus a Bishop, that year died. In his place was invilled C. Salpinx Galbo. The Roman games were there exhibited anew by L. Licinius Lucullus and Q. Fabius Aediles of the chair. The Clarks and Scribes belonging to the Aediles, together with their beades and summoners, were detected for carrying forth certain money out of the treasure and chamber of the City: and being thereof convicted, were therefore condemned, not without some touch and discredit of Lucullus himselfe the Aedile. P. Aelius Tubero and L. Laetorius Aediles of the commons, for that there was some error and default in their election, resigned up their places, after they had represented the playes, and in regard thereof solemnized the feast of Jupiter, and for up beides in the Capitol three images made of the silver that was forfeited and raised upon the fines of the persons condemned afore said. The Dictator and General over the Horsemen, by order from the Senat exhibited the games called Cereales to the honour of Ceres.

When the Roman Embassadors and Carthaginians together, were come out of Affrick to Rome, the Senat assembled to give them audience in the Temple of Bellona: where L. Veturius Philo after he had declared (to the exceeding joy of the L.L. of the Senat) that they had fought a battle with Annibal, (the all that ever the Carthaginians were like to fight) and that this grievous and lamentable war was now come to an end, he went on still and related, that Vernina the son of Siphax was vanquished and subdued: which was no small increase of the other exploits so happily achieved. Then he was commanded to go forth from thence directly to the assembly of the people, there to impart their glad new news unto the multitude. Whereupon (for exceeding joy and in token of thanksgiving) all the Temples in the City were let open, and solemn processions decreed for three dayes. Now when as the Embassadors of the Carthaginians and King Philip (for they also were arrived) required to have a day of audience in the Senat: the Dictator by direction from the Senat returned them this answer, That the new Consuls should satisfy their request. After this, was the solemn assembly holden for the election of Magistrates: and Consuls were created Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Aelius Paetus: for Pretors, first M. Junius Pennus, who was allotted to have the civil jurisdiction in the City: then M. Valerius Falso, unto whom the Brutians countrey fell by lot to government, M. Fabius Puteo, whose hap was to rule Sardinia, and and P. Aelius Tubero, to be L. deputy of Sardinia. Concerning the Provinces wherein the Embassadsuls were to be employed, it was not thought good to determine any thing, before the Embassa-dors of King Philip and likewise of the Carthaginians, had delivered their embassages: for as they saw the end of one war, so they foresaw the beginning of another. Cn. Lentulus the Consul was inflamed with an ardent desire of the Province of Affrick: for if the war continued, he aimed at an easy victory: and it was at the point of an end, he gaped at the honor of finishing the same, and hoped to have the name, That determined it was whiles he was Consul. And therefore he protested plainly, that he would suffer nothing to pass before that the Province of Affrick were assigned to him. His colleague (a sober, temperate, and discreet man) gave his consents for he saw he would be overmatched, and never able to import and carry it away from him. Q. Minucius Ter- entius and A. Aelius Glabrio, two Tribuns of the commons, gave out and said, That Cn. Cornelius Claudius the Consul. For when by warrant from the Senat a bill was proposed unto the people, wherein their pleasure was to nominate for government of Affrick, all the 35 Tribes gave their voices and awarded that Province to P. Scipio. Much contention there passed and many bicker-voices both in Senat-house and before the people, in the debating of this question: but in the end they grew to this point to refer all to the judgment of the Senat. So the L. of the Senat having taken their oath (for so it was agreed upon) thus concluded and gave this order. First, that the two Consuls should either agree together to have the Isle of Italy and who the charge of a fleet of fifty K vines; namely, which of them should be the navy, he should sail over into Sicily: and if peace fail, Item, to whether of them twain bel the Province of Italy and who the charge of a fleet of fifty K might not be fully concluded with the Carthaginians, then to cross over into Affrick: where the Consul should war by Sea, and Scipio by Land, by virtue of the same commission and authority that he had already. Moreover, if the conditions of peace were accepted of both parts, that then the Tribuns of the Commons should propound unto the people, as touching their will and pleasure, whether the Consul or P. Scipio should conclude the peace: and which of them (if the victorious army after conquest obtained, were to be brought back out of Affrick.) should have the conduict thereof home again. Also, if they nominated Scipio for to make the peace, and bring aback the army likewise, then the Consul should not cut over from Sicily to Affrick. As for the other Consul who had the government of Italy, he should receive of M. Sestius the Pretor, two legions. I So P. Scipio had his commission faled out to remain in the Province of Sicily, with the same forces which he there had. M. Valerius Falco the Pretor in the Brutians country was allowed those legions whereof C. Livius had the command the year before. It was further more agreed, that those legions whereof C. Livius had the command the year before, should be appointed to M. Fabius for gion which P. Lentulus the Consul of the former year, continued also in his government with Sardinia. And M. Servilius the Consul of the former year, continued also in his government with his own two legions for Hannibia. As concerning the provinces of Spain, (sch L. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Manlius Acidinus had been there for certain years, the said Consuls were to deal with the Tribuns, that if they thought it good, they should propound unto the Commons, for to know whether minds whom they would appoint to govern Spain: and that he whosoever it was, should M take with him two armies enrol one entire legion of Roman soldiers, and of the allies of the Latin nation make up fifteen cohorts or regiments, and with the strength of them joyntly, keep in obedience and defend the province. Item, that L. Cornelius and L. Manlius should bring over the fleet of soldiers into Italy. Unto Cornelius the Consul was assigned a fleet of fifty ships, to be decided and drawn out of two other Armadoes; the one of Cn. Octavius which was in Affrick, the other of P. Villius which guarded the coasts of Sicily; and to choose thereof what ships he would: and that P. Scipio should keep those fifty ships of war which he had already. And in case his pleasure was that Cn. Octavius should be Admiral over them still, like as heretofore: then his pleasure was to continue in government for that year as Vice-pretor: but if he made Laelius the Admiral, then Octavius should depart and come home to Rome, and bring back with him those N ships that the Vice-consul had no use or need of. M. Fabius likewise had ten galleies of service allowed him into Sardinia. And the Consuls were appointed to muster and enrol two legions of citizens, that year might be managed.

Some that year might be managed. They began to debate in counsil about the Embassadors of Philip the King of Macedonia, who were desired to come into Macedonia into place for to [illegible]

To

A To these points M. Furius, sent of purpose from Aurelius out of Macedonia, made answer briefly in this wise, That Aurelius who was left behind, for fear that the allies of the people of Rome, wearied with rodes and incursions into their territories and other injurious oppressions, might revolt unto the King; never departed out of the confines of the allies aforesaid, and endeavoured only, that those robbers and foreragers of the country should not invade and over-run their lands, and go clear away without any harm. As for Sopater, he was a flatte and peer of the realm, and one nearly allied unto the King, who lately was lent into Affricke with four thousand Macedonians and with money to aid and assist Antibal and the Carthaginians. When as the Macedonians being required what they could say to these challenges, framed but a doubtful and intricate defence, before they had well made an end they received this forthier answer: That in the King fought war if he proceeded and went on still, he should shortly have his hands full of sorrow, as he had broken the league in two points, first in offering wrong to the allies of the people of Rome, and molesting them by way of war and hostility; and secondly, in helping their enemies with men and money, they deemed thus much of it, that not only P. Scipio both did & doth well and justly, in keeping them still in prison as enemies, who bare arms against the people of Rome, and were taken captive; but also M. Aurelius performed good service to the State, and a great pleasure to the Senat, in defending the Allies of the people of Rome by force of arms, when by right of league he could not. When the Macedonians had their dispatch, and were sent away with this heavy answer, then the Carthaginian Embassadors were called in.

When they beheld their reverent age, and the dignity of their perionage (for they were the chief and principal men simply of their City) then every man was fully persuaded for his own part and said, That now they dailied no longer, but meant in deed and good earnest to crave & have peace. But the chief and most portly person of them all was one Afarbul, in his countrey and among his citizens surnamed Hedus, a man that ever perlawed peace, & opposed himself against the Barchine faction. And therefore he had the more credit and authority, when he derived the blame from the Common-wealth, and laid all the fault upon the willfulness and greedy avarice of some few. Who after he had used diverse and sundry speeches, one while exclaiming and clearing the crimes, another while confuting somethings objected, left if they had denied certain truths, they should with more difficulty have obtained pardon and peace: now and then also giving the LL. of the Senat an admonition and warning by the way, to use their prosperity and good fortune modestly and with moderation, he added moreover and said, That if the Carthaginians would have been ruled by him & Hannus, and had been so wise as to have taken their time and the opportunity when it was, they should themselves have given those conditions of peace, which now they are constrained to crave. But for men to be fortunate and wise both at once, it is a rare and special gift, and seldom to be seen. And here it is that the people of Rome (quoth he) is invincible, because in prosperity they can remember to be wise, and to take the best way for themselves. And certainly, a wonder it were, if ever they should do otherwise. For those commonly who happen to meet with some few new good success, and have not been used thereto before, overthrow and pain themselves too much in excessive joy, which they have not the grace to govern with sobriety and discretion: whereas the people of Rome have ever been accustomed to the continual felicity of joyous victories, inasmuch as they are grown into a dislike of taking pleasure and delight in them (so common they are) and have encreased their dominion & Empire, more (in manner) by sparing and pardoning those whom they have conquered, than by the very conquest of them indeed.

“The speech that the other Embassadors made, was more proud and lamentable, whilles they recounted before the Senat from what high estate, and to how bafe condition they were fallen:
 now but a while fince held by force of arms, as it were the whole world & had nothing left them now but the bare walls of the City of Carthage, within which they were flut up, and could fee nothing either by land or fea, which they might rightfully claim as their own. Navy, the voice of the City it self and their houfes, they were to enjoy no longer than the people of Rome is willing, and forbeareth to proceed by rigour and extremity against the fame, fince there is nothing else behind to work upon. Now when as the LL. of the Senat seemed to incline to mercy and com-paffion one Senator there was amongst them (by report) who upon a deep and inveterate hatred of the Carthaginians treachery, fpace out aloud and faid, “What Gods will they regard and feare by in making of a new league, who have broken their oath, and taken their name in vain whom they called to witness in the former? Mary (qd. Afdrubal) even thofe and no other that are fo fharp revengers and heavy enemies to the breakers of league and covenant, So when all their minds were inclined to peace, Gr. Jenuhus the Confil, who had the government of the navy, opposed himfelf againft the decree of the Senat for to croll the fame. Then M. Attilius, and Q. Minucius, Tribuns of the Commons, preferred a folem bill unto the people, in this form: Plea-feth in you, and will you grant, That the Senat fhall refolve and determine, that peace may be concluded with the Carthaginians? Pleafeth it you to chufe and appoint who fhall be the man to make that peace, and who fhall bring the army out of Africa? As concerning peace, the tribes every one as they were demanded their voices, granted affirmatively (He rogavit) that Scipio fhould conclude it, and alfo bring away the army. By virtue of this Act paffed by the people the Senat made a decree, that P. Scipio by the advice and counfel of ten Commiffioners, fhould contract an accord with the people of Carthage, under what conditions he thought good, After this

the Carthaginians rendred thanks to the LL. of the Senate, and requested that they might enter into the City, and talk with their fellow citizens and country-men, who had been taken captives aforesaid, and lay in the common goal and prison. For there were amongst them some of their kinsfolk and friends, noblemen of birth and of good quality; others also, unto whom they were to deliver some message and credence from their kinsmen. When they had spoken and communed with them, they came with a new petition and made earnest suit, to give them leave to ransom and redeem as many of them as they would: whereupon they were willing to give them their names; and when they had named fast upon two hundred, an order was granted out of the Senat, that the Roman Commissioners should take over with them into Affrick unto Scipio two hundred of those captives whom the Carthaginians would make choice of; and declare unto him from the Senat, that in case the peace were fully agreed upon and finished, he should deliver those two hundred to the Carthaginians, freely without paying any ransom. Now when the heralds of arms were appointed to go into Affrick, for to confirm and establish the peace according to the solemn order, at their own request there passed an act of the Senat framed in this form and tenor. Imprimis, That they should carry with them every one by himself, certain flint stones of their own, and likewise Vervens. Item, That the Roman Pretors should command them solemnly to pronounce the league, and then they to ask of the Pretor sacred herbs of Vervens. A kind of grafs or herb this is, which was wont to be gathered from off the Capitol hill, and given to the Heralds.

Thus were the Carthaginians dismissed and sent from Rome: who being come into Affrick to Scipio, concluded peace with the same capitulations as is above said. And so they delivered up their gallees and ships of war, their Elephants, the renegade traitors, the vagrant fugitives, and four thousand prisoners. Among whom was Q. Terentius Cuncto, a Senator by his calling. As for the ships, so soon as they were lancht forth into the deep, Scipio caused them to be set on fire and burnt. Some report that they were five hundred in number, one with another, of every sort, and all directed and guided by oars. Presently were they set a burning: a dolorous sight and heavy spectacle (no doubt) to the Carthaginians for to behold, as if Carthage it self had been on a light fire. The renegade traitors and rebels were punished more grievously than the fugitives. As many of them as were of the Latin Nation lost their heads: all that were natural Romans, were crucified and roundly trussed up on the gallows. Forty years before was the peace last made with the Carthaginians, when Q. Lutatius and A. Manlius were Consuls. The war began three and twenty years after, whilst P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. And the same ended in the eighteenth year after, P. Cornelius, and P. Atilius being Consuls. Many a time after, Scipio by report, would say, that the willful and covetous desire of T. Claudius first, and afterwards of Cn. Cornelius, was the only day and let, that this war ended not in the final ruin and utter destruction of Carthage.

When as the Carthaginians, who by long and continual wars were grown bare & poor, thought the levy and contribution of money for to furnish out the first payment, lay heavy and sore upon them, inasmuch as in their Senat-house, there was great sorrow and heaviness, yea, and piteous weeping: it is said, that Annibal was seen to laugh a good while. And when A. Hedus rebuked him for laughing in that public lamentation of the City, considering that himself was the cause of those tears, "If (qd, Annibal) as we see by our eye the outward disposition of the face and countenance, so we could look within & behold the affection of the mind, ye might soon perceive, that this laughter of mine, which ye so much blame, proceedeth not from an heart that is glad and joyfull, but rather senseless, stupefied, and astoned with the exceeding griefs and calamities that have happened. Yet is not it so unseasonable and impertinent to our present condition, as these tears of yours, and weeping that you make, is absurd and nothing to the purpose. Then should ye have wept and shed tears, when our armor and weapons were taken from us, when our ships were set on fire, when we were interdicted and forbidden to make war with forraign nations: for then had we our deadly blow, then our backs and hearts were broken. And never think that the Romans have proceeded hardly against you, in comparison of the hatred that ye N bare one to another. No great City and mighty State can long continue and rest in quiet, if it have no enemies abroad, it findeth some at home much like unto strong and lusty bodies, which seeme fye enough against all outward accidents and causes of sickness, are overcharged with their own strength and fullness of humours, and thereby subject to most deadly maladies. So much, forsooth, and no more we feel of the publick miseries & common calamities, as toucheth and concerneth our selves in particular: wherein nothing pincheth us more, nor goeth neerer to the quick, than to forgo our money, and part with our pence. And therefore when Carthage was conquered and deipolled of all her ancient honors, when ye saw her disarmed and stripped naked, when ye saw her forlorn of all the armed nations of Affrick; no man then sighed, no man grieved thereat: but now when the tribute imposed, is to be paid out of your privat purses, ye keep a weeping and wailing, as in some publick funeral and mortuary carried forth. But alas, I fear me greatly that ere it be long, ye shall find and feel, That your weeping this day hath been for the least loss of all the rest. Thus spake Annibal to the Carthaginians.

Scipio having assembled his whole army together, before them all, restored Malanissa to his father's Kingdom: and over and besides, endued him with the possession of the City Cyria, and other Towns and territories which belonged to the realm of Syphax; and were now in subjection

A to the people of Rome. Unto Cn. Octavius he gave order to conduct the fleet into Sicily; and there to make it over to Cn. Cornelius the Consul. The Carthaginian Embassadors he willed to go to Rome, that those acts and capitulations which were concluded by him with the advice of the Commissioners, might likewise pass under the approbation of the Senat, and the consent of the people, and to be ratified and confirmed for ever.

Thus Scipio having obtained peace both by sea and land, and embarked his army, sailed toward Sicily; & arrived at Lilybaeum. From whence he sent away a great part of his army by sea, and himself passed by land through Italy, which now was joyfull as well for the peace concluded as the victory achieved. Where all the way as he went, not only the people came forth in multitudes out of the Cities to do him honour, but numbers also of the country peasants out of the Villages, lured all the high-ways along untill he came to Rome: where he entered the City, riding in the most lately and magnificent triumph that ever had been. He brought into the City Chamber 100033 pound weight of silver. He divided among his soldiers out of the spoil 4 four hundred Ales a piece. Suprax by his death rather disappointed the people of a goodly flow and pageant in the triumph, than diminished any whit the glory of the triumph: he died at 34 year not long afore, to which place he had been removed from Abis: howbeit his death was not obscure, by reason that he was solemnly carried to his buriall, with the pomp of a publick funerall at the charges of the City. But Polibius a writer of good account, reporteth, that this King was led in the very triumph. As Scipio rode triumphant Q. Terentius Cuncto followed after with a cap of liberty set upon his head; and ever after to long as he lived he honoured him as becoming it was, and acknowledged him the author of his freedom. But as concerning his surname affricanus, I cannot for certain learn whether it were the favour of his soldiers first, or the affectionate love of the people afterwards that brought it up, or rather began upon some of his own house and lineage that courted and flattered him therewith: like as in our rather daies Sulla was surnamed Felix, and Pompeius Magnus. This is certain that he was the first General that ever took his name of the country and nation by himself subdued, and thereby was renowned. But by his example afterwards, others nothing comparable to him in victory and conquest won goodly titles and glorious inscriptions to their Images, and honoured their houses with nobilities and additions.

E The causes of the war begun again with Philip King of Macedony, which had I found, are set down to be these: In the time of the holy feast of Ceres, two young men of Acorinthia, who had not been professed in these sacred mysteries, came to Athens & danced among others of their countrymen to go into the Chapel of Ceres. For which, as if they had committed some heinous fault, in the high, if I dare, they were by the Athenians executed. The Acorinthians moved with indignation for the death of their neighbours, required aid of Philip to revenge it for them: Some few months after, peace was granted to the Carthaginians, in the five hundred and fifty year from the foundation of the City of Rome, when the Embassadors of the Athenians, who now were besieged by Philip, craved aid of the Senat, and they were of advice and solved to help them, notwithstanding the Commons griefs and desires, that they thought the continual troubles of so many wars were grievous and heavy unto them. Yet for to prevailed the authority of the Nobles, that the people also gave their consent to succour their confederate City. This war was committed to the managing of P. Sulpitius the Consul: who led an army into Macedony, and fought certain battles; for which he was performed by his success. The Athenians being invested and beleaguered round about by Philip, following the example of the Spartans, sent their wives and children, and their own selves after them. L. Furius the Praetor with him in a pitched field the Gauls, called Infimbres, that rebeld, and likewise Amilcar the Carthaginian began to make war in those parts, where Amilcar was slain, & with his five and thirty thousand men, Moreover, this book containeth: the expeditions and voyages of King Philip and P. F Till well apaid am I likewise, that I am now come to an end of the Pomick war, as if my self had been in person there, and been in my own toil and danger thereof. For albeit myself it is some (who have undertaken and professed) to holdly to write a compleat and full story of the Romans) to be wearied in the several parts of so great a work: yet when I think the Carthaginians rendered thanks to the LL. of the Senate, and requested that they might enter into the City, and talk with their fellow citizens and country-men, who had been taken captives at former times; and lay in the common goal and prison. For there were amongst them some of their kinsfolk and friends, noblemen of birth and of good quality; others also, unto whom they were to deliver some message and credence from their kinsmen. When they had spoken and communed with them, they came with a new petition and made earnest suit, to give them leave to ransom and redeem as many of them as they would: whereupon they were willing to give them their names; and when they had named fait upon two hundred, an order was granted out of the Senat, that the Roman Commissioners should take over with them into Affrick unto Scipio two hundred of those captives whom the Carthaginians would make choice of; and declare unto him from the Senate, that in case the peace were fully agreed upon and finished, he should deliver those two hundred to the Carthaginians, freely without paying any ransom. Now when the heralds of arms were appointed to go into Affrick, for to confirm and establish the peace according to the solemn order, at their own request there passed an act of the Senat framed in this form and tenor. Imprimis, That they should carry with them every one by himself, certain flint stones of their own, and likewise Vervens. Item, That the Roman Pretors should command them solemnly to pronounce the league, and then they to ask of the Pretor sacred herbs or Vervens. A kind of grais or herb this is, which was wont to be gathered from off the Capitol hill, and given to the Heralds.

Thus were the Carthaginians dismissed and sent from Rome: who being come into Affrick to Scipio, concluded peace with the same capitulations as is above said. And so they delivered up their galleys and ships of war, their Elephants, the renegade traitors, the vagrant fugitives, and four thousand prisoners. Among whom was Q. Terentius Caelio, a Senator by his calling. As for the ships, so soon as they were lancht forth into the deep, Scipio caused them to be set on fire and burnt. Some report that they were five hundred in number, one with another, of every sort, and all directed and guided by oars. Presently were they set a burning: a dolorous sight and heavy spectacle (no doubt) to the Carthaginians for to behold, as if Carthage itself had been on a light fire. The renegade traitors and rebels were punished more grievously than the fugitives. As many of them as were of the Latin Nation lost their heads: all that were natural Romans were crucified and roundly trussed up on the gallows. Forty years before was the peace last made with the Carthaginians, when Q. Lucilius and A. Manlius were Consuls. The war began three and twenty years after, while P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. And the same ended in the eighteenth year after, P. Cornelius, and P. Aelius being Consuls. Many a time after, Scipio by report, would say, that the willful and covetous desire of T. Claudius first, and afterwards of Cn. Cornelius, was the only stay and let, that this war ended not with the final ruin and utter destruction of Carthage.

When as the Carthaginians, who by long and continual wars were grown bare & poor, thought the levy and contribution of money for to furnish out the first payment, lay heavy and sore upon them, inasmuch as in their Senat-house, there was great sorrow and heaviness, yea, and piteous weeping; it is said, that Anibal was seen to laugh a good while. And when A. Hedus rebuked him for laughing in that public lamentation of the City, considering that himself was the cause of those tears. "If god, Anibal as we see by our eye the outward disposition of the face and countenance, so we could look within & behold the affection of the mind, ye might soon perceive, that this laughter of mine, which ye to much blame, proceedeth not from an heart that is glad and joyful, but rather senseless, stupified, and astonished with the exceeding griefs and calamities that have happened. Yet is not it to unreasonable and impertinent to our present condition, as these tears of yours, and weeping that you make, is absurd and nothing to the purpose. Then should ye have wept and shed tears, when our armor and weapons were taken from us, when our ships were set on fire, when we were interdicted and forbidden to make war with forrainer nations: for then had we our deadly blow, then our backs and hearts were broken. And never think that the Romans have proceeded hardly against you, in comparison of the hatred that ye bear one to another. No great City and mighty State can long continue and rest in quiet. F All well apaid am I likewise. that I am now come to an end once of the Punick war, as if myself had been in person there, and born my part in the toil and danger thereof. For albeit unfitting it is for me (who have undertaken and professed to boldly to write a complete and full story of the Romans) to be wearied in the several parts of so great a work: yet when I think

The foresaid bill as concerning the Macedonian war, in the first Parliament assembled about it, H was in manner by all the centuries in the formost scrutinies nipped & flatted denied. Which things, partly men of themselves were forward enough to do, as being over-wearied with long and fore wars, and worn out for very irkesome of tedious travel, and painful perils: and partly Q. Fabius a Tribune of the Commons, failed not to let them on: who taking the old course and way of blaming and accusing the nobles, had laid to their charge, that they loved the seeds of war still, and ceased not to raise war upon war, to the end, that the commons might never be at rest, and enjoy the repose of peace. The LL. of the Senat took this to the heart, in such sort, that the Tribune was shaken up and much reviled in the Senat-house with most opprobrious and reproachfull terms: and every man did his part to encourage the Consul to publish a new assembly and scrutiny, for the proposing of the same bill: to chaffice and rebuke the sloth and idleness of the people: yea, I and to open and shew unto them what great damage and loss, how much shame and dishonour they should incur by these delays before the war began. Then the Consul having assembled the people for this purpose in Mars field, before that he cited the Centuries to give their voices, called them all together and made a speech unto them in this wise: "It seemeth (quoth he) that you are ignorant, my Masters and Citizens of Rome, that the matter put to question is not, whether ye would have war or peace, (for Philip will not permit that to be at your disposition and pleasure, who already prepareth mortal war both by sea and land) but whether ye would rather choose to transport the legions into Macedony, or receive your enemy here within Italy. And what difference there is between the one and the other, you have had sufficient proof and experience (if ever at any time before even in this last war, especially with the Carthaginians. For who is he that maketh doubt, but if we had with speed relieved the Saguntins besieged, who fled unto us for help, and earnestly craved for our protection, like as our ancestors and progenitors in due time assisted the Mamertins: we should have turned the whole violence and force of the war into Spain, which by our long driving off & lingering delays we entertained in Italy, to our great loss and grievous calamity. Neither need we to doubt of this, but that we have hitherto staid Philip in Macedony, (who without question had combined with Annibal by means of letters and entercourse of Embassadors, for to have passed over into Italy before this time) only by sending of Levinus with a fleet, to begin with him at home, and to make war in his own kingdom, Dom. Defer we then to do that now, when Annibal is chased out of Italy and the Carthaginians, as defeated; which then we did, when we had the same Annibal our enemy within Italy? Go I we will on still and suffer the King by winning the City of Athen (like as we permitted Annibal by forcing of Saguntum) to try and see our slackness and cowardise: we shall have him I warrant you arrived in Italy, not at five months end, as Annibal was after his departure from Saguntum: but within five daies, after he is disanchored once & under sail from Corinth. Set safe ye will not compare Philip with Annibal, no, nor the Macedonians with the Carthaginians: yet I am sure ye will make them matches, and equal with King Pyrrhus, so far forth I say, as one man excelleth another in valour, and one nation surpasseth another in power. Epirus hath never been accounted not so at this day, but the smallest appendant to the kingdom of Macedony, and of least importance. But as for Philip, the whole and entire feignory of Peloponnesus is under him, and Lord he is of Argos it self, a City nobled as well by the death of Pyrrhus, as the ancient name and renown that goeth of it. Compare now again the times of our state, how much flourished Italy in those daies more than now? Our affairs were then much more sound and unfoiled: our Captains safe: our armies all, so many as they were, untainted; whom the Carthaginian was afterwards consumed: yet as puissant and great as we were, Pyrrhus assailed us, hept us to trouble and sorrow enough, yea, and came in train of victory to shake our free hold, even well-near to the City of Rome. So as not only the Tarentines, and all that tract of Italy, which they call the greater Greece, banded with him in such sort, as a man would have thought they had followed the very language and the of their name: but the Lucans also and the Brutians, yea, and the Samnites revolted from us, and rebelled. And are ye of beliefe that there will be quiet and remain in loyalty and obedience, if Philip once were passed over into Italy? yes many will they there is no question: for they should fall afterwards, and continued true in the Punick war. Nay, nay, never make reckoning that these States will not revolt from us so long as they know any one unto whom they may turn and range themselves. If ye had thought much of it, and been loath to pass over into Affrick, in truth at this day ye should have had Annibal and the Carthaginians your enemies (still in Italy). Let Macedony therefore be the seat of war rather than Italy: let our enemies Cities and lands be destroyed with fire and sword. We have found well by good experience, that our fortune is better, and our forces more puissant abroad in forraign parts, than at home in our own Country. Go to therefore in the name of God to the Scrutiny and give your voices: and those things that the LL. of the Senat have devised to do, grant ye the same, and yield your assent. Ye have not only the Consul author of this advice and counsel, but also the immortal gods (who as I offered sacrifice and prayed devoutly unto them, that this war might redound to the good and benefit of my self, of the Senat, of you, of our allies, of the Latine nation, and finally of our armies and armadoes) have vouchsafed me all the signs and tokens of comfort and joy, and assured me that all shall be well, and according to our hearts desire. This Oration of his once ended, they went presently to deliver up their voices, and gave affirmatively for the war, & suffered it to pass according as he had propounded. Then by an order from the Senat there was a solemn supplication

A for three daies proclaimed: and in all Churches and Chappels, and before every shrine & altar the gods were praised unto, that the war (which the people had allowed of) against K. Philip might be well achieved, and have an happy end. Moreover, the Consul Salpurnius conferred with the heralds, and asked their advice, Whether they would ordain, that the war to be denounced against King Philip should be intimated to himself in person: or thought it sufficient to be proclaimed within the confines of his dominion, at the next frontier town of all where he kept a garrison and guard: they pronounced again, That it mattered not, but the Consul should please himself, and do full well in the one and the other. Then the Consul was permitted by the LL. of the Senat to chuse whom he would, so he were not a Senator, for to send as a messenger or purveyor of arms: to give the King defiance, and to publish war. After this it was debated in Council how the armies should be disposed as well of Consuls as Prators. The Consuls were commanded to enroll two legions, and to discharge and call the old armies. Salpurnius, who by a decree was to manage this new war of so great name and consequence, was allowed to take with him out of that army which Scipio the Vice-Consul had brought out of Affrick, as many voluntaries as he could procure: but in no case to urge any old soldier against his will. Alio it was decreed, that the Consul should allow unto the Prators L. Furus, Dumpeus, and Quintus Minutius Rufus 5000 men apiece of the citizens of the Latine nation, whom they should employ, the one in the Province of Gallia, and the other in the Brutians country to defend those parts and keep them in obedience. Q. Fulvius Gellus was himself likewise commanded to chuse out of that army which P. Aulus the Consul commanded, as many as had served fewell years, until he made up the number of 5000 also of the allies & Latines: which should be a garrison to keep in order and safety the Province of Sicily, M. Alerius Fulio, Prator the year before, and L. deputy of the Province of Campany, had his Commission signed anew, to continue for the term of one year longer, and as Vice-Prator to pass over into Sardinia, with direction to chuse out of the army there 5000 of the allies and Latines, such as had served least time. And the Consuls were commanded to take up two legions of Citizens, which might be sent to any place, as need should require, considering that many nations in Italy tainted and infected with the fellowship and company of the Carthaginians during the wars and ever since, were swelled with anger and despite against the Romans. Thus the Common-wealth that year was to use the employment of six Roman Legions.

Amidst these preparations for war, there arrived Embassadors from K. Ptolemy, giving intelligence, that the Athenians had craved aid of their King and Master against Philip. And although they were confederate as well with him as the Romans, yet the King would send into Greece neither a fleet of ships, nor an army of men, defensive, or offensive to any, but by authority and consent of the people of Rome. In case therefore the Romans were relieved, and sufficient withal of themselves to defend their allies, he would be willing to sit still and take his repose at home. Otherwise, if the Romans were rather disposed to rest and take their ease, he would himself be well content to send such forces to the aid of the Athenians, as should defend them easily against all the power of Philip. The Senat returned great thanks unto the King, with this answer, That the people of Rome were purposed to protect their own allies: but if during this war they stood in need, upon any occurrence that might happen, they would give knowledge thereof to the King: as being assured and making full account that all the puissance and wealth of his kingdom was a sure prop and trusty pillar of their State and Common-wealth. This done, by order from the Senat the Embassadors had given them for a reward a five thousand Asles apiece. Now whilst the Consuls were busie in taking musters, and providing all things meet for the war, the City very devout and given much to religion, in the beginnings especially of all new wars, after they had performed their supplications aforesaid, and done their devotions at every altar and shrine: became nothing might be for-let and left out, that at any time heretofore had been done; ordained that the Consul whom the Province of Macedony fell, should vow solemnly to exhibit to the honour of Jupiter, the great games and plaies, and a rich present beside. But Lucius the High Priest staid this publick vow for the time that it went not forward, alleging that it was not lawful to make a vow of an uncertain sum of money not determined: & if such money might not serve for the use of war, it ought presently to be set by and laid up safe, and not be mingled and shuffled with other monies: and unless that were duly done, the vow could not be paid and performed according to the order of holy rites, albeit the thing it self and the person of the man that moved this kruptle, touched and troubled them much, yet they would needs that the Consul should propound the matter to the college of the Priests and Bishops, to know their resolution, whether a vow might not directly be made of an uncertain peece of money. The Bishops set down their opinion and judgment, that it might be well enough, yea, and better than otherwise. Whereupon the Consul pronounced the vow, according to the very same form of words (as the High Priest ended and spake before him) which aforesaid they were wont to use, in making the quinquennial vows from five years to five: save only thus much, that he vowed and promised to requit the plaies, and to present oblations unto Jupiter, amounting to such a sum of money, as the Senat should set down when the vow was to be performed. So many times before had the great games been vowed, and a determinate sum of money ever assigned: but these were the first that were not limited within any certain stint and compass.

Now when all mens minds were wholly bent upon the Macedonian war, behold on a sudden when they feared nothing less than such a thing, there arose a rumour of French troubles and tumults:

tyrants for the Insubrians the Cenomans and Boii, having solicited and raised up by way of insurrection the Saluti, the Illyrians, and other States of Liguria, under the conduct of Amilcar the Carthaginian, who in those parts had taken the City, and for very dispiteous army burnt a great deal of Placentia; and after they had sacked the City, and for very dispiteous army burnt a great part of it, leaving hardly two thousand persons of all sorts, which amidst the fire and ruins there-part of chance to save themselves, crossed the river Po, and advanced forward to the spoil and pillage of Cremona. But the inhabitants of that Colony, having heard of the misery and calamity befall upon their neighbour-City, had some relief and time to shut their gates, and to bestow their guards upon the walls: so as, they should at least wife be first besieged or ever they were forced, and might be able to dispatch messengers unto the people of Rome. L. Furius Purpureo was governor of that Province for the time; who having by order from the Senat discharged all the rest of the army but only five thousand of allies and those Latines, abode with that power in the next country to that Province, about Ariminum. He then addressed his letters unto the Senat, signify-ing in how bad terms the province stood, namely, that of those two Colonies, which one was won by the Punick war had escaped those great storms and tempests of troubles, the one was won by the enemies and put to the sacage, the other now besieged, and at hand to be lost: neither would the forces be sufficient and able to help the distressed Cremonians, unless he should willingly cast a way five thousand allies, and expose them as a prey unto forty thousand of the enemies (for so many they were strong) to have their throats cut, and to be hewn in pieces; and by so great a loss and overthrow of his, to give more heart and courage to the enemies, who are now in their ruin, and puffed up with pride for the ruin of one Roman Colony already. Upon the reading of these letters, there went forth a decree from the L.L. of the Senat, that C. Aurelius the Consul should send out precepts for the army to be ready at Ariminum that very day, on which he appointed them to the Reverendissimus in Hetruria: and thereafter himself in his own person, if it might stand with the good of the State, would go with a power to suppress these French commotions, or else write to L. Furius the Praetor, that when the Roman Legions presented themselves unto him out of Hetruria, he should send in their head his own five thousand allies for the guard of Hetruria in the mean time, and make a journey himself in person to raise the siege before Cremona, and to set the Colony free that now was beleaguered. They thought good besides to dispatch Embassadors into Affrick, who should go to Carthage; and afterwards to Masaniissa in Numidia. To Carthage, for to intimate unto them, that Amilcar, a Citizen of theirs, left behind in France, (and L. whether he were of the army of Asdrubal or, afterwards of Mago, they knew not for certain) waged war there, against the covenants in the League contained: that he had assembled certain forces of French and Ligurians, to enter into arms against the people of Rome; and therefore, if they had any love to entertain peace, they should call him home, and deliver him to the people of Rome. Over and besides, they had in commission to give them to understand, that delivery was not yet made of all the runagate rebels, but many of them, by report, were retired to Carthage, and there went up and down, and conversed openly; which persons were, after diligent search made, to be attached and apprehended, that they might, according to the tenor of the accord, be sent home again, and delivered into the hands of the Romans. And thus much concerning their message to the Carthaginians. Now they had in charge besides to congratulate with Masaniissa, M. and to declare what joy they took in his behalf, namely, for that he had not only recovered the inheritance of his fathers kingdom, but also enlarged his dominion, by conquest of the most flourishing part of the Realm of Syphax. Moreover, commanded they were to signify unto him, that Amilcar had undertaken to war upon King Philip, because he had befriended and aided the Carthaginians; and by offering and doing wrong to the friends of the people of Rome, even at what time as all Italy was full of troubles and wars, enforced and put them to it, for to send their armies and their armadoes into Greece, and so by dismembering and dividing their forces into sundry places, was the principal cause that they were to late ere they passed over into Affrick: requesting him for the maintenance of this war, to send over certain aids of Numidian horsemen. These Orators had great gifts and honourable presents given them for to carry unto the King, to wit, divers pieces of plate both of gold and silver, a purple robe of State, with a rich cassock or coat wrought in palm-tree work with a royal Scepter of Ivory, also a robe embroidered before with purple, with an Ivory chair of estate. Last of all, they are willing to make promise unto the King, that if he could think upon any thing needfull and expedient either to establish his kingdom, or to advance his royal estate, the people of Rome would endeavour respectively for his good demerits to compass the same to the uttermost of their power.

There arrived also about that time Embassadors from Vermina the son of Syphax, and presented themselves unto the Senat, excusing the error, and pretending the youth of the Prince, clearing him of all fault, and laying the whole blame upon the fraud and treachery of the Carthaginians, promising for their King and Malice in this wife, That like as Masaniissa of a professed enemy, was become a sworn friend to the Romans, even so would Vermina do his best, and strain himself, that in all offices of friendship toward the people of Rome, neither Masaniissa, nor any other should surpass, and go beyond him; and making petition in his name, that the Senat would vouchsafe to give him the titles of King of Allies and Friend unto the Romans. These Orators had this for their answer, That not only Syphax, his father before him, of a confederate friend, suddenly without any cause at all proved an enemy, to the people of Rome; but also himself had practised already in his

A young years, and laid the first ground of his warfare in annoying and troubling the Romans by war; and therefore he was to seek pardon and crave peace at their hands, before he might be inveited by them with the terms of King of Ally, and Friend: for the honour of that title the people of Rome were wont to vouchsafe to none, but those Kings only who had deserved singularly well of them. Mary there should be certain Roman Legats in Affrick, unto whom the Senat would give order to minister and tender unto Vermina certain conditions of peace according to a large and absolute commission that they had from the people of Rome, To do what they thought good, And in case the King disliked ought in those capitulations, and were desirous to have any article added, put out, or altered, he must recourse again to the Senat, and demand the same, So there were Legats or Commissioners sent into Affrick with such a Commission above said, namely, C. Terentius Varro, Sp. Lucretius, and Cn. Otavius, and each of them had a galeace directed with five rows of oars.

After this were the letters read of Q. Minucius Praetor in the Province of the Bruti importing thus much, That the consecrated money of Proserpina at Lacri was by night stoln out of her treasury; but to say who should do the deed, they had no presumptions to give light and lead them directly. The Senat took the matter in very ill part, and grieved exceedingly, That sacrilegious men (still to Church-robbing, and would not give over; and that the late and fresh example of Plautius (so notorious as well for the heinous fact as the fearful punishment) was not able to terrify them and give them warning. So C. Aurelius the Cos, was enjoined to write unto the Praetor into the Brutiens country to this effect: That it was the Senats pleasure, that due enquiry and examination should be had of the Treasury thus robbed, after the same precedent and course that M. Poppo the Praetor took three years before, And look what money could be found, it should be laid up duly in the place; and what was not forth-coming, it should be supplied and made good again. Also (if he thought meet) that there should be certain purgatory sacrifices, according as the Bishops before ordained in the like case, for the expiation and satisfaction of the violating and desiling of the Temple. Moreover, there came about the same time divers prodigious tokens from many places to be reported. In the Lucans country the rumor and voice went, that the welkin was on fire; and at Prævernum, while the sky was bright and fair, the sun appeared red all day long. At Lavinium, in the Temple of Juno Sospita, there was heard in the night-season a mighty great noise, Nay, and more than this, in sundry places (as men say) were many monstrous and strange births seen. In the Sabins country one child was born, and no man knew what to make of it male or female: And another likewise was found of sixteen years of age, a very Hermaphrodite of doubtful sex between both. At Fregis there was a lamb veined with a swines head: and at Sinnessa a sow farrowed a pig with the head of a man. In the Lucans country there was stoled upon the common ground a colt with five teats. All these monsters were ugly to see and abominable, and holden for great defects and errors of nature working strangely out of kind. But above all others, those births both male and female, (or rather neuter) were most abhorred and detested, and order was given presently, that they should be cast into the sea; even as of late times when C. Claudius and M. Lucius were Consuls the like deformed monster was thither had away and drowned. Nevertheless the Decemvirs were commanded to turn over and peruse the books of Sibyll: to know what such prodigious monsters might portend: who by their learning and out of those books, gave direction to make the same sacrifices which last of all for the like uncouth sights were made. Moreover, they gave commandment, that certain hymns and songs should be chanted throughout the City by three several quires, of nine virgins in every one; and in oblation to be offered by them with all devotion to queen Juno. C. Aurelius the Consul caused all this to be performed according to the order and direction of the Decemvirs. And as in our fathers times Livius composed the ditty of the hymn, so at that time P. Licinius Tergula framed and set down a form of song which they could sing. Thus when all things were expiated, and satisfaction made accordingly for the appealing of the wrath of the gods, (or even as Lacri also the sacrilege was found out by Q. Minucius, and the money missing was raised out of the goods of the offenders and guilty persons, and bestowed there again in the treasury) as the Consuls were minded to take their journey into their Provinces, there repaired many private Citizens unto the Senat, unto whom the third payment was due that year for the loan of money, which in the time of M. Valerius and M. Claudius Consuls they had lent out and disbursed, because that the Consuls had made them answer, That the stock of the City Chamber was hardly able to defray the charges of a new war, which required maintenance of a mighty Navy and of puissant armies, and therefore flatly denied them, and said, That they had not wherewith to satisfy and make present payment. The Senat could not endure that they should have this occasion to make complaint; considering, that if the Common-wealth would still employ the money upon the Macedonian war also, which was granted in loan for the Punick war, this would be the end of it, that (one war following thus in the neck of another) their own money which was lent upon a curtesy and benevolence out of their private purses, should be little better than confiscate for some forfeiture, and fall to the Exchequer and common Chest of the City. These private persons demanding nothing but reason and right, and the City withall not able to discharge her debt, the Lords set down a middle and indifferent course between honesty and profit: and that was this: That forasmuch as many of these men said, that the City had much land upon sale, and they were to buy and make purchase, therefore the common

grounds lying and being within fifty miles of Rome every way, should be granted unto them in fee farm, and the Consuls to set down an estimate of their value and worth, and charge them with a chief rent or tribute of three farthings an acre by the year, to reitifie only that they were the Cities lands: to the end that if any man hereafter (when the City should be aforehand and in case to repay the former debt) were desirous to have money rather than land, he should restore the lands and possessions again into the Cities hands and receive his money. These private Citizens (who were the foresaid creditors) accepted gladly of this offer and condition. And hereupon this land was called by the name of Trientis and Tributus, because it was let out and granted in lieu of a third part of the lone money. Then P. Sulpicius after he had pronounced his vows above-said in the Capitoll, and departed out of the City in his coat of arms, with the Lictors and Uffers afore him, arrived at Brundisium; and so with the old voluntary fouldiers drawn out of the army that was returned from Africa, (whom he had enrolled into legions) and ships choien out of the fleet of Cornelius the Consul: he looked from Brundisium, and the next day after landed in Macedonia: where attended him the Embassadors of the Athenians; who humbly besought him to deliver them from the siege that invested their City. So C. Claudius went was incontinently sent to Athens, furnished with twenty long ships of war, and a strength of men: for the King himself in person besieged not Athens, but even then made not assault upon the town Abydos, as having already given proof of his forces in a sea-fight, both with the Rhodians and King Attalus, and in neither battell had good success. But besides the ordinary routs and pride engrained in him by nature, he was aloft now and looked high, by reason of the alliance made between him and Antiochus King of Syria, with whom he had parted the riches and Realm of Egypt, unto which they both aspired, upon the news they heard of the death of Ptolemeus. Now the Athenians had drawn upon themselves the war against King Philip, upon a small occasion and of no importance; who of all their ancient estate and glory, retain nothing else but great heart and haughty spirit. It befell that two young men of Acarmania, who had taken no orders and were not consecrate, entered among the other multitude into the Temple of Ceres, in the time of the feastival daies, and celebration of sacrifices to that goddess belonging: and being altogether ignorant in the custome of that solemnity and religion, and asking some foolish absurd questions, nothing fit for that time or place, were soon bewrayed by their speech and language: who being convened before the Prelates of the said Temple, notwithstanding it was evidently proved and known, that upon an error only & oversight, and not for any ill intent they were come into the Church, yet were they put to death as fellows, and guilty of some heinous fact in the highest degree. The people of Acarmania complained unto King Philip, and informed him of this villanous part and hostile act by them committed; and obtained a grant from him, that they might be permitted with the aid of the Macedonians, to make war upon the Athenians. This army at first invaded the territories of Athens, and with fire and sword made waste & havock of all, and so with a rich booty of all sorts returned unto Acarmania. There were the first quarrels on both sides, that stirred colds and kindled fire between them. Afterwards was defiance given, and open war proclaimed, by the general decrees of both States. For when King Attalus and the Rhodians pursued after Philip, as he retired into Macedonia, and were come as far as Egina, then the said King passed over to Pyraeum, for to renew and confirm the league with the Athenians. Against his coming the whole City went forth with their wives and children to meet him on the way: the Clergy with their rich vestments and goodly ornaments were ready to receive him as he entered the City: the very gods themselves in a manner abandoned their fithnes to give him entertainment. Immediately was the people summoned to a general assembly, that the King might deliver his mind before them all: but afterwards, upon more sage advice, it was thought to stand better with the honour and Majesty of a Prince, that he should first end in writing what he thought good, rather than in open place either to blush himself in recounting his favors and good turns done unto the City, or in hearing the acclamations of the multitude in token of joy, to be abashed and ashamed of their grois and unmeasurable flattery. But in his letters which he sent unto the assembly, and were there openly read and published, first he made a rehearsal of the benefits that this confederate Army had received at his hands. Secondly, he discoursed of the worthy exploits which he had performed against Philip. And finally he knit up all with an exhortation, that whiles they had himself, the Rhodians, and especially the Romans to friend them, they should put themselves in arms and begin war: as who, if they now forsook the enterprise, and let slip the present opportunity, should hereafter seek in vain to find it, which once they had so ratchelly lost. Then had the Rhodian Embassadors audience given them, who lately had done the Athenians a great pleasure, in recovering and sending home unto Athens four long foists, which newly had been boorded and taken by the Macedonians. Hereupon with general accord they decreed to denounce and wage war against King Philip. But first they did King Attalus incredible honour beyond all measure and then likewise to the Rhodians. Then and never before there was some speech moved of adjoining unto the ten ancient tribes, one other tribe, which of the Kings name should be called Attalus. Unto the City of the Rhodians they gave in token of vertue, a Crown of beaten gold. And like as beforetime the men of Rhodes had granted free Burgeoisie of their City to the Athenians, so they of Athens now endured the Rhodians with their liberties and franchises. This done, K. Attalus returned to his fleet in the rode of Egina. The Rhodians then weighed anchor, and from Egina sailed to Cos. From whence along the Islands, they passed to the Rhodes: and

A and in their voyage confedered themselves with them all, excepting Andros, Paros, and Cythera, which were guarded by garrisons of the Macedonians. In Egina King Attalus made his abode a certain time, and entered into no action, by occasion of messengers whom he had lent into Atolus, and Embassadors that were expected from thence. But as he could not prevail with the Atolians, & persuade them to take arms, onenting themselves with the peace that in some sort they had concluded with Philip: so himself, and the Rhodians (who no doubt, if they had preited and followed hard upon Philip might have gained and enjoyed this glorious title, that they alone of themselves had delivered Greece from servitude) by inferring him once again to cross the seas as far as Heleponus, and to possess himself of the commodious and important towns of Grecas, thereby to re-enforce his power and gather more strength, gave food and nourishment to the war, B and in the end let the Romans go away with the honour, both of managing and also of finishing the same. Philip carried with him yet a more princely mind and Kingly courage: who, although he was not able to match and make his part good so much as with Attalus and the Rhodians: his enemies, yet was he nothing at all daunted with the thundring threats of the Roman war: but sent Philotes, a Captain of his, with a power of two thousand foot and two hundred horse, to invade and spoil the territory of the Athenians, committed his Armado to the charge of Heracles, to see fail for Maronea, and himself in person marched by land thither with another regiment of two thousand footmen lightly appointed, and two hundred men of arms. Maronea he forced at the first assault. But as for Egina, after he had with much labour and travail laid siege thereto a long time in the end he was Master thereof, through the treason of Gaius, a deputed C L Governor there for King Ptolemeus. After this he surprized and won other Castles, as Cyprus, Darison, and Seryhenm. From thence he advanced forward to Chersonesus, where he gained Ectus and Alopecomeus, which willingly surrendered: Callipolis also and Madyros, with some other peeces of bafe account and reckoning. But the Abydens shut their gates against the King, and would not suffer so much as his Embassadors to set foot within their Cities. There lay Philip a long time before the town and beleaguered it: and surely had not Attalus and the Rhodians forsacked the time, it might have been faved and the siege raised. Attalus sent thither three hundred fouldiers and no more to lie in garrison, and the Rhodians one galley only with four banks of oars out of the navy when it rode at Tendos. And afterwards when as Attalus himself was thither come, at what time as the townsmen could hardly hold out any longer against the siege, he made D them a shew only near at hand of some help: other relief would he afford none to his allies either by land or sea. The Abydens at first planted their engines and artillery along the walls, and with shot from thence not only distressed their enemies, and kept them from approach and entrance, but also annoyed them as they lay in harbour with their ships: but afterwards, seeing part of their walls ruinate and laid open: and perceiving besides that the enemies had undermined and were come under the ground as far as the inner countermure, which the inhabitants in great haste had raised within, forthwith they sent Embassadors to the King to treat and arke about some conditions for delivering up the City. The townsmen capitulated and demanded, that the Rhodian Galley aforesaid, with all her mariners, and the garrison also of King Attalus, might be sent away in safety, and themselves permitted to depart the town every one with a single suit only of apparel. But Philip made answer again that they had no peaceto them at all, unless they would quit the place, and simply commit themselves unto his mercy. This Embassage related unto them, set them in such an heat and choler, that partly for ipight and indignation, and partly upon despair, they fell into the like rage that the Saguntines did in times past. All the dames and wives of the City they commanded to be shut up within the Temple of Diana: their young boies and maidens that were free-born, the sucking babes, together with their nurises, they caused to be bestowed within the common place of public exercise: their gold and silver they took order to be brought into the market place: their rich attire, their costly apparel and furniture, to be cast into the two Gallies, the one of Rhodes, and the other of Cyzicus, which rid in the haven: and last of all, that their Priests should be brought forth with their beasts for sacrifice and altars erected in the midst of the place. There first were certain men choien of purpose: who so soon as they perceived the battaillon of their countreimen deleated and slain, fighting before the breaches of the wall, immediately should run upon their wives and children, and kill them without mercy, cast away into the sea their gold and silver, and all the furniture above-said that was in the Gallies, and let the edifices and houses asre, as well publicke as private, in as many places as possibly they could. For the performing and execution of these premises, they were bound by an oath ministred unto them: the form whereof, with a curied malediction thereto annexed, they pronounced word for word from the Priests mouth. Then, as many as were of lawful age to bear arms, swore likewise. That not one of them would depart out of the battell alive, but with victory. Thus remembering the oath they had taken, and how they called the gods to G witness, they fought so resolutely, that whereas the night would have parted the combat, the King terrified with their furious rage, first gave over the conflict. The chief and principall men of the City, whose charge was to play the more cruell and horrible part in this tragical act, seeing there remained but few alive after this skirmish, and those grievously wounded and tired out of heart for weariness: the next morning early by day-break lent their Priests with their insules and veiles of peace, to render the City unto Philip. Before the town was fully yielded, M. Emilius the youngest of those three Roman Embassadors which were sent to Alexandria, hearing of the the straight siege of the Abydens came by the consent of the other two unto Philip. Where he laid open their grievances, and made complaint, That he had yarr'd upon Attalus and the Rhodians, and namely even then be sieged and assailed Abydos most forcibly. And when the King answered that Attalus and the Rhodians without just cause on his part offered, began first to molest and trouble him. What? (quoth Amphilochus again) were you molested and troubled first by the Abydens too? Philip who was not wont to be told the truth so plainly, thinking this rejoinder of his more bold and malapert than to be offered to a King, "Your youthfull age, quoth he, is fair face, and above all the Roman name maketh you hardy and audacious. But I would advise you all, first to remember your covenants, and to entertain peace with me. For in case ye once begin with me, and put me to it: I do you understand, that I also am fully resolved to make you feel the smart, and know, that the realm and nation of the Macedonians is no less renowned for feats of arms than the Romans. Philip having dismissed the ambassadors, and seized upon all the gold and silver that lay on an heap together, lo! all the booty of men of quality that might have yielded him a round ransom. For the multitude of common people fell into such a fit of rage and madness, that all of a sudden they imagined those who let their lives in the conflict were betrayed: and so casting one in anothers teeth their perjury, and charging the Priests especially, that they were forsworn in delivering them alive unto the enemy whom they had devoted and appointed to death; they ran at once from all parts to the pitifull massacre of their own wives and children: and when they had so done, they made no more ado, but by fire, by sword, by drowning, hanging, and one way or other, they wrought a quick dispatch and clean riddance of themselves also. The King attorned to see them thus horn-mad, flaid the bloody his own souldiers, saying, that he would allow the Abydens three daies to dye in. During which term of time, the conquered Abydens exercised more fearful cruelty upon their own persons than ever the conquerors would have put in practice in the height of their heat and cholerick fury. Inasmuch as there was not one of them came alive into the enemies hands; but such as either fast tied with bonds, or otherwise by some forcible means were flaid from being their own hangmen, and the butchers of their proper bodies. Philip after he had placed a garrison at Abydos returned into his own Realm. Now when this miserable calamity of the Abydens had flaid Philip to enterprise war against the Romans, like as Amphilochus afore him took heart by the wofull destruction of Saguntum to do the semblable: he told he was encountered with posts that brought news, how the Consul was in Epirus already, and had withdrawn his land-forces to Apollonia, and bestowed his servants at sea in Cor-Lyra, there to winter.

In this while the Ambassadors who were sent into Africa had their dispatch and this answer from the Carthaginian. First, as touching Amilcar the General of the army and forces in France, they could do no more but banish his person, and confiscat his goods. Then concerning the fugitive traitors and rebels which were run from the Romans, they had sent home again unto them as many as they could search out and come by: and to that purpose they would address Ambassadors themselves unto the Romans, to satisfy the Senat in that behalf. And presently they sent to Rome two hundred thousand Modii of wheat, and other two hundred thousand into Macedony to the army there. From thence the Roman Ambassadors went forward to the King in Numidia. To King Masaniassa, they delivered the presents which the Romans sent, and declared unto him their commission: at whose hands they received a thousand Numidian horie, whereas he offered them two thousand: himself took order for their embarking, and so dispatched them into Macedony, with provision of two hundred thousand measures of wheat, and as many of barley. A third Embassy they had to Verninus, who met the Ambassadors as far as the utmost marches of his Realm, and to their disposition and discretion referred the drawing and penning of all conditions of peace as they would themselves: saying withall, that he held any peace whatsoever, that he should have with the people of Rome for good and just. So there were presented unto him certain articles and conditions of peace, and for the ratifying thereof he was joynted to send his Ambassadors to Rome.

Much about the very same time L. Cornelius Lentulus the Vice-Prator returned out of Spain: N who having declared in the Senat his valiant and fortunate exploits, that for many years together he had achieved in Spain; and in consideration thereof, demanded that it might be lawful for him to enter the City in triumph: the Senat judged that his noble acts deserved no less than he desired: but they had no such precedent from their ancestors, that he should be allowed to triumph, who had warred, neither as Dictator, nor Consul, nor Prator: and as for Lentulus, in quality of Vice-Prator only, and not of Consul or Prator he took upon him the charge of the Province of Spain. Howbeit, in the end they came down to this point, that he should ride into the City on horseback as Ovan, But T. Sempronius Longus a Tribune of the Com. interposed his negative, alleging that they had as little example to shew for that; and no practise or custom at all of their ancient predecessors. But in fine the Tribune gave place to the general accord of the LL, O and was content to be over-ruled. So after the order set down by the Senat, L. Lentulus entered Rome in that solemnity and pomp before-named. He presented in shew of the pillage that he had got, 44000 pound weight of silver, 2450 pound weight of gold. To his souldiers he distributed out of the spoil 120000 Asces apiece.

Now was the army of the Consul translated already from Arretium to Ariminum, and five thousand Latine allies were passed out of France into Etruria. Therefore L. Furius departed from Ariminum, made haste by taking great journeyes to come against the Gauls who then laid siege to Cremona, and encamped within a mile and an half from the enemy. Means and opportunity he had to do a notable exploit, and win a good hand of the enemies, if immediately upon his first coming he might have assailed their Camp: for they wandred to and fro in clattering with up and down the country a foraging, and had let no sufficient guard to the defence of their Camp. But he feared greatly that his souldiers were weary and tired: be as the companies marched apace thither in exceeding great haste. Howbeit the Gauls being called back by the hooping and hollowing of their fellows, let go their booty which they had in manner as good as in their hands, and returned to the Camp and the morrow after ranged themselves in battell array. The Romans were not behind for their parts, albeit they had hardly time enough to let themselves in order. The enemies ran so suddenly and made such haste to fight. The right wing (for the army of the allies was divided into wings) was placed in the vanguard, the two Roman legions in the rearward; M. Furius led the right wing, M. Cecilius had the conduct of the legions; and L. Valerius Flaccus (all three Lieutenants) commanded the Cavalry. The Prator kept with him two Lieutenants, Ca. Lellorius, and P. Turanius, by whose means he might look about from every part, and be ready to oppose himself against all hidden attempts whatsoever of the enemies. At the first, the Gauls hoped that with their numbers they should be able to tread down and trample under their feet that right wing of allies which was in the forefront: and to that effect they redoubled their multitudes into one place, and charged upon it with all their might and main together. But seeing that enterprise sped not well, they endeavored to environ the corners and sides, and to compass the enemies round about: which they thought they might soon do, being so many as they were in comparison of so few: which when the Prator perceived, to the end that he also might preceed his battrellions at large, he displayed the two legions in the rearward, to as he compassed on both hands that wing which fought in the vanguard and therewith vowed two Chappels to Jupiter, if that day he might be so fortunate as to vanquish his enemies. To L. Valerius he gave direction, that of one side he should with the Cavalry of the two legions, and on the other side with the horie belonging to the allies charge upon the wings of the enemies, and not suffer them in any case to enclose the battell about. Herewithal himself also, eipping the middle battailon of the Gauls to be but thin by reason they were stretched out from thence to the corners and points of each hand, commanded his souldiers to keep close together, to advance forward and break through their ranks. So were the wings of the Gauls by the horsemen discomfited, and they in the midst repulged back & chased by the footmen: and when the enemies thus at once on every hand were beaten down and killed they shewed their backs, and fled as fast as they could to the camp. The horse pursued them in the rout and chase: and anon the legionary footmen made after also, and gave an assault upon their Camp. There escaped from thence not all out six thousand: slain there were and taken prisoners above 35000, with twenty banners and ensigns, and more than two hundred French wagons, charged and laden with much pillage. In this conflict, Amilcar the General of the Carthaginians lost his life, and three Noblemen of the French, Leaders of mark and name. The Placentine captives, to the number of two thousand men of free condition, were delivered again to them of their own Colony. This was a goodly victory; and upon the letters which came with tidings thereof to Rome, received there with great joy; and ordained it was, that a solemn procession should be held for the space of three daies, Or Romans and allies one with another, there died in this battell two thousand: most of them were of that right wing, upon which the enemies in the beginning of the conflict most of all discharged their fury.

Albeit the Prator had brought the war to a good pass, and in manner finished it, yet the Consul also C. Aurelius, having accomplished his necessary affairs at Rome, made no stay but took his journey into France, and received the victorious army of the Prator. The other Consul who came into his Province but a little before the end of Autumn, wintered about Apollonia. The Roman galleys which from the Armado that lay in dock at C. Cremona were sent as is aforesaid to Athens with C. Claudius, were no sooner arrived at Pyraeus, but they mightily comforted the allies, whose hearts were well-nigh done: for neither were there any more invasions now by land as there were wont to be from Corinth side by the way of Megara along into their territories: and the men of war and Pyrats ships which from Chalcis had made not only the less dangerous to the Athenians, but also the maritime & sea coasts, durst not now approach nearer than to the cape of Sunium, no nor venture into the open main sea from out of the straits of Euripus. Over and besides, there came in to them three Rhodian galleys with four banks of oars: there were also three open ships of Athens well rigged and appointed, for to keep the quarters that lay along the river. Claudius was well appaid, and thought he had got enough for the present, in case the City and Territory of Athens might be sufficiently guarded by this fleet. But fee, there presented unto him an occurrence besides of far greater importance and consequence. Certain bidden persons of Chalcis, expelled from thence by the wrongs and violence of those that sided with King Philip, advertised him that the City of Chalcis might be easily surprised without any conflict or resistance at all: for, not only the Macedonians ranged abroad every where up and down because there were no enemies near at hand to fear: but also the townsmen presumptuous upon the garrison of the Macedonians, neglected the guard of the City. Upon the assurance of their words, he set forward: and although he was arrived at Sunium with too good speed, that he might with ease have failed to the entrance of the straits of Enbaeus, yet for fear of being

Ch. 8.

"strangers born, and barbarous, hath so polluted and violated at once all laws of God and man: He
 "so as in his former rode and expedition he seemed to make most impious war with the infernal "Gods and Spirits beneath: and in the second, with the heavenly powers and Gods above. All "the monuments and tombs within their confines are defaced and destroyed: the dead in their "graves are all laid bare, not so much as the bones of any one lye covered with mould. Temples
 "we had and Chappels, which, as in times past when our ancestors inhabited those small holds,
 "hamlets and villages, they consecrated and hallowed: so when they were reduced into one City,
 "and enrolled into wards and parishes, they took not a better abandoned altogether. Round a"bout these sacred Churches hath Philippus and continued all: the holy images of the Gods,
 "lie some scorched and half burnt: others headless and dismembered among the pillars and posts "of the Temples thrown along on the ground. And look what old work he hath made in the "country of Attica, so rich and so beautifully adorned in times past, the like havoc if he might "be let alone, would he make in Attica and in all Greece through out. For had not the Romans "come in time to succour, our very City also had been so served and pitcously disfigured. For
 "with like malicious intent came he to the City which worshipped those Gods, not sparing
 "the goddesses Minerva, the patroness and protectress of our Town and Cattle: the same wicked "mind he carried against the Temple of Ceres Eleusina: and no better affected was he to Jupiter
 "and Minerva in Pirene. But being repulsed by force and arms not only from our Temples, "but also from the walls of our City, he wreaked his anger and raged against those Chappels and "religious houses which had nothing for their defence, but only the reverent regard of the Gods, "whereof he had none. Hereupon, they prayed and humbly besought the Ætolians, to have com"passion on the Athenians, and to enterprize the war, under the conduct first of the immortal "Gods, and then of the Romans; who next to the Gods are most powerful and mighty. Then "the Roman Emb. floundered in this wise. "The Macedonians hit, and after them the Athe"nians, have altered the whole course and form of my speech. For, whereas my coming hither
 "was to complain of the injuries done by Philip to so many Cities of our allies and allies, the "Macedonians by accusing the Romans first, have put me so hardly to my flouts, that I need ra"ther to employ my wits in making a defence of our selves, than in framing an accusation against "others. The Athenians again in reckoning up and recounting the impious and horrible, and in"human pricks of King Philip committed against the Gods, both above and beneath, what have "they left behind for me or any man else to object against him besides? What they have laid,
 "you may well think, and truly suppose, that the men of Chios, Alydus, Ereus, Micones, Ithaca,
 "Paros, Samos, Larissa, and Messene: whose also here of Achaia, complain of the same, yea, and
 "of more grievous and cruel enormities: as whom he had greater means to annoy and hurt, As "for such things as he hath laid to our charge, as he hath with Rhégium, with Capua, and Syracuse, "cannot be answered and defended. Reproached us he hath with Rhégium, there to lie
 "in garrison at the instant prayer of the Rhégians themselves, who requested us to lend them
 "this legion I confess, most wickedly and treacherously seized upon the City, and possessed it "to their own use, for the guard and defence whereof they were first sent. A vowed we (I pray "you) that act of theirs? Nay, punished we not by arms that lewd legion and outrageous? and "when we had them in our power and at our devotion forced not we them to make amends and "satisfaction to our allies with the smart of their back and sides, and with the loss of their heads "in the end? And when we had to do, restored we not unto the Rhégians their City, their "Lands, all their goods whatsoever together with their liberties, franchises, and laws? As for "the Syracians, when they were oppressed by strange and foreign tyrants, we judging it to be a "great indignity, relieved and succoured them: and after we had been for three years space al"most wearied and toiled out with continual siege and incessant assault both by land and sea of "their City, so exceeding strong and so well fortified: we seeing that the Syracians gave them "made choice rather to be in servitude under those tyrants, than to be taken by us. Neither deny we that Sicily is our "Province: and that the Cities which took part and sided with the Carthaginians, & joyntly with "them accorded to wage war against us are tributaries unto us, and pay us yearly rents and pen"sions: may we so far from not taking this upon us, that contrary-wise we would, that both
 "you and all nations besides well knew, that every one received at our hands that measure of for-"time that he duly deserved. And now as touching the Capuans, should we repent that we have
 "chastised them in such sort, whereof they themselves verily can not complain? These men, after "we had maintained war against the Samnites in their quarrel and defence, for the space well near
 "of seventy years: to so small dilligence of ours, and with many a loss and overthrow, after we had "linked them unto us first by league and alliance, then by marriage and affinity, and last of all, by "freedom and bourgeoisie of our City: these men I say, in our adversity, were the first of all other "nations of Italy that villainously massacred our garrison there, and revolted unto Annibal: and "then for very spite and indignation that they were by us besieged, sent Annibal to assail the City "of Rome. And if we had proceeded in that rigour against them, that we had left neither City "standing nor any one person of them living, who could take offence thereat, and justly say, That "they had been more hardly entreated and dealt with than they deserved? There were more of "them, that upon touch and prick of guilty conscience for their lewd and wicked deeds, made "them-

A "themselves away and so perished, than were by us executed and put to death. As for the rest, we "took from them indeed their Town, we deprived them of their possessions and livings, yet so as "we left them both lands to occupy, and places to dwell in. The Ætolians Town it self we suffered "to stand still safe and sound, that whoever at this day think it, can not find the least token or "shew of a City either forced or won. But what speak I of Attica? seeing we have afforded unto "Carthage (a City conquered and subdued) both peace and a liberty: I trust, as we have "caused rather to be afraid, left by remission and over-willingness to pardon those whom we have "vanquished, we give occasion to many more to be so bold to trie the hazard and fortune of "war against us. And thus I had to say in defence of our selves. Now somewhat I have to speak
 "against King Philip whose horrible murders committed upon some of his own house, enemies "neerest kinsfolk and friends, whose too late and unbridled lust (more naked and inhumane in "manner than his cruelty) ye know better that are neerer unto Macedony. As for you, my ma"sters of Ætolia, we have for your sakes begun war with Philip, and you again with us have "concluded peace with him. It may be you will alledge, that whiles we were occupied in the "Punick war, ye were forced and compelled for fear to take such conditions of peace at his hands,
 "who was the stronger: we likewise (pressed with greater affairs and troubles) forbore to pro"secute and follow that war, which by you first was laid out and given over. At this present, seeing
 "by the grace and goodness of the Gods the Punick war is come to an end, both we have em"ployed and bent all our forces against Macedony and ye also have good occasion and opportuni"ty offered to reenter into amity and alliance with us, unless ye had rather perish with Philip,
 "C than vanquish with the Romans.

When the Roman Embassador had ended this Oration, the Ætolians generally were inclined and affected to the Romans: but Damocratus their Pretor (corrupted as the speech went with a sum of money received from King Philip, and made for him) gave allent neither to the one party nor the other, but said, "That in counsels of great weight and importance, there was nothing "more hurtful and prejudicial, than haste for repentance (qd, he) follow it never so soon, when a "thing is once done, yet it cometh too late and booteth not: considering, that rash counsels can "not be revoked, hasty and headlong courses cannot possibly be recalled, nor matters on, cap be "reduced again to their former state. As for the propriety of that resolution now in hand, "whereof my self am of advice, that the due maturity & full ripeness should be expected, it might
 "now at this present be set down and concluded upon, For seeing that by our laws & ordinances D "provided it is that we may not treat of any affairs concerning peace or war, but in the general "councils called Panætolick or Pyluck: therefore for the present, I would have you to ordain and "decree, that your Pretor without fraud or covin might call and hold a Diet or court of Patria-
 "ment, whensoever he is minded to treat of war or peace: and whatsoever then and there shall be "proposed and determined, it may stand in as good force, strength, & vertue as if it had passed in "a full Panætolick or Pyluck council. Thus the Embassadors being dismissed and sent away in "suspence, and nothing decided and concluded, he said, That he had performed a singular piece of "service to his nation and country. For now they would side and take part with those, whose "fortune it were to speed better in the field. This went matters in the assembly of the Ætolians.

E Now Philip with all diligence prepared for war both by sea and land. His sea forces he assembled together unto Demetrias a port in Thessaly, making account that Attalia and the Roman fleet would in the beginning of the next spring depart from Ægina. Over his navy and all the sea coasts he appointed Theracles Admiral, like as he had done aforetime. Him self levied and gathered his land-forces, supposing verily that he had debared and bereft the Romans of two great means of aid, to wit, the Ætolians of the one side, and the Dardanians of the other: in that the narrow straits and passage of Pelaginis, was stopped and made sure against them by his son Perseus. The Consul on the other side made no preparations for war, but was on foot and in action already, conducting his army through the confines of the Dardaniens, and transporting with him out of his wintering harbor all the provision of grain, whereof the country yielded him sufficient to the F maintenance of his soldiers. The great Towns and Villages were burned unto him, partly for love and partly for fear: some were tormented by assault, others abandoned by the inhabitants, and were found desolate by reason that the barbarous people were retired into the mountains near by, to save themselves: and at Lingum near the river Beusis he encamped from whence he went to pursue for corn out of the garners and barns of the Dardaniens. Philip saw well enough that the country all about was in an hurry, and the people in great fear and fright; but being uncertain to what place the Consul intended to march, he sent out a cohort of light horsemen as spies to discover what way the enemies took and whither they pretended to go. The Consul likewise for his part was as doubtful: well he wist that Philip was dislodged from the places where he had wintered, but in what quarter he journeyed, he knew not: and therefore he also had set forth certain G horse in spial to scour the coasts. These two bands or troops wandered at adventure through the countrey in the end in one way, after they had a long time wandered from divers and contrary parts the countrey of the Dardaniens. Both parts knew well by the noise they heard a far off as well of men as horse, that enemies approached: and therefore they had both horse & armour in readiness, before they were in sight one of another: for so soon as ever they were within their interview, they made no stay, but charged immediately and joyned issue. It fortuned, that for number and valour both, they were equally matched, as being choice and elect men of either side: whereupon they fought for certain hours alike, until such time as their own weariness and the faintness of their horses parted the battal in doubtful victory. Of the Macedonians there died 40 horsemen: and of the Romans five and thirty. And for all this, neither brought the Macedonians any better intelligence to their King, nor the Romans to their Consul, of the place where the enemies were incamped. But certain fugitive traitors gave advertisement thereof: who commonly in all wars, upon a running head and light humour that naturally they have, are given to hearken after news, and to enquire in what terms enemies stand. Philip imagining that it would avail somewhat both to purchase the affectionate love of his souldiers, and also to induce them more cheerfully and readily to undertake all hazards for his sake, in case he seemed to have a careful regard to bury those horsemen which were slain in the journey and expedition aforesaid; commanded their bodies to be brought into the camp, to the end that all men might see what honour he did them in their funerals. But I see how nothing is more uncertain, nor whereof a man may make less reckoning than the minds and affections of the multitude. That which was thought would have made them more willing and forward to enter into any danger and jeopardy whatsoever, even that, wrought a contrary effect and caused them to be most fearful and backward. For they who were pined to fight with Greeks and Illyrians, and to see mens bodies wounded with push of pike, galled with arrows, and pierced with lance here and there, in this or that part; after they beheld once their fellows so butcherly mangled with the Spanish cutelaxes and arming swords, the arms cut away from the body, the heads either imitten clean off by the neck, or cloven down right, and lying on the souldiers: their panthes ript with the bowels open, and guts drawing after; with other deep wounds and broad lashes, most hideous and fearful to behold; then they saw all full well (fearful creatures as they were) what manner of weapons, and what kind of men they were to deal against. Nay, the King himself was terribly afraid who had not as yet encountered with the Romans in any field. Whereupon he lent for his son to come back with the garison that he had in the streights of Pelagonia; thereby to increase and strengthen his own forces: and so laid open the way into Macedonia for Plemaus and the Dardaniens. Himself in person with a power of 20000 foot, and 4000 horse, guided by the fugitives aforesaid, marched toward the enemy, and about a quarter of a mile or somewhat less from the Roman camp, possessed himself of a little hill near to Anticnem, which he fortified with trench and rampier. From whence, when he beheld the Romans encamped hard under him he wondered (by report) to see not only the whole body of the camp, with the form and order thereof in general, but also how every part was ranged and set out in several, both in the manner of quartering and pitching their pavilions, and also in the proportion of the wayes for breadth and length between. And having viewed and considered every thing accordingly: "Believe me (quod he) there is no man who seeth this, that can either think or say it is the camp of a barbarous nation. For two daies since the Consul and the King (expecting one anothers attempts and enterprises) kept their souldiers close within their holds. When the third day was come the Roman General brought forth his whole power into the field. But the King fearing to hazard all to foot upon a cast, drew forth 400 Triballians (which were, as we have said elsewhere, of the Illyrian nation) and 300 Cretensians, all footmen, accompanied with the like number of horsemen: and sent them under the conduct of Athenagoras, one of his courtiers and gallants, for to brave the Cavalry of the enemies, and to challenge them to fight. The Romans, whose main battal was little above half a mile off, put out against them their light armed van-cuirriers; and as it were, two companies or cornets of horsemen: to the end, that they might be equal with the enemy in number, both of foot and horse. They of the Kings part supposed verily, that they should fight after their old and accustomed manner: namely, that the horsemen should by turns, one while ride forward in the face of the enemy, other while retire again; sometime follow in chase, and have use of their darts and weapons, and sometimes turn and shew their back parts: that the nimblemet and activity of the Illyrians would stand in good stead to make excursions and sudden skirmishes: also that the Cretensian archers should be employed in shooting arrows aloof at the enemies, as they advanced and came forward, or flung out all abroad on every side: but the violent charge of the Romans, no less continual and obstinate, than fierce and eager, put them quite out of this manner of service, and disordered all. For no otherwise than if it had been a set battal between two entire armies, their footmen lightly armed, so soon as they had lanced and let go their javelins from them, took them to their swords, and came to hand fight: the horsemen likewise, no sooner affronted the enemies, but either slaying their horses they fought on horseback, or else slighted on foot, and among the footmen maintained the skirmish. By this means neither the Kings Cavalry could match the Romans, because they had not been used to a fiery battle: nor his footmen who were wont to traverse their ground, and skirmish, never standing still, and withal in manner half naked for any harness they had, was able to make their parts good with the Roman light appointed footmen, who had their swords and bucklers, and were furnished with armour, as well defensive as offensive. So they could not endure long to maintain fight, but were forced to retire into their camp, and by nothing else saved themselves but by good seamanship and riding apice. These passed one day between, when the King minding to trie acquaintance with all his forces of Cavalry, and footmen lightly appointed, had laid in wait by night a number of traitors, whom they call Pelopsia, in a convenient place between both camps, and given Greek on a dilligence unto Athenagoras and his men of arms. That if they sped well in open battal in light fight, they should on still and follow their good fortune: but if they went by the worse.

A worse, and were too weak, they should give ground by little and little, and train the enemy to the place of ambush. Well, it fell out so, that the horsemen indeed retired accordingly; but the leaders of that cohort aforesaid of targetiers, not attending the signal long enough, but raising their men out of ambush before time, lost the opportunity of playing their part, & performing a good service. The Roman Consul having both obtained victory in open battal, and escaped the danger of a covert train, retired himself into his camp. The morrow after, he came down into the plain field with all his forces, and put them in battal array, having arranged his Elephants in the forefront of the vanguard. And this was the first time that ever the Romans had use in their wars, of this beast; by occasion, that in the late Punic war they had taken one of them alive from their enemies. But perceiving that Philip kept himself close within his camp, he approached under the very rampiers, yea, and reproched him for his cowardice. And seeing for all that, he could not even then be drawn to a battal: considering also, that if he kept there a standing camp long to never unto the enemy, his provision of corn should be exposed to dangers: for no sooner should the purveyors and forragers be gone abroad into the country, and spread over the fields, but the enemies light horsemen would be ready at their heels to catch them in, and cause them to come home: therefore he removed his camp to a place almost eight miles off, called Octolophum, where he might make his provision with less danger. Now when the Romans purveyed for corn and victuals in the territory thereabout, and were come upon a time somewhat near and within danger of Philip, at first the King let them alone, and kept his men within their camp, to the end, that they might be more bold and venturesome, and withal, less wary and circumspect: but clyping C then once stragling aunder here and there out of order, he let forward with all his Cavalry, and the auxiliaries of the Candiot, and marched to fight, as the swiftest of his footmen by running might keep pace with the horsemen: thus having gotten between them and home, he pitched down his ensigns betwixt the Roman camp and the forragers. Then divided he his forces in two companies, the one he sent forth to course and chase them, so dispersed as they were; giving special charge and direction, not to leave any of them alive that they could reach: with the other he staid himself behind, and beset all the wayes, and stopped the passages by which the enemies were like to retire and have recourse unto their camp. Soon were they killed or put to flight in every place, and as yet not one escaped to the Roman camp, for to bring news of this disastrous overthrow, as many as fled back chanced upon the guard that the King had set: and more were slain by them that beset the wayes, than those that were sent out to the pursuit and execution. At length some happened to escape through the midst of the Kings corps de guard, and in great haste and fearful manner came into the camp with a troublesome noise and tumult, rather than any certain tidings. The Consul, after order given to the horsemen, that every man should incur and relieve what way soever he could, their distressed fellows in this extremity, himself led forth the legions out of the camp, and marching in a four-square battailon advanced toward the enemies. The Horsemen being spread over the fields in divers places, some lost their right way, being deceived by other outcries heard from a contrary part: other some met with their enemies, and at one instant, the skirmish began in many and sundry places. The band that guarded about the King, fought most fiercely and cruelly: for both they were for their own number as well of horse as foot, a full army well-need; and also most of the Romans light upon them, because they kept the very port and roadway in the midst. In this regard also were the Macedonians the better and had the vantage, because the King himself was present in person to encourage and exhort them: and withal the auxiliary Candioti wounded many of the Romans ere they were aware of them: for why, they were well prepared aforesaid, ranged thick and close together, and so fought against them that rode straggling abroad one from another, and without array. And verily, if they could have kept any mean and measure in their chase, they had mightily advanced themselves, not only in winning the honor of that day, but also, in the main point of the whole war. But pursuing them beyond all reason, and without discretion, upon a bloud-thirsty desire that they had of massacre, they chanced upon the Roman Squadrons which were gone before with the Tribuns and Colonels: in so much as the Illyrians aforesaid, who before fled, when they once saw the ensigns of their own infantry, reined their horse heads, and turned again upon the enemy that ran with bridle in horse neck: and so in the turning of an hand, the fortune of the battal changed and came about, and they that erewhile made pursuit, now shewed their backs, and fled again. Many of them were slain that came to close hand fight, many likewise of those that ran away. Neither fell they all upon the edge of the sword: for some there were who plunged into bogs and marshes where both horse and man sunk in the deep mud and mire, and so were swallowed up and perished. The King himself also was in great danger: for his horse being wounded under him and fallen, he also came headlong down to the ground, and hardly escaped but he had been troden under foot and murthered as he lay along. One horseman (so feared as he was) upon his own horse: who bring now on foot, and not able to run as fast as the horsemen that fled away, was with many a stab and thrust fust dispatched by the enemies that came running together to the King when he was seen to fall. And the King after he had ridden in fearful sight about the fenny meers, one while where there was some way, and otherwhiles where there was none at all to be seen, chanced at length to come to his camp, when most men were in despair that he could possibly escape in safety. In this skirmish there were 200 others within their camp without any corps de guard, swilling and sleeping all night and day long, H and made no difference of the times, Philip came upon them before they looked for him. And it being once known by the report of some that fled out of the fields in great affright, that he ap- proched: then Damocritus and the rest of the Captains began to quake for fear. Now was it about noon-tide of the day, at what time as most of them having taken their full lode of wine and vi- ands, lay along fast asleep. Then they fell to awake and raise one another, and to give the alarm: anon they sent out every way to call in those that were preading abroad in the fields. So much they were astonished, that for half many of the horsemen went forth without their swords, and most of them forgot to put on their cuirasses. Thus being led out in post halt, and hardly in all foot and horse together, able to make up the number of six hundred, they light upon the Kings Caval- ry, for number, armour, and courage much better than themselves: And therefore at the first they were discomfited: for before they were well entred into skirmish, they fled shamefully a- way toward their camp. Some of them came forth thither, and were either slain or taken priso- ners, even as many as the Kings horsemen overtook, and gat between them and their other com- panies. Philip, when he saw his men approach near unto their camp, commanded to found the retreat: for both horse and man was weary, not so much with fight as with their long journey and the exceeding speed that they made. Whereupon he gave commandment, that the Horse- men by troops, and the light armed Footmen by their companies and Squadrons should water their horses one after another, and go to their dinner and repast. Others he kept still in armour for a guard attending the Regiment of the footmen, that came but slowly forward; by reason they were heavily armed at all pieces: who being come, they also were enjoined to pitch down K their ensignes, and lay their weapons before them, and to take a short-bait and hasty pittance, sen- ding two or three at the most out of every band for to water the horses. All this while the horse- men, together with the light armed souldiers, stood well appointed and in readines, if haply the enemy would have given any attempt. The Ætolians bestowed armed men all about the gates and the rampier, intending to guard and defend their strength and fortifications, for now by this and so time they also that were scattered over the fields, had retired themselves in a sure hold, long as they beheld the enemies to keep quiet, and not stir, and were themselves in a sure hold, they made their bravadoes, and were very lusty: but after that the ensignes of the Macedonians began to advance forward, and march in order of battel well appointed, close unto their trench L all at once they abandoned their guards and quarters, and ran out at the back part of their camp, and fled to the foresaid hill, where the Æthamians were encamped. Many of the Ætolians were likewise in this hasty flight killed or taken prisoners. Philip made no doubt, but that the Æthamians also might have been driven from their hold, if there had been day enough behind: but the day being spent already first in the skirmish, and afterward in the lackening of their camp, he let him down upon the next plain, hard at the foot of the hill aforesaid, intending very early the next morning to assault the enemy. The Ætolians feared as much now, as they were before when they quit their own camp, fled scattering away the night following. Here Aminander flood them in very good stead, by whole good guidance and direction, the Æthamians being skillful in the coasts of the country, conducted them into Ætolia, over the high mountains, whereas the enemies followed after them in blind and unknown by-ways. Some few of them M happened in this confused and scattered flight to lose their way and stumble upon the Macedonian horsemen, whom Philip by day light, had sent to cut off the tail of the enemies, so soon as he perceived the Dardaniens as they returned into their country, and at the first put their rearward in disarray. But afterward the Dardaniens turned head again, and embattelled themselves: so they fought on even hand, and nothing was won nor lost on any side. The Dardaniens began not so soon to advance forward and march on again, but the Kings power, with their horsemen and light armed souldiers came upon them afresh, and put them to great trouble. For they had no such means of help, and were besides furcharged with heavy armour, and withal, the place gave great advantage to those of the Kings part. Very few were slain more of their ranks and armies for a little, and upon small occasions; but as they fight close, so they retire together, and part not. Thus Philip having restrained these two nations by two brave exploits, which were as happily performed as bravely enterprises, recovered the losses again, by him received in the Roman war. There happened besides another occurrence, which diminished the number of his enemies the Ætolians. For Scopas, one of the chief noblemen of that nation, being sent from Alexandria by King Ptolemaus, with a mighty mass of gold, caried away with him into Egypt: six thousand footmen and certain horsemen, waged for money to serve. Neither had he left behind him any of the flour and yonth of Ætolia, if Damocritus had not chastised and rebuked them, and so by that means kept some of them at home: making remonstrances unto them, one while of the war that was toward, and another O while of the desolation which was like to ensue thereupon. But whether he did this upon a good zeal and care that he had of his country, or only to cross Scopas, because he had not fed him well with rich rewards and fat presents, it is not known. And thus much concerning the affairs passed between Philip and the Romans for that summer.

The Roman fleet having in the beginning of the same summer committed to Sea from Coryra, together with the Lieutenant Aspurgus passed beyond the point of the cape Malen, and joyned

A joined with King Attalus, near Seylleum in the territory of Hermione. Then the whole City and State of Athens, upon hope of present aid and succour, brake out and poured forth at once all the hatred and malice which they had conceived against Philip, and which a long time for very fear they had held in, and therefore kept themselves in good and reasonable terms with him. Now in this City there never want prompt and ready tongues to stir up and provoke the common people to a commotion. And as in all free States generally such kind of men are entertained and born out by the favour of the multitude, so in Athens especially, where eloquence is in most re- quest, and beareth greatest sway. Presently therefore an As was put up and proposed into the common people, and by them granted and confirmed, That all the Statues and Images of King Philip, together with their titles and titles, likewise of all his progenitors and predecessors, as B well men as women, should be defaced, pulled down, and destroyed. Item, That all the festival daies, the sacrifices and sacrificers, which had been instituted and ordained for the honor of him, should be profaned and unhallowed again. Item, That the very places, wherein ought had been erected, or inscriptions graven to his honour, should be held as detestable and accursed: and that from thence forward, it might not be lawfull to set up there any of those things that ought to stand, and be dedicated in a pure and clean place. Item, That the publick Priests of the City, in all their prayers, and so often as they prayed for the good estate of the people of Athens and their allies, for the preservation of their armies and armadoes: should detest and curse by name King Philip, his children and realm, his forces both by land and sea, with all the race and name of the Macedonian nation. Moreover, it ran on in the decree, That if any man from that time forward, C would prefer and propound any thing that might tend to the disgrace and infamy of Philip, the whole people of Athens should approve and allow the same whatsoever, and make an As there- of. Contrary-wise, if any person lay or do any thing for honour, or to impeach and check his dis- honour, whosoever should happen to kill the said party, he should be deemed and reputed, that he had killed him justly and lawfully. Finally, this branch was comprised within the decree, That all things ordained in times past against Pigistratus his line and progeny, should be observed and stand in force against Philip. Thus verily warded the Athenians against Philip with letters and words: wherein they are right valiant, and to say truth, good at nothing else. But Attalus and the Romans, having from Hermione shaped their course for Pyræum, arrived there. And after they had sojourned some few daies in Athens, and were laden with a number of decrees, where- D in the Athenians recounted the praises and commendations of their allies beyond all measure, like as they had before exceeded in shewing their malice against their enemies: they set sail from Pyræum to Andros. Where, riding at anchor in the bay called Gurelone, they sent certain men to sound the minds of the inhabitants, Whether they would chuse to yeeld the Town willingly, or rather abide the hazard of a forcible assault. Who answered again, that the Kings garrison being possessed of the Castle, and keeping it for Philip, they were not their own masters. Whereupon the King and the Roman Lieutenant for their forces on land, and with all preparation of engines and artillery in for an assault, approached the City divers waies. The Roman standards and their arms, not seen before in those parts, the resolute courage also of the souldiers, who so lustily and nimble came near to scale the walls, terrified and amazed the Greeks, much more than any thing E else. Therefore immediately they fled into the Castle, and the enemies were LL of the City. Now, after they had for two daies space held out in the fortres, presuming more upon the strength of the place than the force of their armour and weapons: they and the garrison together, compounded upon the third day to quit the place, so they might be brought with a convoy to Delium, a Town in Boeotia, and every man to have one single suit of apparel. Then the Romans leaving the bare City unto King Attalus, snatched it themselves, and took away with them all the pillage and ornaments that beautified the same. And to the end, that the Isle should not lie waste and desart, Attalus perswaded the Macedonians in manner all, and certain also of the Andrians, there to remain. Afterwards, they also who by composition were transported to Dium, were by the fair promises of the King drawn away from thence: which they gave ear and credit F to the sooner, for the love of their native country, the miseries whereof they might hardly brook. From Andros they crossed to Cythera. There they spent certain daies in assaulting the City, to no purpose: and seeing the gains would hardly quit their pains, they departed from thence. Near unto Præse (which is a place of Attica within the main) there joined unto the Roman fleet twenty pinnales of the Illyrians, who were sent to rob and spoil the territory of the Carylians: the rest of the fleet remained at Gerysum, a noble rode and port of Eubœa, until such time as the Illyri were returned from Carysum. Then all together they made sail, and passing the mids of the main sea, they fell with the Isle of Jens, near unto Seyrus. There they were laid for certain daies, by reason of the raging Northwind, which being once laid and the sea calm again, they passed to Seychus: a City lately pillaged and snatched by K. Philip. The souldiers ranged over the country, and brought G com with them to their ships. And whatsoever else was fit for mans food, other booty neither was there any nor deserved had the Greeks to be spoiled at their hands. Thence they bent their course for Cassandrea: first they rode at anchor near unto Mende, a village situate by the sea side, and be- longing to that State. From whence having sailed beyond the cape, & desirous to come about with their vessels for to approach the very walls of the City, there arose a tempest & suddain gulf: wherein they had like to have been cast away: but scattered they were alinder: & having for the most part lost the tackling of their ships, they escaped with much ado to land. This tempest at sea was also out of his Province to Rome against the solemn election of Magistrates, complained, not as men made reckoning he would have done, (That the Senat expected not for his coming, nor that the Consul was not permitted to debate the matter with the Prætor) but found himself grieved, "That the Senat had decreed a triumph, for as the party only was suffered to speak who was to triumph, and none of them might be heard who were present at the battell, And whereas our forefathers ordained, that Lieutenants, Colonels, Marshalls, and Centurions, yea, and in one word, the soldiers should bear a triumph: for this end and purpose, that the truth might appear to the world, of all things achieved by him unto whom to great honour was to be done: Was there any one (quoth he) of all that army which fought with the Gauls, I say not a soldier, but so much as a lackey or horse-boy following the Camp, of whom the Senat might enquire, whether the Prætor spake true or false? This done and said he published the day of assembly for the election aforesaid: wherein were created Consuls L. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Villius Tappulus. After them were Prætors chosen L. Quintus Flaminius, L. Valerius Flaccus, L. Villius Tappulus, and C. Cebius Pamphilus. Grain and other victuals that year were cheap. Great store of corn was brought out of Africk, which the Ædiles of the chair distributed to the people, at two Afles a Modius. They also set forth the Roman games and paltimes right sumptuously; yea, and represented them one day more than ordinary. Moreover, of the silver raised by fines and forfeitures, they made seven brazen statues, which they set up in the treasure-house of the City. The Plebeian plaies likewise were thrice renewed all over by the Ædiles of the Commons L. Terentius Maffellota, and C. Cebius Pamphilus Prætor elected. Finally, the funeral games that year were four daies together exhibited in the common place of the City, occasioned by the death of M. Valerius Lavinius: and celebrated they were by his two sons P. and M. who also shewed unto the people a brave spectacle of fencers at the sharp: wherein there were five and twenty couples that entered the lists and performed combat. M. Atr. C. Cotta, one of the Decemvirs, that year departed this life; and in his place M. Agilius Glabrio was subordinated. In the solemn assembly for electing Ædiles of the chair, it chanced that those two which were chosen might not immediately enter into office: for C. Cornelius Cethegus was created in his absence, while he governed the Province of Spain. And C. Valerius Flaccus, who was present at his own election, might not be sworn to maintain the laws, because he was the Flamin or Priest of Jupiter. For lawful it was not for any Magistrate to exercise his place above five daies, unless he were sworn to the laws. Then Flaccus preferred a petition that he might be dispensed with: whereupon the Senat ordained, That if the Ædile would find one to swear in his name at the good pleasure and discretion of the Consuls, then the Consuls (if they thought it meet) should deal with the Tribunes of the Commons, to propound it unto the people that it might pass under their grant. So L. Valerius Flaccus (the Prætor elected for the year following) was preferred to take the oath for his brother. Then the Tribunes put it to a canvass before the people, and they enacted, That the oath of his brother should be of the same validity as if the Ædile himself had taken it in his own person. Concerning the other Ædiles also there passed an act of the Commons. For when the Tribunes propoised unto the people, which two they would have to go into Spain as LL. deputies, with command over the armies: the people ordained, that C. Cornelius the Ædile of the chair might come home to bear his office, and L. Manlius also after so many years, depart out of his Province: the people ordained, that C. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Stertinius should have the conduct and government in Spain, in quality and title of Pro-Consuls.

The two and thirtieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the two and thirtieth Book.

Many strange and prodigious fights, as they were reported from divers countries, are here related and set down: among which, this is one, that in Macedony there was a bay tree sprung up of itself in the poop of a galley. T. Quintus Flaminius the Consul fought fortunately against Philip in the Straights of Epirus: and having put him to flight, he compelled him to return into his own kingdom. Himself with the assistance of the Ætolians and Atthamans, infested sore and plagued the Thessaly, which bordered upon Macedony. L. Quintus Flaminius the Consul his brother, by the aid of King Attalus and the Rhodians, made conquest by war at sea, of Eubœa and all the sea-coast. The Achai were received into amity. The conspiracy of slaves, that completed to deliver and set at large the hostages of the Carthaginians, was detected and took no effect. The number of Prætors was encreased to six. The Consul Cornelius Cethegus defeated the French Insularians in battell. League and amity was concluded between the Romans and the Lacedæmonians, with their tyrant Nabis. Over and besides, there is contained in this book the winning of many Cities in Macedony.

The

The two and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

When the Consul and Prætors were entered into office upon the 1st Ides of March, they call loss for the government of the Provinces. To L. Lentulus, fell Italy; and to P. Villius, Macedony. As for the Prætors, L. Quintus had the jurisdiction of the City of Rome, and C. Cebius the government of Ariminum; L. Valerius ruled Sicily, and L. Villius his lot was to command Sardinia. Lentulus the Consul had order given him to levy new legions, and Villius to receive the army of P. Sulpicius, with commission and licence to take up as many soldiers as he thought good himself to furnish the same with a fresh supply. Those legions which C. Arnelius Consul had in charge, were assigned over to Babius the Prætor, with condition to keep them with him, untill the Consul were arrived in France with a new army; and so soon as he came, to discharge and dismise all the soldiers home to their homes except 5000 allies: forasmuch as this number was thought sufficient to govern the Province about Ariminum.

The Prætors of the former year continued still Commanders of their armies. Cn. Scævus was enjoined to see and take order, that certain lands should be set out for those soldiers who had served many years together in Spain, Italy, and Sardinia. And Q. Minutius had in charge to go through with that inquisition of certain conspirators and traitors in the Britannian country, upon which he had siven already as Prætor with great fidelity and diligence: and also to send unto L. Lælius for to receive due punishment of those prisoners, whom being attained and convicted of sacrilege, he had sent bound to Rome. And finally, to cause all the treasure taken out of the Temple of Proserpina, to be restored thither again, with an over-embrace, to make satisfaction and to raze out the wicked part committed. The Latine feasts and holy-daies were solemnized again by virtue of an ordinance of the Bishops, upon this occasion. That certain Embassadors from Eda complained in the Senat, how they had not their ordinary allowance of flesh at the Latine feasts aforesaid in the mount Alba, according to the old custom. News came from Suffex, that two of their City gates and all the wall between was smitten with lightning. Messengers also from Formie reported that their Temple of Jupiter was likewise blasted. Moreover, they of Offia brought word of the like mischance with them in the Church of Jupiter. And from Vetula tidings came of the like mishap, fallen upon the Temples of Apollon and Sanguis. And that in the Temple of Heracles there sprung up a bush of hair. Letters came also from Q. Minutius the Pro-Prætor out of the Britannian country, that there was a colt sold with five feet, and three chickens hatched with three feet apiece. After all this, P. Sulpicius the Pro-Prætor sent letters from out of Macedony, containing among other matters this news, that there was a Laurel tree grew of it self in the poop of a galley.

The Senat in regard of all the former prodigions sights, ordained, that the Consul should sacrifice greater beasts unto what gods he thought good: but about this last rehearsed, the Sooth-sayers that pry into beasts inwards, were sent into the Senat-house; and by direction of their answer, an Edict went forth, That the people should go into procession, and make supplications one day, and in all Temples and Altars of the gods there were sacrifices celebrated with great devotion.

The Carthaginians this year came to Rome with the first payment of the tribute imposed upon them: and forasmuch as the treasurers and receivers of the City made report, that the silver was not good and lawfull, and being brought to triethal, was found too light by one fourth part, walled away those Carthaginians were constrained to take up money of the bankers of Rome, and to make good the defect and loss of the silver aforesaid. They put up a petition besides unto the Senat that it might stand with their good pleasure to deliver now their hostages. Whereupon an hundred of them were rendred back, and good hope there was of the rest, so be they continued loyal and fast in their allegiance. And when they made a farther request in behalf of those hostages which were not delivered that they might be transported from Norba (where they were not to their good liking and ease) to some other place, granted it was, that they might remove to Signis and Ferentinum. In like sort, the Gaditans made humble suit, and obtained this liberty, that there should not be sent from the Romans accapain to govern Gades, any thing to the contrary in their covenant (concluded with L. Marius Septimius, when they yielded themselves under the subjection of the Romans) notwithstanding. Moreover, forasmuch as the Embassadors of Narنيا made complaint, that they had not their full number of inhabitants, and that there were certain strangers entermingled among them, not of their own nation, who bare themselves as Citizens: therefore L. Cornelius the Consul was commanded to create three Deputies or Commissioners, called Trimvirs for to reform this disorder. And chosen there were for this purpose P. Publius and Seftius Ælius, who had both of them the surname of Pærus, and C. Cornelius Lentulus. This that was granted to them of Narنيا, was denied to the Embassadors of Cassia, who likewise requested that the number of their inhabitants might be encreased.

The affairs thus finished at Rome that there were to be done, the Consuls went into their several Provinces. P. Villius to soon as he was arrived in Macedony, was welcomed at his first coming with a dangerous mutiny of the soldiers, which long afore being kindled, was not well quenched at the first beginning. These were those two thousand, which after the defeat of Annibal, were sent out of Africa into Sicily; and from thence, a year after almost, transported into Macedony for voluntary souldiers: but they themselves stood stoutly to it, that it was no voluntary act of theirs, but that they were shipped by their Colonels and Tribunes full against their wills. And howsoever it was, whether they served willingly or unwillingly, it was but meet and good reason, that the time of their souldiery should run out, and their service have an end at length. Alledging, that for these many years they had not seen Italy; that they waxed old men under their hands, having born arms in Sicily, in Africa, and in Macedony; that with toil and travel so tedious, they were weak and feeble; and after to many wounds and hurts received, they had no more blood to lose. The Consul made them answer, that their cause was good and reasonable, but marred in the handling; and meet he thought it, that they should be dismissed, if they could have requested it in modest terms: but neither it, nor any cause else whatsoever was warrantable to make a mutiny and sedition. Therefore, if they could be content to keep to their colours, and be at command as loyal souldiers, he would in their behalf write his letters unto the Senat, as touching their conge and dismissal: for be they well assured, that they shall get more by sober and gentle behaviour, than by any such stubborn, forward and willful demeanor.

At the same time Philipp sailed the City of Thaumaci with terraces & mantelets in all forcible manner, so that he was now at the point to batter & shake the wall with the ram. But the sudden arrival of the Ætolians enforced him to intercalate his enterprise: who by the conduct of Archidamus, having passed through the midst of the Macedonian guards, & entered the town, never ceased day nor night to make ladders forth, one upon their standing watch, otherwises upon their K fabricks & engines. The natural situation of the place yielded them good help and vantage: for the town of Thaumaci is seated on high to amass thinking, as he goeth from Pyle & the gulph of Malaca by the way of Lamis, & sheweth it self almost seem to overlook & command the straight passage of the torrells called Cal. Again, when one reacheth over the craggy places, and the crooked water, entangled with to many windings in the sides of Thessaly, and is approached once near to the City, all on a sudden he may discover before him a mighty large and open plain, as it were a wide and vast sea: so that a man shall have much ado to reach with his eye to far as these downs lie over every way under him, and see all over them. And hereupon by reason of this stance and marvellous prospect, the City is called Thaumaci. Over and besides that the high ground affordeth it security, it standeth also upon a huge rock, divided into divers crags and broken cliffs. These difficulties forced Philipp to give over his attempt, and namely, when he considered and weighed withall, that the town it self when it was won, would not quit the painful labour, and pay for the danger about it. Besides the winter was now at hand, when he departed from thence, and retired his forces into Macedony there to harbor. Where, when all others during the time that they could catch any repose and rest, refreshed their spirits and bodies with some recreations and disports: Philipp only how much respite forever he had, either of intermission, or remission from continual labour of marching in journey, and fighting in battell; to him he retired, & he had in his mind whilst he couled and discoursed with himself, what the total and finall issue might be of this war: whilst he stood not only in fear of the enemies, which persecuted him by sea and land, but also in doubt, as well of the heats of his allies, as of the affections of his own subjects: lest the one in hope of the Romans friendship should revolt, and the other (even the Macedonians themselves) desire novelties and long for a change. Therefore he dismissed his Embassadors into Achaia, both to exhort on the one the Achaians for their allegiance (for they had capitulated in the accord and agreement made yearly to swear fealty unto Philipp), and also to deliver in to their hands, Orekomus Heracles and Triphila. And when they demanded also Aliphera, the Embassadors answered, that the City never pertained to Triphila, but that of right it ought to be restored unto Philipp: as being one of them which in the general council and assembly of the Arcadians were assigned and set out for the building of Alceopolis. And thus verily he entertained firm alliance with the Achaians. As for the Macedonians he gained their hearts unto him, by occasion of Heracles: for seeing that by means of him he incurred their exceeding ill will and hard conceit, and that he was charged with many grievous crimes, he cast him in prison to gratify his own subjects: whereas the people took great joy and hearts content. Then made he preparation for war, with an earnest endeavor, as at any time before: he exercised as well the Macedonians as mercenary souldiers in pay, namely, to wear their armor and handle their weapons; & in the very prime of spring, he sent all his foreign aids and light armed souldiers, under the leading of Athenagoras into Chonia by the way of Ephesus, to lie upon the straight passage near to Antigonis, which the Greeks call Stena. Himself a few daies after followed with his main army more heavily appointed. And when he had well viewed & considered the situation of the country, and how it lay, he judged that the quarter consisting upon the river Asus was the meetest place to fortifie and encamp in. This river between two hills the one by the peasants of the country called Eriopus, the other Asinus, runneth within a narrow vale, and yieldeth but a small passage upon the bank side. He commanded Athenagoras to go in and fortifie Asinus with his light armed souldiers: himself encamped upon Eriopus. And took what way as the hill was fenced with broken and cragged rocks, there he kept a small guard of some few souldiers: but whereas there was more danger, and easier access for the enemy he fortified with trench rampiers and bulwarks. He planted also and disposed in convenient places a great number of engines to send out quarrels and other shot, for to keep the enemies aloof,

A aloof. The royal pavilion of the King himself was pitched before the rampier upon a bank in a most conspicuous place of open sight, for to terrifie the enemy, and also to encourage and hearten his own men, when they should see him so confident and resolute. The Consul ad, entized by Chionops the Ægypt, what passages the King with his army was polluted of, after he had passed the winter in Corepra, himself likewise in the beginning of spring, went up into the main land, and held on his march toward the enemy. And being ad, aned almost within five miles of the Kings camp he left his legions in a strong fenced place, and went himself in person forward with certain lightly appointed in espial to discover the quarters, and the morrow after held a consultation, Whether he might do better to assay to pass through the place, which the enemy kept (notwithstanding he saw evidently before his eyes great trouble and hazard in that adventure) or to bring his army about and fetch a compass the same way, whereas the year before Salpurnius entered into Macedony. This deliberation he did him self over and over in even business and impudence, until news came unto him that T. Quintus was created Consul, and having the Province of Macedony allotted unto him made haste thither, and was already passed to Corepra.

Valerius Antius writeth how Vellus was entered the pass aforesaid & became he could not take the straight and direct way (b, reason that the King and his forces had betel all places) followed the valley along, through the middle whereof the river Asus runneth, and having made a bridge over it, in great haste passed over to the bank, whereas the King was encamped, and there fought a battell: wherein the King was discomfited and put to flight, and driven out of his camp: that 12000 enemies were slain in that conflict, 2200 taken prisoners, 132 ensignes won and carried away, besides 236 horse. Also that during the combat there was a Temple vowed unto Jupiter, in case the Consul should well in the battell. But all other writers both Greek and Latine, at leastwise whose Annals I have read, report that Vellus performed no memorable act, and that the Consul T. Quintus who next succeeded took in hand the whole and entire war himself.

Whiles things thus passed in Macedony, the other Consul L. Lentulus who staid behind at Rome, held a general assembly for the election of Censors: And among many famous and noble persons who sued for that dignity, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, and P. Atilius Pacrus were created Censors. These two agreeing together in great concord, both elected Senat without detaining any person; and also framed out the toll for portage of all things that went to and from Capua: from thence they set to farm let the toll for portage that way where the camp stood and where now D there is a town built: and enrolled three hundred Centurions (for that number was limited by the Senat) to be in habilit. They sold also the land of Corepra lying under the hill T. f. a.

About the same time L. M. Aemilius Ased departed out of Spain, and was proclaimed by M. Porcius Lucas a Tribune of the Commons, to enter it his return into the City with the solemn pomp of an Ovation, notwithstanding he had that honour granted by the Senat. So he came into Rome as a private person and brought into the Chamber of the City 100 pound weight of silver, and thirty pound weight well near of gold. The same year Cn. Rabirius Tasophilus, who had received the Province of France from C. Aurelius the Consul of the former year, engaged himself rashly within the marches of the French Indians, and was encompassed and enclosed round about, both he and in manner his whole army. He lost above 6000 men, see what an over-blow was received in a war, whereof there was no reckoning made, and from whence no danger was feared any more. This caused L. Lentulus the Consul to come out of the City of Rome, who being arrived into a Province full of trouble and tumult, after he had received the charge of a frightened and dismayed army, gave the Prætor a great check and rebuke, & took him up solemnly with reproachful terms, yet commanded him to get him gone out of the Province, and to repair to Rome. Neither performed the Consul himself any exploit worthy of remembrance, by reason that he was called home to Rome for to hold the solemn election of Magistrates: which also was staid by M. Fulvius and M. Curius Tribunes of the Commons: who likewise would not suffer T. Quintus Flamininus, having been but Quæstor, for to stand for a Consulship. "Now daies, lay they, the dignities of Ædiles and Prætors are sought for by, and not worth the seeking for: and these noblemen will needs mount into the Consuls place, not by steps and degrees of other offices, wherein they should make proof and give good testimony what their carriage is, but leaping over those in the midst, joyning the lowest and highest together. This debate which began in Mars field in the assembly of the people, came at length to be decided before the Senat. And the LL. ordained that fortissimus as he who himself sued for that dignity, was by law capable thereof: it was reason that the people should have plenty and absolute power to create him, or whomsoever else they pleased. So the Tribunes submitted themselves under the authority of the Senators. And for Consul, were elected Sextus Aelius Pater, and L. Quintus Flamininus. Then ensued the election of the Prætors. In which were created L. Cornelius Mentulus, M. Claudius Marcellus, M. Porcius Cato, and C. Helvius who had been Ædiles of the Commons: By whom the Plebeian plays were renewed; and a solemn feast made in the honour of Jupiter in regard of those places. The Curule Ædiles likewise P. Valerius Flaccus, who also was the Flamine Dialis or Priest of Jupiter, and C. Cornelius Cethegus, exhibited the Roman games with great magnificence. The great Pontifices or Bishops Servius Sulpicius, and L. Gall died that year: In whole places were entailed M. Aemilius Lepidus and Cn. Cornelius Scipio. Now when Sextus Aelius Pater and Titus Quintus Flamininus the Consul, were entered into their Magistracy, they assembled the Senat in the Capitol: where the LL. gave order, that concerning the two Provinces of Macedony and Italy, the Consuls should either either agree between themselves, or else cast lots whether of them should govern the one or the other: And that he, whose hap was to have the charge of Macedony, should enroll of Romans three thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen: Also of Latine allies five thousand foot, and five hundred horse, for to supply and furnish out the legions. And for the other Consul it was decreed, that he should have an army all entire and new. L. Lentulus the Consul of the former year, continued still Governour in the Province, with express commandments, that neither himself should leave the government, nor withdraw his forces from thence, before the Consul were come with the new legions. So the Consuls referred themselves to the direction of the lots. To Ælius fell Italy: and Macedony to Quintius. As for the Prætors, who all were guided by lots, L. Cornelius Merula had the jurisdiction of the City of Rome. M. Claudius governed Sicily. To M. Porcius was allotted Sardinia, and C. Helvius his lot was to be L. Deputy in Gaul. After this they began to take musters. For over and besides the Consular armies, the Prætors also were charged to levy soldiers. To Marcellus were assigned four thousand footmen of Latine allies, and three hundred horsemen to go into Sicily. And for Cato three thousand foot of the same kind of soldiers: with two hundred horse to serve in Sardinia: upon condition, that when both these Prætors were come into their Provinces, they should discharge all the old soldiers there, as well footmen as horsemen.

Then the Consuls granted the Embassadors of King Attalus leave to come into the Senate-house: where having audience given them, "after they had declared how their King and Master had assisted the State of Rome with his forces as well by sea as land, and shewed himself cheerful, ready, and obedient to this present day for to execute and perform whatsoever the Roman Consul had enjoined him to do; they showed, that they much feared lest from henceforward he would not be able to do the same, by reason he was impeached of garillions. For Antiochus taking his vantage, and finding the realm of Attalus disarmed of garillions, and unprovided of horse both by sea and land had invaded the same. For which occasion Attalus beought the Council of the Senate there assembled, that if they minded to use his navy, and employ the means that he could make, i. the service of the Macedonian war, they would then send him a sufficient garrison to defend his kingdom: but if they thought not well thereof, his request was to permit himself to return with his fleet and others for, to the defence of his own. The Senate gave order to return this answer unto the Embassadors: "Whereas King Attalus had succoured the Roman Captains with his Armado and other means of war, the Senate accepted thereof in the best part. But as touching Antiochus the King, ally and friend of the people of Rome, they neither would send any aid against him: nor yet detain the aids of King Attalus in any service of theirs, longer than the King himself should think it good with his own commodity. For the manner of the people of Rome hath alwayes been to serve their own turn with the help and assistance of others, but yet at the good pleasure & discretion of others. And whosoever were willing to relieve the Romans, they were at their own liberty to begin and end when they would themselves. Howbeit they purposed to address their Embassadors unto Antiochus to advertise him and let him understand, that the people of Rome employed the help of Attalus by his ships and soldiers against Philip, a common enemy: and the Senate would take it kindly at his hands, if (for their sakes he forbate the Realm of Attalus, and abtained from war, for meet and reason) it was that the Kings who were friends and allies to the people of Rome, should likewise entertain peace and amity among themselves.

T. Quintius the Consul made haste to be gone into his Province: and when he had levied and mustered his soldiers so, as that he had enrolled those old experienced levitors for the most part, who had given good proof of their valour in the service of Spain and Africa, he was detained so long, that some by occasion of certain prodigious signs reported, until he had taken order for the appeasing of the gods, and expiation of them. The lightning forked and blasted the great port way from Fest: the Common Hall likewise of publick assemblies, and the Temple of Jupiter in Lavinium: also the Temple of Heracles in Ardas: the walls belides and turrets of Capua, and the Temple there with is called Alta. At Artemium the sky appeared to be on a light fire. N. At Velia the earth leted and sunk down. Leaving a great gaping chink for the compals of three acres of ground. Word moreover was brought, that in Suessa Aurunca a lamb was yeared with two heads: and in Strutha a porker with a mans head. In regard of these prodigies, there was a procession and supplication one whole day, and the Consuls intended devoutly to their facifices: and after they had pacified the gods, they took their journey into their Provinces. Ælius together with C. Helvius the Prætor went into France and gave unto the said Prætor the army which he received of L. Lentulus, and should have dismissed and discharged of their service: because he purposed himself to employ in his own wars the fresh and new legions which he brought with him: but he performed no action worth the report. The other Consul T. Quintius having taken the sea, and departed from Brundisium sooner than other Consuls were wont, arrived at Corycæ with eight thousand foot, and eight hundred horse. From thence he crossed the seas with a galleace of five ranks of oars, directing his course for the nearest coasts of Epirus: and by great journeys made haste until he was come to the Roman camp: from whence after he had licensed Villius to depart, and baid there some few daies, until his forces which were at Corycæ could overtake him, he called his Council together to resolve, Whether he should keep on his journey directly, and make way through the midst of his enemies where they lay encamped, or rather without any such

A such attempt (which could not but carry with it great pain and peril) fetch a compas about with safety, and to enter into Macedony by the way of the Dall-reians country, and Loquis. And verily this latter course of the twain had taken place, but that he feared, when he were retired once far from the sea, and had let the enemy slip out of his hand: if the King haply were minded (as he had done before) to defend himself within the dets and fortels, that he should spend all the long summer and do no good. Therefore come what would of it he resolved to assail the enemy in that very place as difficult as it was, with all the disadvantage whatsoever. But as they determined in their intention thus to do, so they were not to ready in the means to execute and effect the same. Thus they late till and spent to try daies within the eye of the enemy, and made no attempt. Then Philip conceived some hope to ally a peace, by the means and intercession of the Epirot nation. And after consultation had there were certain agents chosen for that purpose to wit, Pausanias the Prætor, and Alexander general of the horse: who brought the Consul and the King together for to parlay into a place whereas the river Aous is narrow, and the banks nearest together. The demands of the Consul in him were these: That Philip should remove his garillions out of the Cities. Item, That whole territories or town he had pillied and spoiled, he should make restitution again unto them all those things that were extant and to be found: as for the rest, they should be prized and valued indifferently to their worth. Philip made answer again, "That all those peeces were not of like quality and condition. As for such as he had taken himself, he would be content to let them at liberty: but for those that were left unto him by his progenitors and predecessors, he would not forgo the possession thereof, since he held them lawfully in right of inheritance. Finally, if those Cities wherewith he had warred made complaint, that they were ever endamaged by him, he would report himself to what Cities and States they would themselves, and stand to their award: if they were neutrals, or in peace as well with the one side as the other. The Consul hereunto replied and said, That for this matter it was needfull to refer themselves to the arbitrement or doom of any. For who seeth not evidently (quoth he) that he hath done the wrong who first took arms? And that Philip before ever that he was molested and troubled by any war from others, offered violence first unto all? After when it was debated what Cities should be free, the Consul named first of all Thebes: whereas which word the King was in such a heat of choler that he cried out aloud, "What harder condition O Quintius would you impose upon him that you had vanquished? and withall, hebing away in a chase from off the place of meeting and interview and wound no longer parlay. And much did they both sides to hold their hands from throwing one at another, for the river ran in the midst between them that they could not try it out by the ears. The morrow after there passed many light skirmishes between the corps de guard on both parts by way of excursions, first in a plain that lay out broad enough for that purpose: but afterwards as the Kings men retired themselves into the narrow straight and rough rugged places the Romans of an ancient desire to be fighting, entered thereon after. The Romans had on their side the benefit of good order and military discipline and were furnished with such kind of weapons as were fit for to maintain a skirmish in a close battle. The enemies again for their parts had the vantage of the ground, and the help of sundry engines to cast forth shot afar off (as ballists and catapults) planted and ranged almost upon every cliff and rock as it had been upon the walls of a City. After they had on both sides given and taken many a wound, so as divers of them were left slain on the earth, as if they had fought in a full battell the night at length parted them asunder.

Things thus standing in these terms, there happened a certain herdman sent from Charopæa a Prince of the Epirots to be brought before the Consul: who gave him to understand that he kept cattell grazing in that forest (which then was overspread with the Kings pavilion) and knew all the cranks, all the windings, turnings, and blind waies of those mountains: promising, that if he would send out a band of soldiers with him, he would conduct them thorow a place that was neither dangerous nor yet difficult and hard of ascent: which if they had once gained, they should be over their enemies heads and able to command them, and their things (quoth he) you may surely trust upon: for Charopæa would me to make declaration. That he could with you the Consul were Master of all rather than any other, the Consul was desirous to be convinced, but durst not credit him. And thus being troubled in spirit, whilst he entertained in his heart both joy and fear together, at length the authority of Charopæa induced him to resolve and give the adventure of this hope thus offered and presented unto him. And to the end that the enemy might distrust and suspect nothing, for two daies following he never ceased to assail and provoke him, setting companies of armed soldiers in every place, to charge upon him, and ever sending them with fresh ment to succeed in the place of the wearied. After this he delivered to a Tribune or Colonel four thousand chosen footmen, and three hundred horsemen: with this direction, to lead forward the Cavalry, as far as the ground would give leave: and when they were come on to a place where the horsemen could not pass nor march farther, then to plant them in some pain and even ground: willing the footmen to march on in the guide should lead them and point out their way: but after they were mounted above the enemies heads according as he undertook and made promise, then to give a sign by smoke, and not to shout and to set up a cry until one might give that upon signal of battell by him given, the battell was begun. And the Consul gave commandment to march by night (for as good hap was, the Moon was at full, and shone all night long) and take their refreshment and sleep in the day time. As for the guide aforesaid, he made unto him many fair and large promises, if it might appear, that he meant truth, and dealt faithfully: howbeit in the mean time he delivered him bound to the custody of the said Colonel. When these companies were thus sent away, the Roman General travelled and endeavoured to much the more to gain vantage of the enemies guards. All this while, the Romans that were sent out with the Colonel, marched forward: and upon the third day, when they had given token by smoke, that they had won the pitch of the hill as they intended, and held it till: then the Consul divided his forces into three squadrons, and entered the midst of the valley with the main strength of his army, but he led forth the wings of his battell, both the right and the left, against the very camp of the enemies. Who also for their parts were not behind to re-encounter and receive him. And all the whiles that they advanced without their fortifications of defence upon a hot desire of conflict, it fell out, that the Roman souldier had the better a good deal, as being more valourous, more skilfull, and better appointed with weapons for that kind of service. But after that the Kings souldiers, where of many were wounded or killed outright, retired themselves to places of safety, either by natural situation or by art of man, the danger returned upon the Romans heads, who inconsiderately were engaged into places of disadvantage, and into narrow streights, from whence they could not retire with ease. And surely they had not returned back again unpunished for their rashness, but that the Kings men bearing first an outcry behind their backs, and seeing also a skirmish begun, were allonied at the sudden terror, and put besides themselves. Some fled here and there away: others that made a stand and tarried still, for that they rather wanted ground to flee than had heart enough to fight it out, were environed by their enemies both before and behind. The whole army might have been utterly defeated, if the winners had lustily followed the chase. K But the straight and roughness of the waies hindered the hotness and the weight of armor cumbered the footmen. At first the King rode a main with bridle in horie neck, without regard of any thing, or looking behind him: but after he was got five miles before & guessing (as it was indeed) that by reason of the disadvantage of the place the enemy could not possibly make way after: he retired upon a certain mount and lent his people all abroad over hills and dales, to rally his souldiers together that were disperied. Thus with the loss not all out of two thousand men, the rest of the multitude met together, as if they had repaired to a Rendezvous, upon some signal given, & so marched with a great train into Theffaly. The Romans pursued them as far as they might with safety, killing them, and rifling the dead, yea and ransacked the Kings camp, which though it were naked without defendants, yet for the difficult weels unto it, they had much trouble to win: & that night they lodged in their own camp. The next day the Consul made pursuit after the enemy along the straight, whereas the river runneth among the valleys. The King came the first day unto the hold or camp of Pyrrhus (a place so called) in Triphalia, belonging to the territory of Aetolia. From whence the morrow after he marched a mighty journey with his whole army (for needs he must go that fear drives) & approached the mountain Lingo. These mountains are in Epirus, situate between Macedonia and Theffaly. The side that lieth to Theffaly regardeth the East: that which butteth upon Macedonia hath the North directly before it. Covered they are and overpiled with abundance of woods: yet so as the very tops do afford open plains and running waters. The King keeping his camp there for certain daies, was much troubled and perplexed in his mind, casting and revolving, whether it were expedient for him to return immediately into his own kingdom, or possible M to retire himself into Theffaly. In sum, his resolution was to bring down his army into Theffaly. And so to Tricca he marched the next way he possibly could. From thence he passed in great haste through all the Cities that were in his way. As many men as were able to follow, he forced to quit their habitations and dwelling houses. The towns he set on fire: yet he permitted every one to carry away with him as much as he could of his own goods: all the rest fell to the souldiers share. No manner of cruelty there was, that the very enemy could exercise, but he practised among his own allies. And Philip himself in the execution thereof, grieved not a little, and was vexed at his heart: but he could do no other: yet his desire was, in that country which within a while should be possessed by the enemy to save the bodies at leastwise of his associates. In this manner were ransacked & spoiled these towns following, Phoenice, Iressa, Eubadium, Eretia, & Palapatus. Against N his coming to Pheate the gates were shut upon him. And because it would ask some time to win that town by assault, and no leisure he had thereto, he gave over that enterprise, & passed into Macedonia: for the brut were that the Aetolians also approached, Who having heard of the issue of the battell fought by the river Aous, first wasted and ransacked all the country near unto Sperchia and Marra Come (as they call it) and having from thence passed over into Theffaly, won Cymines and Angas with the first assault. Howbeit, a repulse they took at Metropolis, whiles they harried the fields about it by reason that the townsmen ran together to the defence of their walls. After this they gave the attempt upon Callithera, where they found the like resistance and violence of the enemies: but there they persisted longer, and gave not over, nay, they drove the enemies that issued forth within their walls, and contenting themselves with that victory, they departed thence seeing no great hope to force the town. Then they won and pilld two villages Theumia and Calubani. Asiet Acharra, it was surrendered by composition. And upon the like fear Xynia also was abandoned of her own inhabitants. These Citizens thus driven out of their own houses, stumbled at a venture upon a garison which was a leading into Athamania, for the better guard of the forragers that were to purvey corn. This multitude, I say, marching disorderly without armour, pell-mell together, with a sort that were unmeet for war, was bewain peeces by

A by the armed souldiers, and Xynia was sacked, thus left and forsaken as it was. After this the Aetolians won Cyphara, a fort and town of strength, well seated for to encompass and command D. L. g. oblecta, pia. These exploits performed the Aetolians halitly all in few daies.

Neither telled Amintander nor the Athamians quiet and still, after they heard the news of the prosperous battell which the Romans had fought. But Amintander, reporting into the same his own souldiers, craved of the Consul a small supply of other officers: and as he had led tow, d. m. p. is he surprised forthwith and torced a town named Theffaly, situate between Gonph and the mountains that divide Theffaly from Athamania. From thence he advanced before Gonph, and attacked a town which was defended right valiantly for certain daies: but after that he had collected strong ladders against it, he forced the townsmen within, for very terror to yield and render all to his B hands. The surrender of this City terrified the Theffalians exceedingly in such sort, that the Citizens of Argenta, Pherrina, Thumia, Lissus, Stimos, and Lymphum, one after another submitted themselves, with other peeces thereby of small importance.

Whiles the Athamians and Aetolians (secured from all danger of the Macedonians) made spoil and raised again to themselves by the victory of others: whiles Theffaly was pilld and attacked by three armies at once, and knew not their friends from their foes, nor whom to trust: the Consul passed over into the country of Epirus by the way of the streights which he had opened and made clear by sea on that the enemies were fled. And albeit he knew full well which way all the Epirots in general went, and with whom they had sided, excepting only Prince Charopus, yet because he law them not only careless to make amends and restitution, but also willing and

C forward to do whatsover he commanded he esteemed and regarded them by their present hate, more than by their demerit pally, and so by shewing himself inclined to mercy and clemency to pardon a fault, he won their hearts and gained them unto him for the time to come. After this he dispatched messengers to Corcyra, to wit that the kiuks and ships of Corcyra should put into the gulph of Ambraia, whiles himself travelled by easey journeyes: and the fourth day arrived he with his tents upon the hill Ceretius: and thither he sent for Agintander to repair with his aids, not for any need he had of his forces, so as much as of his guidance to direct him in his journey: for Theffaly. Most of the Epirots also, for the same intent were recruited, who vaine the offered their help and assistance. The first City that he assaulted in Theffaly was Phaleria, wherein he relayed a garison of two thousand Macedonians. Who at first fled out and relied himself in the bay, and as much as either armor or the walls were able to do, defended the mulch. But the force & battery continuing unflantly both night and day, overcame at length the courage and redre the valour of the Macedonians. For the Consul made this evening that upon this point he desired the hearts and dispositions of all the other Theffalians, in that it should not be able to bring the violence and force of the Romans. Phaleria was no longer won, but there am ambassadors from Metropolis and Pira to render up their Cities into his hand, who saved and maintained it. Phaleria was burnt and sacked. From thence he led forward to Ambraia, and being come to a place defensible with any small garison and in manner impregnable, he bestowed some multitude of darts upon the next camp de guard, and turned his army to ward the country again. G. p. y. and from thence he marched down into the Plains of Theffaly. And he saw his army, which consisted of nine centuries (for that he had lostron to make spoil in the territories of the Epirots): E after he had sent out espials afore, to discover whether the harks above could be a rivard at Lencina or Ambraia, he sent out his companies one after another to Ambraia, to purvey corn and victuals. The way between Gonph and Ambraia, as it is cumbersome and hard for passage, to again, it is but short and very perpendicular. So that within few daies he had transported certain companies of victuals from the port of Ambraia, whereby the camp was stored with plenty of all provision. From thence he passed to Rhagea, a town almost ten miles distant from Larissa. The Citizens thereof are defended from Perriphasia, and the City is self seated upon the river Peucea. The Theffalians were nothing afraid at the first coming of the Romans. As for Philip, like as he durst not himself in person march forward into Theffaly, so having taken a place within Tempis, which he held with a standing camp, he espied into what quarters the enemies intended to go, and ever as he could find opportunity and advantage, sent underhand succour and relief thither accordingly.

Much about the same time that the Consul first encamped against Philip in the streights of Epirus, L. Quintus also, the Consul his brother, who by commission from the Senat had the charge of the fleet and the government of all sea-coasts, sailed beyond Corcyra with two Gallies of five banks of oars: and hearing that the navy was departed from thence seeing also there was no staying there, he made sail after pace, and having overtaken them at the Isle Zanama he dismissed Apsinus, in whose place he succeeded: from thence he went fair & softly haling after him the most part of the ships which followed with the provision of victuals, until he came to Melia. From C whence, when he had given order, that the rest should make as good speed as possibly they could after him, he went with three Quinquemes lightly appointed, and arrived before at Pyracum, where he received the other ships that L. Apsinus the Lieutenant had left there for the guard and defence of Arleus.

At the same time there were two Armadoes set out of Asia, the one conducted by King Antiochus, consisting of four and twenty sail of Quinquemes: the other were of Rhodians, and stood of twenty covert ships with decks and battes commanded by Agsimbratus the Admirall. These

These fleets joining together about the Island Andros, crossed the narrow seas from thence to Euboea. And first they tormented the territory of the Carytians: afterwards (seeing Carystus strong enough against them by reason of a garrison sent to them in all haste from Chalcis, they approached to Eretria. L. Quintus having intelligence that King Attalus was come, repaired thither also with those vessels which had been at Pyraeum, & gave commandment, that as many ships as arrived thither belonging to his fleet, should bend their course for Euboea. Now was Eretria by all forcible means assailed, for not only the vessels of three joyned navies had brought thither all sorts of engines and artillery devised for to shake and batter the walls of Cities, but also the fields and country hard by, yielded them plenty of timber, and other matter to make new. The townsmen from the very first day shewed no valour and courage in defending their walls: and afterwards when they were wearied, and some of them hurt, and saw withall a part of their wall overthrown by the ordnance and engines of the enemy, inclined to yield: but they had amongst them a garrison of Macedonians, whom they feared no less than the Romans. Moreover, Pholotes a Captain under the King sent messengers unto them from Chalcis, assuring them, that if they could hold out still and endure the siege, he would in good time be with them, and bring relief. Thus hope and fear together constrained them to drive off longer than either they were willing or well able to do. But when they heard once that Pholotes had a repulse by the way, and in great haste and fear was retired and fled to Chalcis again, then immediately they sent their Embassadors unto Attalus, to crave pardon and protection. Whiles they were wholly bent to seek peace (whereof they had some hope) and forelacked the affairs of war-service, opposing their corps de guard on that side only of the wall where the breaches were, and neglecting all besides, behold, Quintus in the night-season gave a camellido in that quarter which was least expected, and with scaling ladders won the town. The whole multitude of the inhabitants fled with their wives and children into the Cattle, which also afterwards was rendered up. As for money, gold, and silver, there was no great store to speak of: but Images, and painted tables of antique work, artificially wrought, and such like ornaments, there were more found, than for the proportion of the bigness, or other wealth besides, of such a City as that was. From thence they set sail once again for Carystus, where the whole multitude, before the enemies were put on land, having abandoned the City, were fled into their fortresses: from whence they sent their Orators unto the Roman General, humbly craving their merciful protection. The townsmen presently had their lives and liberties granted them. But the Macedonians were put to their ransom and they compounded to pay three hundred silver for service apeece, and to give up their armour and weapons, and so to depart: With this sum of money having redeemed themselves they were sent out disarmed unto Baetia. These forces at sea having in few days gained two noble and renowned Cities in Euboea, coasted about Samium, a promontory or cape within the territory of Attica, and arrived before Cenchreae, a town of merchandise and traffick belonging to the Corinthians.

The Consul all this while had a longer and more dangerous piece of service in the siege (of Rhodes) than all men looked for. And the enemies within made resistance, where he would have least of all suspected. For he supposed verily that all the trouble and difficulty would be in battering down the wall, & making some breach. For thus he thought that if he had once opened way for his armed soldiers to enter into the town, the enemies afterwards would either flee or be slain as if fallen out commonly in Cities when they are forced. Howbeit, when part of the wall by the battery of the Ram lay flat along, and the enemies were got over at the breaches & ruins thereof: then began their labour and pains anew, as if they had had no trouble nor toil afore. For the Macedonians in garrison, who were many in number, and those approved and select soldiers, thinking how honourable a service it would be to defend the City by valour and dint of sword, rather than by the strength of walls, had ranged themselves in a battell within, strongly marshalled into many ranks and files close together: and when they perceived the Romans were mounting over the breaches to enter the City they repelled and beat them back in that place of great disadvantage, where they had much ado to recover and retire themselves. The Consul hereat was much displeased, and vexed in himself: and making this account, that such a foul foil and disgrace was not only an occasion of a longer tract of time, before he could force that one City: but also material and important for the main purposes and proceeding of the whole war, which commonly dependeth upon the occurrences of slight matters and of small moment in the beginning: after he had rid and cleansed the place which was choked up with the ruins of the half-broken wall lying there upon heaps, he reared a tower or frame of timber of a huge height to overtop the walls, consisting of many stories and floors one over another, which contained and carried a mighty number of armed men, and drove the same upon wheels and rollers close to the wall. Moreover he sent out certain engines one after another by turns, to break through by force (if it were possible) that strong and close battailon of the Macedonians (which they themselves call Phalanx). But the place being so freight (for that the breach of the wall was nothing broad) the enemies had the vantage both in regard of the weapons which they used, and of the form of battell wherein they were ranged. For when the Macedonians standing close one to another with a continued roof or fence of targets over their heads, opposed their pikes before them which were of an exceeding length: the Romans neither with their darts could hurt them afar off, nor with their swords drawn come near them to fight close at hand, or cut their pikes in two: and if it chanced that they whipt off or snapt any alunder, yet the steel and truncheon thereon

A thereof being sharp still at the point (headless though it were) among the other pikes that were headed, served to make a fence as it were an hay or palisade. Over and besides that part of the wall that stood whole and sound still, was a sure defence unto both flanks of the enemies: neither had the Romans any room at length to return, and from thence to fetch their beat, and so give a violent charge, which is the thing that usually breaketh and disordereth ranks. Moreover, there chanced one thing by meer fortune that encouraged them within: for as the tower afore said was in driving over a terrass or bank whereof the floor was not flat and soundly hardened with the rammer, one of the wheels hapned to sink in and make a deep rout in the ground, whereby the whole frame nodded so forward that the enemies without thought verily it was ready to fall, and the armed soldiers standing upon it within, quaked for fear, and were put well-near besides their wits.

B Thus when nothing that was provided might avail and come to any great effect, the Consul was vexed at the heart, to see himself so over-matched in soldiers, in armour, and in manner of service: and withall he considered, that he had no help to force the City and to win it in any short time, nor could make means to pass the winter in those parts so far from sea, and left naked already and waste by those calamities that follow wars. Whereupon he raised the siege: and because there was no haven in all the tract and coast of Acarnania and Etolia, which was able both to receive and harbour all his hulks that brought victuals for his army, and also to yield winter lodging for his legions; he thought upon the Isle Anticyra within the country of Phocis, which lying toward the gulph of Corinth, seemed to him most fit and commodious for his purpose: because they should not remove far from Thebes, and the territories belonging to the enemies having besides Liponnesus affront even over against them, divided but by a small arm of the sea: at their back Etolia and Acarnania: and of each side Locris and Baetia. At the first assault, the Consul without any resistance won Panopea in Phocis. Anticyra likewise long endured not the siege. Then Ambrisi and Hyampolis were received by composition. Daulis by reason that it was situate upon an high hill could neither be scaled nor torced by instruments and engines of battery. But the Romans by lancing their darts and shooting arrows against them that were in guard, trained them forth to skirmish: and after some little scufflings to no effect, whiles one while they seemed to flee, and other whiles to pursue, they brought them to be so careless, so negligent and so little respective, that when the enemies fled back within the gate, they entered pell-mell with them, and so were Masters of the town. Other small forts likewise of Phocis yielded rather for fear than any force offered unto them. Elaris they kept their gates shut, and made a countenance, that unless they were driven thereunto, they would receive within their walls neither Roman captain nor army.

I Whiles the Consul lay at the siege before Elaris, there was presented unto him the hope of a greater matter, namely of withdrawing the nation of the Acha from the Kings alliance to the amity of the Romans. For they had expelled and banished Cycladus the chief of that faction that sided with Philip: and Arifthenus who sided the Romans and fought to be considered with them, was Prator for the time.

Now the Roman Armado, together with Attalus and the Rhodians, rode at anchor to the haven of Cenchreae, and they all were agreed in common to assail Corinth. But the Consul thought good, before that they should put that designment in action, to send Embassadors to the State of Achaia, promising, if they would revolt from the King and turn to them, to deliver Corinth into their hands for to incorporate into the ancient league and council of their nation. And so by the advice of the Consul, there were Embassadors addressed to the Achaeans from his brother L. Quintus, from Attalus, the Rhodians and the Aethonians. And at Sicyone was there a Council and Diet held for to give them audience. Now the Achaeans were not all of one mind and alike affected. The Athenians (a dangerous an ordinary, and continual enemy of theirs) put them in a fear of one side: the Romans they had in dread and honour of another. To the Macedonians they were obliged and bound by many good turns and favours, as well old as new. The K. himself they held in jealousy for his cruelty and treachery: and casting a proof and conjecture by those courses which he then took, and by his practices for the time they foresaw well that after the war ended he would be intolerable and a very tyrant over them. They were besides not only ignorant, what every man had said in the several councils of every particular State, and in the general Diets of the whole nation, when they were required to deliver their opinions: but also uncertain and unresolute among themselves in their own minds what to will or wish. Unto men thus doubtfully disposed and unsettled, the Embassadors above said were admitted, and license was given them to deliver their message. First the Roman Embassador L. Calpurnius: after him, those that were for King Attalus: and in the third place, the Rhodians spake and made discourse: and consequently, the Embassadors of Philip were permitted to parl. The Athenians had audience given them last of all, and were relieved of purpose to confute whatsoever should be spoken against the Macedonians. And these Athenians inveighed most sharply and bitterly against the King, for none had received either more wrongs, or suffered the like indignities at his hands as they had. So this assembly verily for that time (by reason that the day was spent in hearing the continued orations of so many Embassadors) brake up about sun setting. The morrow after they assembled again: where the Magistrates by the voice of the Beadle or public crier (after the custome of the Greeks) gave liberty to every person to deliver his mind, and no man stepped forth. Great silence there was, and not a word among them for a long time, looking wistly wisely one upon another who should begin first. And no marvel if they whose spirits were astonished in some sort within them, when they of their own accord cast and tossed in their minds things so different and contrary were now more troubled and perplexed by those orations besides that had lasted all the long day, broaching, uttering, & advising many matters so harsh, so difficult, and unpleasant unto them. At length, because the Council should not be dissolved without some speech, he and parli. Aristobolus the Prator of the Achaens began to speak, and said: "What is become of my Masters of Achaia of those hearts of yours and courageous stomachs, whereby at your seats and in your private meetings (when talk is ministered of Philip and the Romans) you can hardly hold your hands, but are ready to fly one in another's face? And now, when as your honourable Court of Parliament is published & holden for the same purpose only: when ye have heard the reasons & allegations of the Embassadors of all parts: when the Magistrates propound the matter to be debated in council: when the public crier calleth you to give your opinions, ye are mum and mute? If the regard of the common good and welfare of us all, will not cause you to open your lips: cannot the private respects and affections neither (which have enclined and carried your minds to the one side or the other) fetch out a word from any of your mouths? Considering especially, that no man is so gross and blockish, who can be ignorant that now is the very time or never for each one to say and deliver his mind as he will himself, and as he thinketh best, before we resolve and determine of any course: and when a decree or act is once passed, that all men are bound (even they themselves that before disliked it) to defend and maintain the same, as a good and profitable accord. This admonition of the Prator was so far forth of drawing any one of them to utter his opinion, that it caused not so much as the least noise or humming in so frequent an auditory and congregation of so many States together. Then Aristobolus the Prator began again and followed his speech in this manner. "It seemeth (my Masters and friends of Achaia here assembled) that ye are not so much to seek for counsel and advice, but ye are as short of your tongues and loath to speak. And every one here is unwilling to provide for their general good for fear lest he should incur some particular peril. My self likewise peradventure would be silent and hold my peace if I were a private person: But now being Prator, I see thus much, That either there should have no audience at all been given unto the Embassadors, or else, that they ought not to be sent away from hence without an answer: and answer them how can I without your ordinance? now seeing that there is none of you all, who have been summoned hither to this Council, that either will or dare say a word to the cause: Let us examine thoroughly and consider well in lieu of your opinions, those speeches which yesterday were pronounced by the Embassadors: let us (I say) revise them so, as if they had not demanded those things which concerned their own good and commodity, but as though they proposed such points they esteemed profitable and expedient for us all. The Romans, the Rhodians, and King Attalus require our alliance and amity: and in that war which they wage against Philip they think it reason to be aided from us. Philip again putteth us in mind of our society with him and of our oath. One while he requireth us to stand and band with him: otherwhiles, he saith he will be content that we should sit still, and meddle neither one way nor other. Is there no man here knoweth the reason, why they that are not yet our allies demand and crave more than he that is our ally already? Is it neither the modesty of Philip, nor the impudency of M the Romans that is the cause hereof. The ports and haven-towns they be of Achaia, which minister confidence and assurance to those demanders, and take away the same from them again. From Philip we see nothing but only an Embassador. The sea-forces of the Romans and their fleet, ride in the harbor of Cenchreae: they carry afore them in the spoils of the Cities in Euboea. The Consul himself with his land-army of the legions we see despoiled from us by a small arm only of the sea ranging at their pleasure all over Phocia and Laecris. Marvel now longer if you can, why Cleomedon the Embassador of Philip demanded crewlike so coldly and diffidently, that we should take arms for the King against the Romans: who, if we by virtue of the same league and oath, wherewith he seemed to charge us in conscience, required of him again, that Philip should defend us both from Nabis and the Lacedaemonians, and also from the Romans; would he to seek not only of a garrison and power of armed men to shield us, but likewise of a very answer to shape us. And verily he would be no more ready to satisfy us, than Philip was himself the last year: who notwithstanding he frankly promised to levy war against Nabis & thereby assailed to train and draw the flower of our youth from hence into Euboea, after that he saw once that we neither agreed to send him that power, nor yet were willing to entangle our selves & be interested in the Roman war, forgot soon that society that now he standeth and vanterh so much of, and left us to the mercy and devotion of Nabis and the Lacedaemonians, to be spoiled pillaged, & wasted at their pleasures. And surely so much as I can conceive of Cleomedon his Oration he thinks it hangeth not well together and one peace thereof forth not well with another. He seemeth to speak of the Roman war contemptuously, as if it were a matter of nothing: saying the event & issue thereof would be like the former, which they maintained with Philip. How is it then, that he keepeth himself away, and in his absence demandeth our help, rather than with his personal presence protecteth us both from Nabis & the Romans? Us, I say, his ancient allies? But what speak I of us? Why hath he suffered them to go to force and win Evetria and Carsum? Why endured he, that so many Cities of Thessaly should be lost? How could he abide Laecris and Phocia to be over-run so as they are? And Elatia now at this day

A "day so freightly besieged, and hotly assaulted? Why quit he the treights of Epirus, and abandoned those impregnable holds upon the River Joas, by force, or fear, of his own accord, or howsoever? and when he had forgone and delivered himself of that pais which he held, why retired he into the inland parts of his realm for his safety? Is willingly and of his own accord he abandoned to many of his allies, and left them to be spoiled and snatched by the enemy, what can he alledge or say for himself, why those allies abroad may not provide for themselves the best they can? If for fear, let him pardon us likewise if we be afraid. But if he were vanquished by force of arms, and therefore retired back, first, we, good Cleomedon, sustain and endure the Roman puissance and their mighty armies, against which ye Macedonians were not able to stand? Or, would you have us to believe you, that bear us in hand, how the Roman war was at this present, either with greater numbers or stronger forces than they have done heretofore, rather than trust our own eyes, and that which daily we see before our faces? In those daies they succoured the Aetolians with their navy, and warred neither under the conduct nor with the army of a Consul. The maritime Cities of the confederates of Philip, were then in trouble, and tumult: but all the mediterranean parts within the continents, were to be sure and fortified from the Roman forces, that Philip spoiled and foraged the Aetolians, impairing and feebling for help of the Romans, but all in vain. But now at this day the Romans having finished the Carthaginian war, which for sixteen years space they supported in the very heart and bowels of Italy, have not sent a garrison to succour and maintain the Aetolians in their wars, but are come themselves, as leaders and commanders General, and by Land and Sea at once have warred upon Macedony. And this is the third Consul of theirs, who at this present maintaineth mortal war upon it, to the uttermost of his power. Sulpicius hath encountered the King in the midst of Macedony, bidden him battel, discomfited and put him to flight, after he had laid waste and desolated the wealthiest quarter of all his Kingdom. Quintus lately hath driven him out of camp and field, notwithstanding he were possessed of the straight avenues of Epirus, and bare himself boldly and confidently upon the natural situation of the ground, of his strong defences, and force of a complete army: and having pursued him as he fled into Thessaly, hath taken the Cities of the King, and in manner within his own fight, won by mere force his confederate garrisons. Suppose and say, that all those things which the Athenians ere while have alledged concerning the cruelty, the avarice, and unbridled lust of the King, be not true, but supposed standers: admit that those enormities and wicked parts committed within the Attick land, against the Gods of Heaven above, of the infernal spirits beneath, touch not us at all, and are much less pertinent, than those outrages which the Eleutians and the Abydens so far remote from us, have endured. Forget we our selves, if ye will, the hurts, the wounds, and losses that we have received, the murders the pilling and rifling of the goods of Messenia in the midst of Peloponnesus. Likewise, how his friend and host Garricus at Cyperissia, was killed against all Law of God and man, even in a manner sitting at the board with meat in his mouth. Say we nothing also of Attalus the father and son, both Sicyonians, who were cruelly massacred and yet he was wont to call the filly and wretched old man, Father. Alas forbeare you to speak of the sons' wives, who were carried away into Macedony to make her his harlot and concubine and to abuse her at his pleasure. Let other rapes of virgins, forcings of honorable dames be forgotten: let us imagine that we have nothing to do, nor to meddle with Philip for fear of whose cruelty ye were all so mute, and could not open your mouth, for what other cause of silence had ye, being called hither to this council? Let us put the case, that we were to debate the matter with Antigonus, that most mild and just Prince, at whose gracious hands we have received to many favours and pleasures above all other Kings: would he demand of us, that we should do that which he possibly then could not be done? Peloponnesus is a demy Island, joined to the firm continent and main land, by the narrow freight or link of Isthmus, lying open and exposed to nothing more than to Sea-forces. If one hundred covert and decked ships with hatches, and fifty lighter vessels which are open together, with thirty Brigantins or boats of Iffa, should come to pill and spoil our sea coasts, and begin to assail our Towns and Cities that lie open upon the River, even on the very strand and Sea banks; should we retire our selves, think ye, into our Cities within the Land? Why? what else? As though we were not already afflicted and plagued with intestine war, which lieth even within our ribs and bowels? When Nabis and the Lacedaemonians by land, the Roman navy by Sea shall lie upon us, to do us all annoy, how should I call upon the Kings society, or for the help of the Macedonians? Or shall we of our selves, by our own strength and means save our Cities which shall be assaulted against the puissance and power of the Romans? For in the former war we bravely defended (did we not?) the City of Dyme. We have examples enough of the fearful calamities and losses of others, that we need not to make our selves examples unto others. Take heed (I beseech you) how you settle and disdain, that the Romans have of their own motive offered their friendship and alliance, which indeed ye were to win for, and seek all that every ye could. It is for very fear (no doubt) that they are driven, being in a strange land to flie unto you for your alliance, because they would gladly shroud themselves under the shadow of your wings, be harboured within your havens, and sustained by your victual and provision. No, no, Lords, they are first of the seas who can deny it? there is not a land they set foot into, but immediately it is their own, and in subjection unto them, whatsoever they seem to request, they can command if they list. And because they are willing to spare and forbear you, and fought to the last man, in case their Captain would have stuck to it, and not relented. But Enepidamus for fear left together with the City, the flour of all the youth of Achaia should perish, capitulated with Philotes, that they might be permitted to depart and go their way: but himself kept his ground still in his armour, with some few of his followers and vassals, and removed not a foot. Then Philotes sent out unto him, to demand, What he meant thereby? Unto whom he gave no other words, but holding forth his shield before him made answer, That armed as he was he would live and die in the guard and defence of that City which was committed to his charge. Then by the commandment of the Captains, the Thracians lanced their darts and shot at him, and so both he and the company about him were slain every one. Thus after the accord of alliance between the Achaeans and Romans, two most noble and famous Cities (Argi and Corinth) came under the subjection of the King. These were the acts achieved by the Romans as well by Land as Sea this summer.

In France there was no exploit performed worth remembrance by Sext. Aelius the Consul, notwithstanding he had under his government two entire armies: the one that he retained still with him, which by order he should have discharged, and was the same that had before been commanded by L. Cornelius the Pro-consul, and now by him was committed to the charge of C. Aelius: the other, that he brought himself with him into the Province. So that he employed the whole year almost in compelling the men of Cremona and Placentia to return into their Colonies, from whence by sundry casualties of war they were chased and dispersed. As France that year was in quiet beyond all hope and expectation, so about the City of Rome there had like to have been a commotion and tumult of bondslaves. The Carthaginian hostages were in guard and kept at Setia, where they had attending about them (as meet was for the children of the chief Nobles and Princes of Carthage) a mighty train and retinue of servants. The number of them was the greater by occasion of the late African war; during which time and presently after, the Setians also themselves had bought up many of that nation which were taken captives, and came in port to le with the rest of the prizes. These having conspired together, sent out certain of their own company to solicit also the other slaves that were in the territory of Setia, and so forth, as many as they could find about Norba and Circii. Their plot was, that when all things were provided aforehand, they should upon the very day of the solemn games and plaies (which shortly were to be exhibited and set forth in Setia) take the opportunity of the time, when as the people were busy in beholding the spectacle and shew represented unto their eye, and to run upon them: and when they had by massacre in this kind hurlyburly possessed themselves of Setia, then to go forward and surprise Norba and Circii. This horrible complot and conspiracy was detected, and information given at Rome to L. Cornelius Atrina Pretor at that time of the City. For two bondslaves early in a morning before day, presented themselves unto him, and opened from point to point in order, namely, what had been contrived and done, and what remained yet to do. The Pretor having taken order for their safe custody at home within his own house, called the Senate together; where, after he had recounted and declared unto them what these informers had revealed, he was commanded to go abroad to search out and repress this conspiracy. Forth he marched with five Lieutenants of the camp, and look how many he could meet with in his way all over the fields, villages, and hamlets, he tendered unto them a military oath, and constrained them to arm and follow him. Thus in this hasty manner of levy, he armed well near 2000, and with them all together (who knew not whether he meant to go, nor to what piece of service he led them) to Setia he came. At his first entrance, he suddenly in great haste apprehended the principal heads of the conspiracy; whereupon the slaves fled out of the Town. Then were sent out certain into the fields, to trace and to find them out by their tracks. In this business there were two bondslaves and one free man that performed singular good service. Unto him the LL. of the Senat gave order, that there should be paid 1000000 Afles in brass coin: but unto the slaves 25000 and their freedom. For the redemption of whom, their masters were contented their full price out of the Chamber of the City. Not long after, it was reported that the remnant of this conspiracy purposed to surprise Prentia. Thither marched L. Cornelius the Pretor of the City, where he executed about 500 persons who were found guilty. The City was in great fear to see how the hounded and captives of the Carthaginians practised such troubles. Therefore in Rome a standing watch was kept in every street: and the inferior Magistrats were charged to see to it and to walk the round, and the Triumvirs likewise (or three Sheriffs) to have a better eye and look to the Quarry-prison. The Pretor also directed his letters into all quarters of the Latin nation to this effect, That all the hostages should be kept within doors, and not suffered to go abroad into the streets: that all captives and prisoners should have gyves about their heels of ten pound weight at least, and be kept in no other ward but in the common goal.

The same year came Embassadors from King Antioch, who presented in the Capitol a golden Crown of 246 pound weight, with great thanksgiving unto the Senate, that King Antioch in regard of the authority and countenance of the Roman Embassadors, had withdrawn his forces out of the confines of Attalus. The same summer two hundred men of arms, ten Elephants, and 200000 Modii of wheat sent from King Masius, arrived at the camp in Greece. Likewise out of Sicily and Sardinia there was sent great store of victual and liveries for the army. In Sicily M. Marcellus was L. Governour, and in Sardinia M. Porcius Cato, an upright man and living without touch and reproach, save only he was thought somewhat too severe in restraining of usury. He banished out of that Island all usurers: he abridged also and cut off clean, the charges which the allies were wont to defray for the entertainment of the Pretor.

Sext. Aelius the Consul being returned to Rome out of France in regard of the general assembly for election of Magistrats, created Consuls Cn. Cornelius Cethegus and Q. Minucius Rufus, and two daies after, the election was held for Pretors. This year first were chosen six Pretors, by reason that the number of Provinces encreased, and the Roman Empire and Seignory extended farther. And these were they, to wit, L. Manlius Volsus, Cn. Sempronius Tuditanus, M. Sergius Silus, M. Helvius, M. Minucius Rufus and L. Aelius. Of these, Sempronius and Q. Minucius being Consuls, the Roman games this year were four times renewed. Cn. Cornelius and Q. Minucius being Consuls, above all things were in hand with the Provinces of Consuls and Pretors: and first they dispatched those that concerned the Pretors (a matter that might be decided by casting lots.) Sergius tell the jurisdiction of the City, and to Minucius the foreign, over strangers. Aelius was appointed to Sardinia, Manlius to Sicily, Sempronius to that part of Spain between Italy and Iberia, and Cethegus unto the other beyond the River.

When the Consuls were upon the point to call lots likewise for their provinces, namely, Italy and Macedonia, C. Oppius, and P. Fufius Tribunes of the Commons, interposed themselves and staid the proceedings, That Ma. was a province lying far off, and there was no one thing that had more impeached and hindered the proceeding of wars to that day than this, that in to remove parts, the Consul ever of the former year was called home before he were led in his affair. And when he should be employed most in wars. Now have there four years already gone over our heads, since we decreed and concluded to follow the Macedonian war; during which time Scipio spent the greater part of his year in seeking after the King and his army; Fidius, when he should encounter the enemy, was called away before he had effected any exploit: as for Quintus, he was kept at Rome till for the most part of the year, in attendance about Church-matters and sacrifices: howbeit the affairs of wars under his conduct were managed so well, that it either he had gone sooner into his province, or the winter had been later, he might have dispatched the wars there: and now, that he is ready to retire into his landing camp and wintering harbors, the reports, that he hath brought the war to that good pass and forwardness, that unless he be not hindered by a new successor, in all likely-hood and appearance, he will make a final end thereof next summer.

With these speeches they prevailed so much, that the Consuls for their part promised to be ordered and let down by the Senat in this behalf upon condition, that the Tribunes would be content to do the like. Now when of both sides, they had referred themselves to a free and absolute consultation the LL. of the Senat affirmed to both the Consuls the government of Italy, and continued the command of the army still with T. Quintus, until there came another to succeed him. Two legions were appointed for the Consul, with commission to war upon the Gauls between Rome and the Alps who had revolted from the people of Rome. And for Quintus ordained it was, that there should be sent into Macedonia unto him, a new supply of 5000 foot, 200 horse, and 3000 sea-servitors and mariners. And likewise, that the same L. Oppius the Tribunes should be Admiral of the navy as before. For the Pretors who were to go into Spain, there was an allowance of 8000 footmen out of the allies of the Latin nation, and 400 horsemen, so that they diminished the old soldiers out of Spain: and enjoined they were to limit and set out the bounds of their several provinces, whereas the higher Spain and the lower should part. And for Macedonia there were two Lieutenants more for the army appointed, to wit, P. Sulpicius and P. Villius, who had been Consuls both, and in that province.

Before that either Consuls or Pretors went out to their provinces, it was thought good to take order for the prodigious tokens which happened. For at Rome the Temple of Vulcanus and Suavis manius at Fregelle the wall and a gate of the City, were stricken with lightning. At Arpinum it appeared light (as it had been clear day) in the night season. At Asculum a Lamb was yeened having two heads and five feet. Also at Forme two wolves entered into the Town, and worried somewhat where they were in their way. Last of all, at Rome there was a wolf, that not only came into the City, but went forward as far as to the Capitol.

C. Aelius a Tribune of the Commons proposed a law, that there should be five Colonies constituted to the Sea side, and there planted: two at the mouth of the Rivers Tiberis and Livernis, one at Puteoli, another in the Burrough Town of Salernum, and to make the fifth Paestum was adjoined to the rest. Into every Colony order was taken, that there should be thirty households sent. The three Commisaries, called triumvirs, for the conducting of these Colonies were created; namely, M. Scaevola, Geminus, Q. Minucius Thermanus, and T. Sempronius Longus. These three had commission to continue in the charge of this office three years. After the manner, and all other matters accomplished, pertaining to God and man, that were by the Consuls to be performed, then they let forward both, into their provinces. Cornelius took his way directly against the Insubrians: who accompanied with the Cenomani, were entered at it at time into arms: Q. Minucius in his journey bare on the left hand of Italy toward the northern sea: and conducting his army to Genua, began with the Ligurians to make war. C. Aelius and T. Sulpicius Towns both of the Ligurians, likewise the two States of the same nation, the Celaenis and the Cerdiciates surrendered unto him: inasmuch as all the country on this side the Po, were in subjection to the Romans, except the Boians among the Gauls, and the Illuats among the Ligurians. By report H there were fifteen Towns containing twenty thousand men, which yielded unto them. From thence led the legions into the territory of the Boians. The army of the Boians had passed over the Po a little before, and joined with the Insubrians and Cænomans: for hearing that the Consul would war jointly with both their forces, they intended likewise to make themselves more strong, by uniting and bringing their power together. But the bruit being blown abroad, that once of the Consul invaded and fired the country of the Boians, presently there arose a tumult. For the Boians demanded, that they all in general would help them in their distress. The Insubrians refused and said, That they would not abandon their own confines: by which occasion they distanced. The Boians went to the defence of their own country, and the Insubrians with the Cænomans, sat them down upon the banks of the River Mincius. Five miles beneath that place, the Consul Cornelius also encamped himself near the said River: from whence he sent certain messengers all about the villages, and to Brissia, the head City of that nation: and being advertised sufficiently that the youth was up in arms, without the warrant and consent of their ancients; and that the Cænomans joined not with the Insubrians in their rebellion by virtue of publick counsel and authority: he sent for the principal persons among them, and began to labour and deal with them, that the Cænomans would forsake the Insubrians, and openly with their engines advanced, either to return unto their own country, or turn to the Romans. This they could not bring them to: howbeit they assured the Consul, that in the field they would either fight till and do nothing, or else, if any good opportunity was presented unto them, they would aid the Romans. The Insubrians knew nothing of this complot: and yet, some doubt and suspicion they had, that their allies had, and were not K. found of all four: and therefore when there was occasion to lead forth to fight a field, they durst not truit with either of the two wings and points of the battel, for fear if they retreated like false brethren, they should hazard the main chance: but placed them behind the engines in the rearward. The Consul in the beginning of the battel vowed a Temple to Juno Sospita, in case he discomfited the enemies that day, and put them to the rout. The soldiers set up a shout, and cried aloud that they would bring it to pass that the Consul should have his desire, and therewith charged the enemy right fiercely. The Insubrians could not abide the first shock. Some write, that in the very conflict the Cænomans also suddenly let upon their back, whereby they were distressed and in danger both before and behind; and that there were slain enclosed in the midst five and thirty thousand of the enemies, and seven hundred taken prisoners, and among them Amilcar the General of L. the Carthaginians, who was the cause of this war: also that there were a hundred and thirty engines carried away, and of chariots above two hundred. All the Towns that followed this revolt, yielded to the Romans.

Mimius the Consul, at the beginning made excursions into the country of the Boians, wasting and spoiling it all over: but afterwards when they had forsaken the Insubrians, and were retired home to defend and save their own, he kept himself within camp, making full account to give a set battel with the enemy. Neither would the Boians for their part have been behind, but ready to have answered them, had not the rumor of the Insubrians overthrow, daunted and broken their hearts. Whereupon they forsook their leader, quit the camp, and bestowed themselves in the Towns and Villages to guard every man his own, and quite altered the course of their enemy M. war, and put him besides his account. For the Consul past all hope now to determine the quarrel in one ranged battel, began again to forage the fields, burn all buildings, and force Towns by assault. Much about the same time Clasidium was set on fire. And from thence the legions were conducted against the Illuats among the Ligurians, who only stood out and would not come in, and yield obedience. Which nation likewise hearing that the Insubrians were defeated in a battel, and that the Boians were so scared, that they durst not venture the fortune of a field, submitted themselves. At the same time the letters of the Consul, containing their happy affairs in France, were brought to Rome. M. Sergius the Pretor of the City first read them in the Senat, and afterwards by the advice of the Senate, rehearsed them in a full audience and assembly of the people. And a procession was decreed for the space of four daies.

Now was winter come, and whilst T. Quintus after the winning of Elatis, wintered his armies in divers harbors within Phœcia and Loeria, there arose a mutiny in Opus. The one faction sent for the Ætolians their near neighbours to side with them: and the other for the Romans. The Ætolians came first, but the mightier faction would not suffer them to enter in: for having dispatched a messenger to the Roman General, they held the Town until his coming. The Kings garrison kept the fortresse, neither could they be brought to abandon it either with the menaces of the Opuntians, or the authority and countenance of the Roman commander. The only let and stay why it was not immediately assailed was this: Because there was come an herald from the King, requesting time and place of a parley, which with much ado was granted to the King: not because Quintus of him self was not detestous and wished that he might be thought to have ended this war, either by force of arms or conditions of peace: for as yet he knew not whether one of the new Consuls should be sent to succeed him, or his government continued still unto him (according as he had given his friends and kinsfolks in charge to bring that about by all the endeavour and means that he could make:) but he supposed verily, that this parley would be to good purpose for him, if it might use in his liberty to drive matters unto war if he stayed still, or draw to a peace if he departed home. So upon the third and fourth of the gulf Males, they chose a place near unto Nicæa, Thither

A Thither came the King by water from Demetrias with five brigantines or pinnaces, and one ship of war with a brais beak-head. There accompanied him the chief L. of Macedonia, and Cycladas a noble personage of great mark among the Achaëans, and one that was from thence banished. With the Roman General were King Aminander, Dionysidorus an Ambassador of King Attalus, and Agessibrenis Admiral of the Rhodian fleet, Phœneas the chief and principal Magistrat of the Ætolians, and two Achaëans Arifthenus and Xenophon. The Roman General in the midst of these, advanced himself forward to the edge of the very shore, even to the bank side, whilst the King came forward to the foredeck of his ship standing at anchor: and thus he began and laid unto the King: "Sir, you may do better to come ashore that we may commune and confer together, the close, and both speak and hear one another more easily. The King refused to do so: and why not quoth B. "Quintus, who is it that you fear if a man may know? Then with an haughty spirit and kinglike: I fear none (quoth he) but the immortal Gods; but I trust not the fidelity of all that I see here about you, and name's, the Ætolians least of all other. Why (saith Quintus again) this is the common care of all them that come to parly with enemies; namely, to be in danger once of another. Yea marry, quoth the King, but by your leave Quintus, the price and recompence of treachery and falsehood (if it should come to that) is not all one for killing Philip and Phœneas: for the Ætolians should not find it so hard a matter to substitute another Pretor, as the Macedonians "to create another King in my room. This said, there was not a word more to the point: while the Roman General thought it reason that he should begin who sought for a parley; and if the King supposed it meet that it was his part to speak first who should give conditions, and not for him C. that stood at receipt, and was to accept thereof. Then Quintus began and said, that his speech should be plain and simple: for he would say no more, but propound only those points, which if they might not be performed, there would be no peace upon any condition at all. First, that the King must withdraw his garrisons out of all the Cities of Greece. Item, That he is to deliver up all the prisoners and luggage reverts that he hath, unto the allies of the people of Rome. Item, That he restore again to the Romans all those pieces in Illyria, when after the peace concluded in Epirus, he had seized upon. Last of all, that he surrender unto Prolemæus King of Ægypt, all those Cities which he possessed himself of after the death of Prolemæus Philopator. These (saith he) are the conditions, that I must the people of Rome do demand: but meet it is besides, that you hear the demands about you. Then the Ambassador or agent for King Attalus required, that the Ships D. and captives which had been taken in the Sea-fight before Chios, should be rendered, and that Niocepharus and the Temple of Pennus, which he had pillaged and spoiled, should be restored as good and entire, as they were before. After him, the Rhodians made claim to Persea (a country in the continent right over against their Isle, and an ancient appurtenance of their Seignory) and demanded whither, that the garrisons should quit Lysia, Bargylla, and the City of the Eurocedonians, and about Hesperonius, likewise the Cities of Sesio and Aydos. Item, that Tanapolis should be restored unto the Byzantines, with the ancient charter of their franchises and liberties. Finally, that all the Merchant Towns and Ports in Asia might be freed from paying custom. Then came upon him the Achaëans, and challenged Corinthus and Argi as their own. After them, when as Phœneas (the Pretor of the Ætolians) had demanded in a manner the same that the Romans had before; E. namely, that the Kings forces should depart out of Greece, adding moreover, that those Cities should be rendered unto the Ætolians which in times past belonged to their dominion and jurisdiction: then one of the heads of the Ætolians named Alexander, an eloquent man among them, as any other, presently inferred and said: "That he had a long time listened still, and opened not his mouth, not because he thought that in all this conference they would grow to any point or conclusion, but for that he would not interrupt any of his allies in their speech. And as for Philip, quoth he, he doleth not foundly and bona fide in treaties of peace, no more than ever heretofore: he hath managed his wars with virtue and true valour. For in all these parleys and conferences he layeth trains, and lieth to catch advantages: in war he never striketh a battail in plain field, nor cometh to close fight hand to hand; but in his retreats and flights, burneth and sacketh Cities and fortresses: and thus bring himself vanquished, spoileth and maketh havock of that which by right is the due reward and recompence of conquerors. But the noble Macedonian Kings in old-time, took no such courses. Their manner was to fight it out in open field, and to spare Cities and Towns, all that ever possibly they could; to the end that their dominion might be more wealthy and puissant. For what kind of policy is it, for him to ruin and destroy utterly that about the "possession whereof he is in question, and relieve nothing for himself but only war? This Philip "the year past hath laid desolate in Theffalie more Cities of his allies there, than all the enemies have done that ever Theffalie had: and hath taken more from the Ætolians themselves, while he was a confederate friend with them, than all the time that he was their professed enemy. He hath seized upon Lysimachia, expelled their Pretor, and chased out the garrison of the Ætolians. G. Chior also, a City under his own subjection he hath raised, inverted and quite destroyed. By memorable falsehood and deceit he is possessed of * Thebes in Phœbia, Ecberrum, Larissa, and Phœnada. Philip hath led and galled at these words of Alexander, commanded that his ship should approach nearer to the bank, to the end that himself might be better heard. And as he began to frame bitter invectives against the Achaëans principally, Phœneas cut him off, saying, That the quarrel was not to be decided by word, but with the sword: and either he must win it by mere force, or yield obedience to the mightier. That is true, quoth Philip, and so evident, that a blind man may see it: telling;

* For distinction sake, the word Thebes is used, to signify the City of Phœbia, and not the City of Theffalie.

jetting merily at Phœnæ, who was troubled with a pair of bad eyes. And given he was by nature H to be pleasantly conceited, yea, and fuller of his frumps, I wot than beleemed the Majesty of a King: so as many times even in treaty of serious matters and of great consequence, he could not forbear but make himself merry and laugh a good while. "Afterwards he fell to a fit of choler and "indignation, that the Ætolians should take upon them like Romans to command him out of "Greece, who if they were put to it, were not able upon their knowledge to set down the bounds
"of Greece & limit how far it reached. For almost as the Agreï, the Apodotes and Amphiloichi,
"of Greece & limit how far it reached. For almost as the Agreï, the Apodotes and Amphiloichi, "which take up a great part of Ætolia are not within Greece. And what just cause (quoth he) of "complaint have they, in that I have not spared some of their allies? Why? even they themselves
"hold this old custom for a law, namely, to permit their youth to take arms and serve against "their own allies, so they do it without the publick order and warrant from the State: and very I "often a man may see Ætolians in contrary armies, & come to aid as well the one side as the other.
"As for Chim, it was not I that forced it: I did no more but aid Præfius my friend and ally, in the "siege and assault thereof. And as touching Lysimachia, I defended it against the Thracians: but "for almost as of necessity I was called away from the guard thereof unto this war, the Thraci-
"ans now hold it. Thus much by way of answer to the Ætolians. Now concerning Atalua and "the Rhodiens, by right I owe them nothing: for it was not I but they, that began the war.
"Howbeit, for the honor that I bear to the Romans, I will make restitution to the Rhodiens of "Pera, and restore I will to Atalua the ships and the captives as many as are forth coming "may be found. As for the restitution and making good again of Nicephorium and the Temple of "Venus, what answer should I return to them that demand it, but this, that I will endeavour and K "be at charge of planting new trees (which is the only way and means whereby groves and "woods that are cut down and fallen, may be recovered again) seeing that ye will needs have it,
"that Kings (forsooth) must commune and reason to and fro about such matters as these. In "the last place, he framed his speech to answer the Achaïans: wherein, first he began with the "benefits and pleasures that Antigonus had done unto that nation: then, of the favours and good
"turns they had received from his own self: and with all he commanded their decrees and edicts
"to be read, containing all kind of honors as well divine as human: adding moreover the late
"and fresh revolve of their army from him: and albeit he inveighed sharply against their disloy"alty and treachery, yet he promised to render Argos unto them, as for Corinth, he would con"fer and consult with the Roman General, and demand of him, whether he thought it reason L
"that he should depart from those cities which he won by arms, and held by right of conquest, or "dispose himself of those also, which he received from his progenitors as his lawful inheri"tance? The Achaïans and Ætolians addressed themselves to answer those points: but the issue "was wellnigh down: whereupon the conference was adjourned until the morrow. Philip retired "to the harbor from whence he came and the Roman, with their allies to their camp. The day fol"lowing, Quintus at the time appointed was ready before the City of Næves (for that was thought
"a convenient place,) But Philip appeared not: nor for the space of certain hours came there any
"at all from him, not so much as a messenger. Now when they were out of all hope of his repair "thither, behold of a sudden his ships were detected. For himself he said by way of excuse, that "considering how hard, how grievous and intolerable indignities were imposed upon him, he had "employed all that day time until then in consultation, and could not resolve. But it was generally "thought among them all, that he had of purpose prolonged the time, and made it so late even to"ward evening, because the Achaïans and Ætolians should have no leisure to answer unto him.
"And this opinion of theirs himself confirmed, in that he requested that he alone might parly
"with the Roman General himself, and that all others should go aside and absent themselves: to "the end they two might spend and lose no more time in debate and wrangling, but go briefly to "the point, and make an end one way or other. This petition of his would not at first be accepted "by Quintus, pretending that he would not have it seen that the allies were excluded out of the "conference. But afterwards upon his importunitie by the advice of them all the Roman Ge"neral together with Ap. Claudius a Colonel, when the rest were voided away, advanced forward "to the bank side: the King with the other two whom he had with him the day before came a land, N
"There after they had parted in secret together a certain time, they parted. What Philip related "unto his company is not certainly known: but Quintus made report unto his allies of their con"ference in this wise: namely, that Philip was content to quit the whole coast and tract of Ilyri-
"cum, for the Romans to enter upon. Item, to send back all the traitorous renegats, and as many "captives as were to be found. Item, to redeliver unto Atalua the ships and the mariners taken "prisoners therein. Item, to render unto the Rhodiens the country of Pera: but in no wise to be "difficult of Iussus and Beryllæ. Item, to deliver unto the Ætolians Phœsalus and Larissa, but not "Thebes in any case. Last of all, to part not only with Argos, but with Corinth also, for the behoof
"of the Achaïans. There was not one of them all well pleased at this limitation and forcing out of par"ticular parts, which he would deliver, and which he would not. For in this reckoning & account O
"they should be more losers than winners. For unless (say they) he remove his forces and garri"sons out of all Greece throughout, he will never cease to give or take occasions of quarrel. As they all
"cried out from the whole assembly to this effect, their high voyce was heard of Philip, albeit he "stood aloof. Whereupon he requested Quintus to refer the whole matter once more unto the next "day: and then certainly without fail, he would either perswade him and his allies and bring them to

A to his mind, or else would come off and suffer himself to be perswaded and over-ruled by them.
The place of meeting was appointed upon the strand near Thronium: and thither they repaired on both parts betimes. There Philip first and foremost, be sought both Quintus and all those that were present, not to disturb the hope of peace, but that it might come to some effect: and in conclusion, craved time wherein he might lend his Embassadors unto the Senat of Rome: assuring them, that if he could not obtain peace under those allies above said, he would accept of any other conditions, which it should please the Senat to put upon him. All the rest milked hereof, supposing that he sought for nothing else but delays and tract of time, whiles he might gather his forces together. But Quintus inferred again, That well it might be and a truth indeed that they alleged, if it were summer time and a season fit for war and martial exploits: but now, considering winter was at hand, they could lose nothing by granting him respite to address an embassy.
For neither (quod he) will any capitulation and composition which we should make with Philip
for neither (quod he) will any capitulation and composition which we should make with Philip without the approbation of the Senat: and in this one winter (when of necessity we must for cause from war) it may be known what the Senat by their authority will approve. To this advice the chief of the confederates accorded, and therein rested. So there was a cessation of arms for two months granted: in which mean time it was thought good, that each of them likewise should dispatch one Embassador to advertise the Senat to take heed they were not over-raught by the subtilty and fraud of the King. But provided it was in the covenant of the truce afore said, That incontinently the Kings garriisons should void the territories of Phœgia and Laecis, Quintus alio himself sent (together with the Embassadors of the allies) Antiochus King of the Attamans: and to make the embassy more honourable, Q. Fabius (his own wives sisters son) Q. Fabius and P. Claudius accompanied the King.

When they were arrived at Rome, the Embassadors of the allies had audience given them before those that were sent from King Philip. Most of their speeches were spent in railing against the King: but in this one point they most of all moved the Senat to give ear unto them, namely, when they described by demonstration (as in a map) the situation of the countries as well by Land as Sea, that all might plainly see, that if the King might hold in his hands the City Demetrias in Thessalie, Chalcis in Eubœa, and Corinth in Achaïa, Greece could not possibly be at liberty, considering that Philip himself was wont to term them (no less truly than tauntingly.) The shackles and fetters of Greece. After them were the Kings Embassadors permitted to enter into the Se national: and having begun to make a long Oration, their speech was cut off with this one brief and short interrogatory, Whether Philip would quit those three Cities afore said, or no? Whereunto they made this answer, That they had no express warrant in their commission touching that matter by name. So the Kings Embassadors were sent away without conclusion of any peace: and Quintus had full authority to determine of war or peace at his pleasure. Who seeing plainly by this, that the Senat was not weary of war, and being himself more desirous of victory than peace, he would never alter grant Philip any more parties, but gave him to understand, that he would admit no other embassy from him, but that which should bring him news of his departure quite out of Greece.

Philip seeing no other way now but that he must needs fight and trie the issue by a main bat-tail, and that he was to gather his forces together from all parts: being perplexed most of all for the Cities of Achaïa (a country far remote from him) and yet more careful in regard of Argi than Corinth: he thought it best policy to make it over (as it were upon trust) into the hands of Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedæmonians, upon condition, That if he obtained the victory, Nabis should deliver it up unto him again: but if ought should come to him but well then Nabis himself to have and hold it as his own. Unto Philotes, Governor of Corinth and Argi, he dispatched his letters, That he should himself in person commune with the tyrant above-named about it.
Philotes, besides that he came now with a present, added moreover of his own head (for the better assurance and pawn of amity between the tyrant and the King) That Philip would give his daughters in marriage to Nabis his sons. The tyrant refused at the first to accept of that City, unless he were sent for, by a decree of the Argives themselves to come for to aid the City.
But afterwards when he heard say, That in a frequent assembly there, they not only rejected him, but also detested and abhorred the very name of a tyrant, as an execrable abomination: supposing now that he had a good occasion and quarrel offered to make a spoil of them he willed Philotes to deliver the City unto him when he would. So the tyrant was received into the Town in the night season, without the privacy and knowledge of any person: and by break of day he seized upon all the higher places. The gates were shut, and few of the principal heads in the beginning of the tumult made shift to escape. Those that were absent had their houses ransacked and their goods piled: as many as were present, had all their gold and silver taken from them: besides, great sums of money were imposed upon them to be paid. They that made speed and were not long about it, but tendered ready coin, were let go without any outrage or hurt done unto their bodies: but such as were suspected either to hide or keep ought back, were mangled and tortured like bondslaves. After this, he assembled the people together and published two Laws: the one, for crossing all debt-bonds and cancelling obligations: the other, for division of Lands among the people by the poll: two fire-brands to set their turn that seek for change and alteration in a State: enough to set on fire the Commons against the Nobles and chief of a City.

When the City of Argos was thus brought in subjection under Nabis, the tyrant never remitting at whole hands, nor upon what condition he had received it, sent Embassadors to Elatis unto Quintus, likewise to Atineus winning then in Egina, certifying them, That Argos was in his hands and as his devotion; and if Quintus would repair thither to parle with him, he doubted not but they two should agree well enough in every point. Quintus granted to come thither to the end, that by this means he might disfigure Philip of that garrison: and he sent likewise to Antiochus, willing him, that he would depart from Egina, and meet him at Sicyone: himself looked from Antiochus, and with ten Galeaces called Quinquereines: which (as hap was) L. Quintus his brother some dayes before had put to sea out of the winning harbor of Corycia, crossed over to Sicyone. Now was Atineus there already, who making remembrance unto Quintus, That it behooved a tyrant to come unto a Roman General, and not a Roman General to go unto a tyrant, induced Quintus to condescend unto his opinion, and not to enter the City of Argos. Not far from the City is a place called Mycon, where they agreed to meet and commune together. Quintus came to the place, accompanied with his brother and certain Colonels. Atineus was guarded with his Princely and Royal train. Nabis the Pretor of the Achazans repaired thither, attended with some few auxiliary souldiers: and there they found the tyrant expecting their coming with all his forces. And armed as he was, with his guard likewise armed he advanced himself into the midst (well near) of the plain that lay between. Quintus unarmed came forward with his brother and two Colonels. King Atineus likewise between the Pretor of the Achazans of the one hand and a courour of his on the other, both unarmed. The tyrant began the speech with an exorde. That being in arms and attend with a guard of armed men, he presented himself to a parle, seeing the General of the Romans and King Atineus unarmed: and said that he stood not in fear of them, but of certain exiled persons of the Argives. After this, when they came to treat as touching the conditions and covenants for the contract of amity, Quintus the General demanded two things: the one, That Nabis would make an end of warring with the Achazans: the other, That he would lend with him certain aids against Philip. And verily to send incurr he granted: and in lieu of peace he was content there should be a truce, until the war with Philip was dispatched. Also about Argos King Atineus began to enter into some question saying, That having the City treacherously betrayed unto him by Philetes, he would bid by force of arms, but he answered again, That he was sent for by the Argives themselves, for to protect them. Then the King required that the Argives might be assembled together, that he might know the truth. The tyrant made no denial thereof. The King replied again, that the assembly should be free, and at their liberty to speak, and to that effect the garrisons were to be removed out of the City, and no Lacedemonians intermingled among them: to the end that the Argives might frankly speak their mind. But the tyrant stoutly denied to withdraw from thence the guards. So this arguing came to no conclusion, and the conference brake up, after that the tyrant had given the Roman General 6000 Candians, and a truce made for the term of four monthes, between Nicias Pretor of the Achazans, and Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians. From thence Quintus departed to Corinth, and appeared the gate with a Regiment of Cretenians, that it might appear to Philetes the Kings Captain, here that the tyrant was revolted from Philip. Philetes also entered into a parle with the Roman General, and when he was exhorted by him to depart out of hand and yeeld the City, he returned him an answer unto him, that he seemed rather to defer, than to deny the thing. From Corinth Quintus crossed the Sea to Antiochus, from whence he sent his brother to found the nation of the Acarnanians. And Atineus departed directly from Argos to Sicyone. Where the City not only encreased the ancient honours of the King, with the addition of new: but also the King over and besides that he had purchased for them in time past the sacred land of Apollon, with a great sum of money, because he would not item now also to pay by this sacred City allied unto him, without some royal bounty and munificence, he gave freely unto them six talents of silver, and 10000 Medims of corn: and to returned to his ships at Cenchrea. Nabis also having strengthened the garrison in Argos, returned to Lacedemon: and after himself had robbed the men of their money and goods, he sent his wife thither to do the like by the women. Who sending for the honourable and worshipful dames of the City, inviting them one by one to their house, and otherwiles many together at once, such as were of kin one to another, by flattering and by threatening gat from them not only all the gold that they had, but in the end stripped off their apparel also, and all the jewels and ornaments that they wore.

The three and thirtieth Book Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the three and thirtieth Book.

It was Quintus Flaminius the Pro-consul, Lendeth the war with Philip, after he had vanquished him in a pigon field near Cynocephalus in Thessalie. L. Quintus Flaminius, brother to the said Pro-consul.

A consul having forced Leucas the head City of Acarnania, received the Acarnanians upon their submission and surrender. C. Sempronius Tuditanus the Pretor was slain, and his army defeated by the Celebrierians. Attalus being fallen suddenly sick, was removed from Thebes to Pergamus, and there departed this life. Peace was granted to Philip upon his suit, and liberty restored to Greece. L. Furius and C. Claudius Marcellus, the two Consuls, subdued the Bonari and L. Iulians in Gaul, Marcellus triumphed. Annibal having practised in Africa to raise wars, but to no effect, was thereupon turned into the Romans, by letters sent from the principal of the adverse faction: but for fear of the Romans, who had dispatched their Embassadors to the Carthaginian Sea, about him, he fled into Antiochus King of Syria, who also prepared them to make war upon the Romans.

B The beginning is not extant in the Latine.

adjoining in those quarters to Acarnania. There was a straight pass or gullet there, half a mile almost in length, but not half a mile in breadth: at the end of this straight standeth the City Leucas planted against an hill that turneth to the East, and looketh toward Acarnania. The balle Town is built upon a plain, reaching along the sea that divideth Leucas from Acarnania. Whereupon the City, as well on the land side, as by sea, is easily to be forced. For the floods of the water resemble a standing lake rather than a Sea, and the whole soil is a light earth, minable and easy to be wrought into, so that in many places at once the walls either undermined or shaken with the ram, came tumbling down. But as the Town itself was assailable, so the hearts of the Townsmen were invincible. For night and day they gave not over, to repair the cracks of the shaken wall, to fill up the open breaches and runs to make head intilly and skirmish with the enemy, and rather to defend the walls by force of arms, than to save themselves by strength of their walls. And surely a longer siege they would have made of it than the Romans hoped but that certain banished persons, Italians born, dwelling in Leucas let in and received armed souldiers on the Cattle side. Howbeit, the Leucadians embattelling themselves in their market place, encountered them as they ran down from the higher ground with a great cry and noise, and maintained battle with them for a long time. In this mean while, the walls in divers places were faced with ladders, and the enemies mounting over the heaps of stones that lay at the breaches, entered the Town. And now by this time the Lieutenant in person, with many companies environed them as they fought: some slain in the midst, others flung away their weapons, and yeilded to the conquerour. After few dayes, upon the news of the held fought at Cynocephalus, all the States of Acarnania came in, and submitted themselves to the Lieutenant.

At the same time, whiles fortune turned thus about, and bare down a tide all at once, the Rhodians also sent out Panfilatus their Pretor with 300 footmen of Achaia: & about 1900 souldiers well armed, gathered out of all sorts of auxiliaries, to regain and recover from the country of Peres, lying in the main and firm land, which had been held some time, and possessed by their ancestors. And these aids were compounded and mixed of French Nilites, Piutes, Tanians, and Aracons of Affrick, and Lardicans of Achaia. With these forces Panfilatus encamped in the territory of Syracena, and there he seized on a commodious place, and very good for his purpose, unwares to the Kings company that had hidden the same. Thither came also to aid them in very good time, a Regiment of a 1000 foot and a 100 horse of Achazans, levied for that purpose, and were commanded by Democritus. Democritus a Captain under the King, willing to recover the said hold again, first pitched his tents, and against the enemies camp. But afterwards he removed to another fort in the territory likewise of Syracena, which they call Agrion: and having rallied together all the garrisons dispersed alunder in divers places, and sent for the auxiliary bands also of the Thessalians, even from Syracena, he took his way and marched toward Aladada, where the enemies were. The Rhodians likewise for their part were ready for battle, and after they were encamped of both sides neer together, immediately they entered into the field to fight it out. Democritus placed in the right point 500 Macedonians, and the Agrians he put in the left in the main battle, he bestowed all those that he had gathered together out of the garrisons belonging to the forts above said, who for the most part were Carians, the points he flanked round about with his cornets of Horse. The Rhodian cohort was marshalled in this manner: The auxiliaries of the Candians and Thracians kept the right point, the hired souldiers (and they were a power of elect footmen) stood in the left, in the midst were the aids (a mixture of many nations:) the Cavalry and all the light armed souldiers that were, compassed the corners like wings. All that day the two armies stood only upon the bank of a brook which ran between them with a small and shallow water: and after some loose shot discharged, they retired into their tents. The next day they were ranged in like order, and struck a battail exceeding the proportion of their numbers: for on each side there were not above three thousand foot, and upon a hundred horse: but they were even matched not in number only and armour, but also in equal courage and noise alike. The Achaz first passed over the said brook, and charged upon the Agrians: afterwards the whole army ran as one would fly, over the River. The fight continued long doubtful, The Achaz being of themselves in number a thousand, disordered some four hundred of the other, and forced them to retreat, and afterwards the entire right point of the battail began to shrink and give ground. As for the Macedonians so long as their battail called Phalans kept their array and stood close together, could not possibly be stirred or removed; but after their left side was laid naked, and they began that place, yea, and according to the good examples of divers noble and renowned personages, he would triumph, and aske them no leave, in the mount Alban. But Cn. Cornelius whilst he was still in office triumphed over the Inibrians and Cænonians. He carried in pomp before him a number of military enigns: he caused great store of French spoil and pillage to pais in a pageant upon chariots taken from the enemies. Many Noblemen of Etræce were led in a shew before his own triumphant chariot: among whom (as some write) was Amilcar General of the Carthaginians. But above all others, the goodliest sight was, a number of Coloners and inhabitants of Cremona and Placentia, who with their bones or caps of liberty on their heads followed his chariot. He bare in triumph 237500 Selveires, 79000 Bigats of silver coin. He divided among his horiemen seventeen Asles apiece, to every horfman he gave double, and to each Centurion trebble so much. Q. Minucius likewise triumphed in mount Alban over the Ligurians and the Boians in Gaul. The honour of this triumph as it was less, in regard of the place, and of the name that went of his acts, as also because all men knew full well, that the charges went not out of the common Chest or Chamber of the City: so for number of enigns, of chariots and spoils gained from the enemies, it was in manner equal, and comparable to the other. And of money he brought well-near as much as Cornelius: for of brals coin he had in shew 254000 Asles, of silver coin in Bigat peeces 53200. To common souldiers or footmen, to Centurions and horfmen, he gave as much as his Colleague. After this triumph there was a general assembly held for the election of Magistrates: wherein were created Consuls, L. Furius Purpurio, and M. Claudius Marcellus. The next day after these Prætors were chosen, Q. Fabius Buteo, T. Sempronius Longus, Q. Minutius Thermus, M. Atilius Glabrio, L. C. Calpurnius Piso, and C. Calpurnius.

In the end of that former year, letters came from T. Quintius with this intelligence, That he had fought in battell ranged with King Philip within Theffaly, where the army of the enemies was defeated and put to rout. These letters were first read in the Senat by Sergius the Prætor, and then by order from the LL. in the publique assembly of the people. For this happy success, it was ordained, That there should be solemn processions for five daies. Shortly after, there arrived Embassadors both from T. Quintius, and also from the King. The Macedonian Embassadors were brought without the City to the place or hamlet called Vila publica where they were appointed their lodging: rich presents were given them, and allowed they were the charges for themselves and their train. In the Temple of Bellona the Senat was assembled, where they passed not many words by reason that the Macedonians promised, That the King should perform whatsoever the Senat would set down. So (according to the ancient custome and manner) there were appointed ten Committees or Delegates, by whose advice and counsel T. Quintius the General, was to present and tender unto Philip articles and conditions of peace: provided, that in the said number of Delegates, P. Sulpicius and P. Valerius should be comprised by name; who when they were Consuls governed the Province of Macedony. The same day, the Consuls demanded and made suit, That the number of their Coloners or inhabitants might be augmented: whereupon an order was granted. That there should be a thousand new enrolled to the former: with this proviso, that in this number none of them should be matriculated, who after the Consulship of P. Sulpicius and P. Villius had been enemies to the people of Rome. The Roman games and plaies were that year exhibited as well in the Circus as upon the stage in the Theatre, by the Ædiles Curule L. Cornelius Scipio and Cn. Manlius Vulso: which, as they were let out with more state and magnificence than ever before, so they were beheld with more joy, contentment and pleasure, in regard that all things fell out so fortunately in the wars; and they were renewed and replenished all thrice over. As for the plaies called Plebeis, they were let forth no less than seven times one after another. Atilius Glabrio and C. Calpurnius exhibited those plaies: who also of their silver that arose of fines and forfeitures, caused three cast images of brals to be made, and erected them to the honour of Ceres, Libera, and Libera.

Now when L. Furius and M. Claudius Marcellus were entred into their Magistracy, and after question made concerning their Provinces, the Senat passed a decree, That both of them jointly should govern Italy: they requested that they might call lots for Macedony and Italy together. N. Marcellus more desirous of the wain of the Province of Macedony, alleged, that the peace was not found but counterfeited, pretended, and deceitfull; and that the King would take arms and war again, in case the army were withdrawn from thence: by which words he put the LL. of the Senat into a deep study and suspence, what to do, or to think of it. And haply the Consuls had obtained their request, but that Q. Marcius Rex, and C. Atinius Labeo, two Tribunes of the Commons, protested, that they would oppose themselves and crois it by their negative voice, unless they might first propose unto the people to know, Whether their will and pleasure was to enter-tain peace with King Philip, or no? This bill being preferred and read in the Capitoll before the people, was granted, and all the tribes or wards, even five and thirty, every one gave their affirmative voice, Ut rogassent [i.e. So be it as ye demanded.] And to the end, that all men might have more cause to rejoyce that peace was confirmed with Macedony, there came heavy news out of Spain, and letters were divulged abroad concerning the same much, That C. Sappianus Tuditanus the Vice-Prætor in the hither Province of Spain, was vanquished in battell, that his army was discomfited and put to flight, and divers men of name and mark slain. That Tuditanus himself was carried forth of the conflict grievously wounded, and soon after died. The Province of Italy was assigned for both the Consuls with those two legions which the former Consuls had in charge, and order

A order granted, that they should levy and enroll four new legions, whereof two should be sent whither it pleased the Senat to appoint, And T. Quintius Flamininus was commanded to rule his Province till with the same army, and his Commission of longer government was renewed. After this, the Prætors call lots for the parting of their Provinces. L. Apulcius Fullo obtained the jurisdiction of the Citizens of Rome, and M. Atilius Glabrio was Chief Justice between Citizens and forrainers. Q. Fabius Buteo had the government of the bair or farther Spain, and Q. Minutius Thermus of the higher or hither Spain. To C. Calpurnius Piso, and Sardinia to S. Sempronius Longus. And ordained it was, that unto Q. Fabius Buteo, and Q. Minutius, to whom the rule of the Provinces in Spain befall, the Consuls should out of those four legions which they had enrolled, deliver one legion apiece, which they thought good and of allies and of the Latine nation, four thousand footmen besides, and three hundred horfmen to either of them. And these Prætors were enjoined to go to their charges with all speed possible.

The war in Spain began afeish, in the fifth after that the former together with the Punick war was ended. But before that these Prætors went forth to this war: (which may be counted as it were new, in regard that the Spaniards now first, and never before, waited in their own proper name, without either leader or army of Carthage.) and before that the Consuls themselves departed out of the City, order was given, that according to the old custome they should provide for the prodigious tokens that were reported. L. Fulvius he rode on horseback into the Sabins country, was both himself and his horle under him smitten dead with lightning. The temple of Feronia in the territory of Capena, was likewise smitten and blasted from heaven. At the Temple of C. Moneta, the Iron heads of two peares were sent to burn on a light fire. A Wolf slipped to enter into the City at the gate Esgulma and ran through the most populous part thereof as far as unto the market place, and so forward to the Tufan street, and from thence through the Mælum, and paid forth again at the gate Capena unto the sea, and in manner without taking any harm.

These prodigious signs were purged by the sacrifices of greater beasts. At the same time Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, who had governed the Province of high Spain before Tuditanus, entred the City by order from the Senat in a kind of triumph, and carried before him in pomp 1515 pound weight of gold: of silver likewise in billion 20000 pound weight: and in coin 34550 deniers. L. Stertinius from the nether Spain, brought into the treasury 50000 pound weight of silver, and never pretended any hope that he had to obtain a triumph. Moreover, of the prizes and spoiles won from the enemies, he caused two arches to be erected in the beast market, even before the Temple of Fortuna and the goddess Munat: and one besides in the grand Cirque or shew-place. And upon these arches he set up gilded Statues, These were all the affairs, to speak of that passed this winter-season.

There wintered at that time in Athen Quintius. And among many other suiters that came unto him with their petitions, the Bæotians exhibited a request, and obtained the same, to wit, that as many of their nation as had served in the wars under Philip, might be restored and sent home again unto them: which was easily granted by Quintius, not so much, for that he thought them worthy of that favour, but because he was to win the love and affections of the States in Greece unto the Roman name, now especially that he had some doubt of King Antiochus. They were not delivered to soon, but seen it was, how little the Bæotians would be beholding to him for it. For they sent presently unto Philip, and gave him thanks for the rendering of those men, as if they had been delivered by him, and not by Quintius and the Romans. And in their next assembly generally for their solemn election, they chose one Bæulius for their Bæotarches, or Lord governor of Bæotia: for no other reason, but because he had been the Colenell of those Bæotians that bare arms for the King: but they passed by Zenippus, Phlegon, and others, that had perswaded to make a league with the Romans. This wrought discontentment in these persons for the present, and fear for the time to come. For thus they reasoned with themselves, If they would do thus while the Roman army lay encamped near to their gates, what should become of them when the Romans were departed into Italy, and whilst Philip was so near at hand to assist those that sided with him, and to annoy those of the adverse part and faction? Therefore they conspired and concluded in the end to make away Bæulius the head of the Kings bend, whilst the Roman forces were at hand. And so chusing a convenient and fit opportunity for their purpose, at what time as he returned homeward drunk from a publique solemn feast, accompanied with certain pleasant and effeminate persons who to make sport and mirth had been at that great feast: as he was tormented and beset with six armed men, whereof three were Italians, and three Ætolians and so murdered. His train that attended him ran away, and raised hue and cry, and called for help. Much trouble and hurly-burly there was throughout the City, much running to and fro with torch-light. But they that did the deed were elapsed out at the next gate. In the morning betimes the people in great number assembled in the Theater, being called together by the voice of the common Bædle. as if the murderers had been detected. Openly it was in every mans mouth, that he was killed by his own retinue, even those filthy wanton persons that he had about him: but secretly in their minds they deemed Zenippus the author of the murder. For the present it was thought good to apprehend them that were in his train, and that they should be examined. Whilst search was made for them, Zenippus came forth into the assembly with the like intent to avert all suspicion of crime from himself, saying, that men were much deceived to think, that so horrible and strange a murder was committed by such weaklings & persons as they were.

M m m :

This

This he argued and discouraged by many likelihoods and probabilities to the same effect; by which means some were very perfwaded, that if himself had been guilty of the fact, he would never have offered and preiented himself in the face of the assembly, or broached any words at all of the murder, especially when no man urged him thereto. Others there were again, who made no doubt, but by this impudent face his drift was to prevent an accusation, and to turn away all suspicion from himself. The innocent and guileless creatures within a while after being examined upon the rack and tortured, knowing what was the general opinion and conceit of men, made their uie of the fame for to bolt out and reveal the fact; and so they named Zenippus and Pisistratus for the principals; without any presumption or light given how they should seem to come to the knowledge of any thing. Howbeit Zenippus accompanied with one Stratonidas fled by night to Tanagra, fearing the remorse and prick of his own conscience more than the appeaching and information of those persons who neither were party nor privy to any thing. But Pisistratus making no regard of those accusers, remained still at Thebes. Now had Zenippus one bondslave, (whose hand was in all this action, and had been a courier between) whom Pisistratus feared that he would betray him, and by that very fear caused him to open and declare the whole matter. He dispatched therefore his letters unto Zenippus, advising him to rid that slave out of the way, who was privy to their dealing; advertising him, that in his conceit he was not to meet to conceal the thing now done, as he was a fit instrument at the time to execute the same. The bearer of these letters he straightly charged to deliver them unto Zenippus immediately with all speed. But he, because he could not pay a convenient time to meet with him himself, gave the letters to the very same slave, whom he supposed to be most fait and truly to his Master: adding moreover, and saying, That they came from Pisistratus unto Zenippus, and imported matter of great consequence. The bond slave promised to deliver them incontinently, but being touched in conscience, he was so bold as to break them open; and when he had read them through, he fled back in great fear to Thebes (where he betrayed Pisistratus). Zenippus troubled in spirit for the flight of his bondman, retired himself to Athens, supposing it a place of more security to live in, as a banished man. As for Pisistratus, after he had been divers times examined upon the rack, was put to death in the end. This murder wondrously estranged the Thebans and Boeotians, and let their hearts against the Romans; in so much as they hated and detested them to death, taking great indignation that Zenippus (a principal and chief personage of their nation) had committed so foul and heinous a fact. To rebel in open terms, they had neither force sufficient to maintain them, nor a principall head to direct and lead them. Whereupon they fell to that which is next cousin to plain war, even to thieving and robbing by the high waies side, in such sort, as they surprized as well some soldiers who lodged near unto them, and were their guests, as others that wandered and ranged abroad from the garriſons in winter time, and travelled about their affairs, who otherwhiles were caught up by the way, and came short home. Some passengers were killed in the port-road-waies, by those that lay in wait for them in notorious thievery corners; others were trained and led deceitfully through by-lanes into desert places, there to take up their innes and lodging, and then were murdered. At length they plaid these pranks, not only of malice unto them, but also for greedy desire of booty and spoil, by reason that commonly these wandering men went about their trade and merchandise, and therefore had some charge about them, and carried silver in their belts. Now when as at first there were some out of the way, and every day more than other many men missing, and no man knew what was become of them, all Boeotia began to have an ill name, and the soldiers were more afraid to travell there, than in the enemies country. Then Quintus sent certain Embassadors to all the Cities for to make complaint of these robberies and enormities. Many footmen there were found dead about the mear or lake Copis, where their carriages were raked forth of the mud and mire, and drawn out of the standing water, tied and fastned as they were to heavy stones or some great vessels, that by their poise they might be plunged, and sink to the bottom. Many such like outrages were found to have been committed at Acræpea and Coronea. Quintus at the first demanded to have the offenders delivered unto him, and for five hundred soldiers (for so many were caught up by the way and murdered) he enjoyed the Boeotians to make payment of five hundred talents of silver. But the Cities would do neither the one nor the other: only they paid with bare words, and excused themselves in that nothing had been done by publick warrant or counsell from the State. Whereupon the Embassadors were sent to Athens, and into Achaia, to make protestation unto their allies, that they would pursue the Boeotians with open war, upon good ground and just cause offered. And so after he had given commandment unto P. Claudius to go unto Acræpea with one part of his forces, himself with the other let him down about Coronea, and planted siege untire. But first the territory was laid waste, all the way as the two armies marched from Elania in divers quarters. The Boeotians plagued with these losses and calamities, seeing nothing but fear and flight in every place, sent their Embassadors unto him: but when they could not be admitted into the camp, the Achæans and the Athenians were fain to come with them. The Achæans were of greater credit, to entreat in their behalf: for unless they might obtain pardon and peace for the Boeotians, they determined also to enter into the quarrel, and to make war themselves. By whose mediation the Boeotians had access unto the Roman General, and audience granted. Who after they were enjoined to deliver up the offenders and malefactors to Justice, and to pay thirty talents for amends and satisfaction, obtained peace: and so the siege was raised.

After

A After some few daies, the ten Delegates or Committees from Rome were arrived, by whose advice and counsell peace was articulated and capitulated with King Philip upon these conditions: Annexum, That all the Greek Cities, as well in Europe as in Asia, should enjoy their liberty, and live under their own laws. Item, That Philip should withdraw his garriſons out of as many of them as had been in subjection under him. Item, That he do the like by those which were in Asia to wit, Ewromos, Pedasa, Bargylla, Iaffus, Myrina, Nidus, Teaffus, and Perinthus: all which the Romans required to be free. As concerning the liberty and freedom of the Cyades, it was covenanted, That Quintus should write his letters to Prusias the King of Bithynians, giving him to understand the advice and pleasure of the Senat, and the ten Delegates, to wit, Item, That Philip render all the prisoners and fugitive traitors to the Romans, and yield up all the covered ships with hatches: and over and besides, one huge royall Gallie or Argosley, which by reason of the exceeding bigness was unweildy and of little uie, and was directed with sixteen bales of oars on the side. Item, That he should not have above five hundred men in arms, nor one Elephant at all, Item, That he should not war (but by leave and permission of the Senat) without the marches of Macedonia. Item, That he pay unto the people of Rome a thousand talents, the one half in hand, and the other at ten payments, within the term of ten years. Valerius Antias writeth moreover, that there was imposed upon him a tribute of four thousand pound weight of silver yearly, for ten years: and besides, twenty thousand pound weight presently. The same author faith that expressly it was capitulated, that Philip should not war at all with Eumenes the son of Attalus, who was newly come to the crown. For the assurance of these covenantes, there were received hostages, and amongst them Demetrius King Philip his son. Valerius Antias hath written moreover, that the Island Aegina, and certain Elephants were given in pure gift to Attalus in his absence: and that upon the Rhodians was bestowed Stratonicea a City in Caria, with other Cities also which Philip had possessed. To conclude, that the Athenians received of free gift these Isles following to wit, Paros, Ambrós, Delos, and Seyros.

When all the States of Greece approved and thought well of this peace, only the Ætolians secretly muttered & found fault with this order let down by ten Delegates above-aid giving out, that they were but bare letters and vain words, shadowed with a counterfeit appearance of liberty. For to what end, say they, should some Cities be delivered to the Romans, and those not named? others again be named, and yet order taken, that they without delivery should be free? but only for this purpose, that those Cities which are in Asia should be set free, because they be far off, and therefore in more safety; but those that are in Greece, being not precisely named, should be seized upon by them to wit, Corinth, Chalcis, and Oreum, with Eretria, and Demetrias. And to lay a crutch, this finding fault of theirs was not altogether frivolous, and without occasion given: for some doubt there was of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias: because in the order and act of the Senat, by vertue whereof those ten Delegates aforeaid were sent from the City, all other Cities of Asia and of Greece were doubtless in plain terms freed: but as touching these three before named, the Delegates had in commission to take order, as they should see it stand with the good of the Common-wealth, according to their own judgment and discretion, and the trust that was committed unto them. For well they wist that King Antiochus would pass over into Europe, so soon as ever he could bring his affairs about to his mind, and unwilling they were on any hand, that these Cities so commodious for his designs, should lie open and ready to his hand for to lieze upon at his pleasure. So Quintus together with the ten Delegates sailed from Elania to Antiochia, and from thence to Corinth, where they held their Council and consulted of their affairs. Quintus would very often say unto them, That all Greece might be delivered and set at liberty, if they could refrain the tongues of the Ætolians: if they were willing that their good affection should be deemed sincere, and the majesty of the Roman name maintained among all: finally, if they would pretend and make it known abroad, that they were called the seas to let Greece free, and not after they had taken off the signory of Philip to translate it unto themselves. The other again contradicted nothing as touching the liberty of those Cities: howbeit, they made remembrance, that it was the later course for them, to remain awhile under the protection and safeguard of the Romans than that instead of Philip they should receive Antiochus for their Lord. In conclusion decreed it was, that Corinth should be rendered to the Achæans, but yet so, that there should be a Roman garriſon in the highest quarter of the City called Acræopolis. Item, That Chalcis and Demetrias should be retained still, untill such time as they were no more in fear and doubt of Antiochus.

Now approached the ordinary solemnity of the Isthmian games, unto which at all times naturally there was great recourse of people, as well in regard of the natural disposition of that nation (desirous to see such sports and pastimes, wherein was represented the trial of matters in all kind of arts, in all sorts either of mere strength or of agility and nimbleness of the body) as also in respect of the commodious seat of the place: whereunto from all parts of Greece they repaired thither, by two divers and sundry seas. But being amused in expectation to know what the effect of Greece and what their own particular condition would be hereafter, divers men not only devoted directly with themselves, but also gave out and whispered in their speech and talk. Well, the Romans were set to behold this solemnity: and the publick Crier with a trumpet went forth into the midst of the Cirque or show-place, from whence the manner was to proclaim the sports and games aforeaid in a solemn form of words: and after he had by sound of trumpet

made silence, he pronounced with a loud voice in this manner: "Be it known unto all men, that the "Senat of Rome, and T. Quintus the General of their army, having vanquished King Philip and "the Macedonians, do ordain, that the Corinthians, the Phoenicians, and the Locrenians, be all
 "free, and delivered from all taxes whatsoever, and to live according to their own laws, Item, That "the Ille Eubæa, the Magnesiens, the Theſſians, the Perthebians, the Acheans, and Phthiotis do enjoy the "like freedom and immunity. And consequently hereafter all the nations which had been in "subjection to Philip. Upon this proclamation of the beadle there was such joy, that men were "not able to conceive and comprehend it. Every man looked upon another wondering at the "thing which he witnessed and desired more to hear: one looked upon another wondering at the "matter, as if it had been a vain vision or illusion of some dream; but enquired of them that stood next "to them. The Crier was called back again: such a desire had each one not only to hear the glad "tidings, but also to behold the happy messenger of this their liberty: and no remedy there was, but "once again he must publish and pronounce the same. Now when their joy was once confirmed,
 "they set up such a shout, and followed it so with clapping of hands, redoubling the fame so often,
 "as evidently it appeared, how there is no earthly good in the world more pleasing and welcome "unto a multitude than is liberty. After this, the games were performed in such haste, that neither "the mind of any man was bent to intend, nor the eye busied to behold the sight thereof; who wholly "had that one joy possessed them and foretold the fence of all other pleasures and delights. But "when the pastimes were once ended, they all in manner ran apace to the Roman General, in such "fort that his person was in some danger of the multitude, crowding to hard upon him alone, for "desire they had to come unto him, to touch his right hand, and to cast garlands of flowers and la"bels of sundry colours upon him: but being a man full upon three and thirty years of age, both
 "the vigour of youth, and also the joy that he took for the accomplishment of so glorious an act, "afforded him strength enough to abide the press of the people. This gladness of all men shewed it "felt not only for the present, but continued also for many daies space, entertained not only in "thankful minds, but expressed also in joyful discourses: namely, "That there was one nation yet in "the world, which at their proper cost and charges, with their own pain and perill made war for "the freedom of others: who afforded this favour and pleasure not to the neighbours and bor-
 "ers only, or to those that were joyed near to them in the continent and firm land, but pas"sed over the seas: to the end, that throughout the whole world there should be no unjust and "tyrannical government, but in all places, right, reason, and law, might prevail most and carry "greatest sway. Lo, how by the only voice of one Beadle all the Cities of Greece and Asia are set "free. To conceive and enterprize to great a thing proceedeth from a brave mind and noble heart:
 "but to effect the same is a singular virtue and rare felicity.

This done, Quintus and the ten Delegates gave audience to the embassages of divers Kings and Princes, Nations and States. And first of all others were the Embassadors of King Antiochus called in: who used the times of speech in manner that they had at Rome, vinting great words without any ground and substance of credit. But answer was returned unto them not coverly by way of circumstance as aforetime (when Philip was on foot and things stood doubtfull) but openly in plain terms. Imprimis, That Antiochus must quit and abandon all the Cities of Asia, which belonged at any time either to King Philip or King Ptolemæus, Item, That he meddle not with any free City or State, and especially with those of Greece: but above all, warned he was and forbidden, either to pass over himself, or to send any forces into Europe. After the Kings Embassadors were licensed to depart, all the nations and States had a general session and meeting together, which was the sooner dispatched, for that in the decrees of the ten Delegates all the Cities and States were pronounced by name. Unto the Oretians (a people in Macedonia) for that they revolted first from the Kings, their own lands and privileges were restored. The Magnesians, the Perthebi-ans and Dolopians were likewise declared free. Unto the people of Theſſaly over and above the grant of their liberty, the Phthiotian Achaans were annexed, excepting the City of Thebes in Phthia and Pharsalus. As for the Ætolians who required, that according to covenant Pharsalus and Locris should be rendered unto them, they were put over unto the Senat. But they awarded them the Phoenices and Locrenies, with other appurtenances adjoynd before by verue of the decree. Cosiris, Trophæia, and Hærea (which also is a City of Peloponnesus) were rendered unto the Achaens: Moreover these ten Delegates gave Orenum and Eræria unto Eumenius the son of Atta-rus: but by reason that Quintus granted freedom unto these Cities, together with Carissus, and had been both subject to Philip. It was ordained also, that Antiochus should hold those Cities still, which during the wars he had won from Philip. When the assembly was dissolved, the ten Delegates having divided between themselves their several charges, departed every man to settle the Cities of their particular regions and quarters. P. Lentulus to Beryllæ, L. Stertinius to Hæphæstia, Theſſus, and other Cities of Thracia: P. Villius and L. Terentius toward King Antiochus, and C. Cornelius toward Philip. Unto whom after Cornelius had declared his Commission concerning those smaller matters, and which demanded of him, Whether he could with patience abide to be so onnell not only profitable unto himself, but also necessary? The King made answer again and said, That he would not only give him the hearing, but also yield him thanks besides,

A in case he would deliver ought unto him for his good. Whereupon he perswaded him earnestly, that forasmuch as he had obtained peace already, he should send his Embassadors to Rome, to crave league also and amity: to the end, that if Antiochus began to stir, he might not be thought to have attended and waited for some occasions and opportunities to make war. This conference and communication with Philip was at Tempe in Thessaly. And when he answered, That he would immediately dispatch his Embassadors Cornelius came to Thessaly, where a town Dicæ and attemberly of all Greece is wont to be held upon certain set daies, and thither resort great numbers of people, which meeting is called Pylæum: where he advised the Ætolians especially to persevere constant and faithful in the amity of the people of Rome. Some of the principall Ætolians seemed to complain between whiles, that the Romans were not so well affected to their nation after vi-B glory, as they were in time of the war: but others, more sharply blamed and reproached them, yea, and upbraided them with this, That Philip could not have been vanquished nor the Romans ever able so much as to pass over into Greece, without the help of the Ætolians. Cornelius forbore to make answer again to those points, for fear of farther wrangling and altercation; and promised, that if they sent to Rome they should obtain any thing that was reason. Whereupon by his advice and approbation there were deputed Embassadors. This was the issue and end of the war with Philip.

Whiles these affairs thus passed in Greece, Macedonia, and Asia, all Tis in manner was gone out and risen up in arms by occasion of a conspiracy of bondslaves. First to enquire into the troubles and to repress the same, there was sent M. Atilius Prætor (who had the civil jurisdiction C between Citizens and aliens) with one of the two legions of Roman Citizens. Some of them, who were already assembled together and grown to an head, he overcame in fight: of whom many were slain and many taken prisoners. Others he scourged and round trilled up, hanging them on gibbets, even as many as were the principall and chief of the conspiracy: and others there were whom he sent home again to their Masters.

Now the Consuls were gone into their Provinces. Marcellus so soon as he was entered into the marches of the Boii, and had over-wearied his soldiers with marching all day long, gave him down upon a certain rising of a hill, and there as he was encamping himself and his men, Cora-datus a Prince or great Lord of the Boii, with a mighty power armed and charged him, and flew upon three thousand of his men. In which sudden and tumultuary skirmish, certain brave men D of mark were slain: among whom were T. Scipionius Gracchus, and M. Junius Silvanus two Colonels of the allies: also A. Octavius and P. Lucius two Knight Marshals or Tribunes of the second legion. Howbeit the Romans strongly fortified their tents and defended them valiantly, which the enemies upon their fortunate victory had long assailed to no effect. And in the same standing camp he continued certain daies, whiles he cured his soldiers of their wounds, and recovered their hearts after so great a fright. The Boii (as they are a nation that of all things cannot endure any tedious delay of time) dispersed themselves into their towns and forts. Then Macellus presently crossed the Po and led his army into the territory of Comum, where the Insubrians lay encamped after they had solicited and caused those of Comum to take arms. The legions made no more ado, but gave them battell in the very way: and at the first encounter the enemies E charged them so hotly that they forced the forefront of the battell to give ground. Which when Marcellus perceived, fearing lest being once discovered they should be repulled and discomfited, he made a cohort of Marsians to make head: and at once set forth all the troops of the Latine Cavalry against them. Their first and second charge both, mightily impeached and quailed the enemy, advancing forward lustily and pressing upon them in great fury: whereby the rest of the Roman army taking heart again and being encouraged, at the first received them manfully and made resistance only, but afterwards followed fiercely upon them: inasmuch as the Gauls were able no longer to abide their violence, but turned their backs, took them to their heels, and ran away by heaps. Valerius Antius writeth, that in this battell there were forty thousand men slain and above five hundred and seven military ensignes taken, with 432 chariots: besides many chains F of gold, whereof Claudius presented one (a very massive above the rest and of great weight) unto Jupiter, which was hung up within the Temple in the Capitoll, as he writeth. The same day was the Camp of the Gauls forced and ransacked, and the town of Comum also within few daies taken by assault. Upon this there were eight and twenty boroughs or forts that fell away and revolted to the Consul. But the Historiographers agree not upon this, Whether the Consul led his forces against the Insubrians first, or the Boians: and whether he raised out the discomfited of a former foil and defeat by a fortunate victory in this battell: or contrariwise, after a prosperous fight atachieved before Comum, he blotted and defaced the same with a shameful overthrow received at the Boians hand.

During this variable and alternative fortune, L. Pappus the other Consul, marched into G the Boians Country through the tribe Sappina. And when he was approached near to a Castle called * Antilim, he feared lest he should be enclosed and intercepted by the Boians and Ligirians: whereupon he retired with his forces the same way that he came, and fetching a great company about through the open country in safety and security, he came at length to his Colleague.
 Who having joyed both their powers together, first ranged over the Boians territories, wasting and spoiling until they came as far as * Felina. This Town with other strong burroughs and forts, and in a manner all the Boians yielded themselves, save only their youth, who were them great wrong in taking their own goods from them, and not proceeded in justice to wrest out of their hands their stolen substance: and in great malice and bitterness ceased not to provoke against Annibal the Romans, who were ready enough of themselves to pick some quarrell to him, to seek occasion of hatred, and to find an hole in his coat, Scipio Africanus for a long time gave the deaf ear unto them, and mistook the coultre: for he supposed it was not for the honour and majesty of the people of Rome to subscribe unto those imputations charged upon Annibal, to entertain the spite and hatred of men, and not to be content to have vanquished Annibal in war, unless they also took upon them the persons of accusers, and preferred a slanderous libell & bill of indictment, and iware thereto Billa vera. But at length they wrought and brought about, that Embassadors should be sent to Carthage, who in the Senat there might charge Annibal categorically, with plotting and practising with Antiochus for to wage war against them. And these three were addressed to this Embassie, C. Servilius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Terentius Culles who being arrived there, caused it to be given out to as many as should demand the cause of their coming, (and all by instruction from the adversaries of Annibal) that their errand was to compose and end the debates between Masaniissa King of the Numidians, and the Carthaginians. This was commonly divulged and beleaved for truth. But Annibal found them straight and smelt this juggling, and was not ignorant that he was the only man that the Romans feared, and howsoever peace was granted to the Carthaginians, yet they continued an endless and inexorable war with him alone still. Whereupon he resolved to frame himself to give place to the time and yield unto fortune. And being furnished aforehand with all things requisite to take his flight, when he had of K purpose all the day long shewed himself in the publicke place of assembly very formally, to turn by all suspicion of his intended resolution, so soon as it began to be dark night, in his Citizens gown as he went a day, and attended in the Hall, he gate him forth straight to the City gate, accompanied only with two persons, and thoe not privy at all to his purpose and designment. And having found his hories ready in the place appointed, he mounted and rode apace that night untill he was come to a certain quarter of the territory of Voca: and by the next morning, he passed between Aeyla and Thapsus, and recovered a tower or fort of his own: where he was imbarked in a ship ready rigged and appointed with sail and oar to take sea and away. Thus departed Annibal out of Affrica, lamenting more often the hard hap and calamity of his country, than of his own friends and kinsfolk. And the same day he fell with the Island Cercina: where the Carthaginians found in the rode certain hulks charged with merchandise: and when at his coming ashore out of his ship, there came many running toward him for to salute and welcome him thither, he charged his own company, that if any asked concerning him, they should make answer, That he went upon an Embassage to Tyrus: but fearing lest any of their barks should disanchor that night, and make report at Thapsus or Aeyla that he was seen in Cercina: he caused a boat to be killed for sacrifice, and invited the Masters of the ships and all the Merchants to supper: and therewith commanded all the sails and crosis laid-yards to be had out of the vessels: to make there of a large pavilion, that they might sit in the shade at their supper: for that, as it fell out, it was then midsummer. And as the time and such provision as they had, would give leave, he fet out a feast and banquet: he spared no wine, and continued the merriment far within night. Then Annibal, so soon as he could espy his time for to deceive those that were in the harbor, weighed anchor. The rest were fast asleep: and when the next day they awoke and roused themselves, with their drunken and drouzy nols (and far forth day it was, and late ere they awoke) they were faine to spend some hours in fitting their oars again in their right places, and the tackling of the ships in good order.

In this while, at Carthage the ordinary multitude that used to frequent the house of Annibal, repaired as their manner was to his gate-house: and when it was voiced abroad, that he was not to be found, all the company gathered together in the market place, seeking and enquiring for the principall and chief personage of their City. Some gave out (as the truth was) that he was fled: or they said plainly, that he was murdered and made away through the falsehood and villany of the Romans; and this they sticked not to avouch. There might a man have seen sundry and divers countenances (as it useth commonly in Cities where there is siding and parts-taking) as each one is affected to his own party and faction. At last, news came that he was seen at Cercina. The Roman Embassadors having upon audience given, declared in the Senat of Carthage, that the L. of their Senat had certain intelligence, that both aforetime, King Philip was by Annibal especially solicited and set on to make war with the people of Rome; and also now there hath been letters and messengers with credence sent from him to King Antiochus; and that he would never rest untill he had set all the world together in arms: and therefore if the Carthaginians were desirous to content and satisfie the Romans, they should not suffer these parts of his to escape unpunished: then the Carthaginians made answer, and said, That nothing of all this passed by publicke council or consent or allowance of the State, howbeit they would be willing to do whatsover the Romans thought to be reason.

Annibal this while had a boon voyage, and with a merry gale of wind arrived at Tyrus, where he was received of the Tyrians, the first founders of Carthage, as if he had been in another country of his own: received he was, I say, and entertained with all kind of honour, becoming a man so famous and renowned. After he had sojourned there some few daies, he sailed to Antioch: where

A where understanding that the King himself was already departed from thence, he repaired to his son, and conferred with him, as he was letting out an yearly solemnity of games and plaies near Daphne, and being courteously also by him intreated, he made no stay, but to ship board and Sea again. And at Ephesus overtook the King, whom he found floating and wavering till in his mind, and unreloved what to do as touching the Roman war. But his coming of Annibal was no small point to turn the ballance, and to move him to enter into the enterprise thereof. The Stoils likewise at the same time were estranged and alienated in affection from the Roman league and society, whose Embassadors demanding to have Plaralum and Lecinas again, with other Cities, according to the tenor and form of the first league, the Senat turned over and referred to Quintius.

C T H Law Oppia upon: ded and enacted by C. Oppius a Tribune of the Common, in the time of the Punic war, for the abridging and restraint of the excess in women apparrell, was of so much violence and debate repealed, notwithstanding that Porcius Cato laboured to the contrary that it might not be abolished. This Cato made a voyage into Spain, and by force of arms (beginning first to warre at Empirix) brought the hither province of Spain on this side Iberus to quietness. T. Quintius Flaminius levied war against the Lacedemonians and Nabis their tyrant, in which he fared fortunately, and so prevented at his made an end thereof, granted them peace to his own good liking and pleasure. He delivered Argos, and set it free, which was before in subjection to the tyrant. The Senat then, and before before, beheld the publick games and pastimes by themselves, apart from the people: which to bring about, Scipio, Elus Pectus and L. Cornelius Cethegus the Consuls, set in foot and merced themselves to, to the great indignation and discontentment of the Commons. More colonies were planted with Roman citizens. M. Porcius Cato triumphed over Spain. The wars also which fortunately were achieved against the Boii and the French in Isabre are here recorded. T. Quintius Flaminius, who had vanquished Philip King of the Macedonians and Nabis their tyrant of the Lacedemonians, yet, and freed all Greece from their oppression, for these many and noble exploits, rode in triumph three daies together. The Carthaginian Embassadors brought word, that Annibal who was fled unto Antiochus, banded with him and combined to wage war. Annibal had besides assisted by means of one Antioch a Tyrian (sent as a courier with credence only and no letters, to Carthage) for to move and sollicit the Carthaginians to rebellion.

The four and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

Between the troublesome cares of great wars which either were not fully ended, or at hand ready to begin, there happened an occasion, which in itself being but a small matter to speak of, and of little regard: considering the times and parts-taking about it, grew to a mighty head and contention in the end. M. Fundanius and L. Valerius Tribunes of the Commons, preferred a bill unto the people touching the abrogation of the Law Oppia. For C. Oppius a former time when the Punic war was at the hottest, and while L. Fabius and T. Sempronius were Consuls had promulged a Statute, by virtue whereof, No woman of what degree soever might either have in Ornaments and Jewels above half an ounce weight of gold, nor wear any habiliments wrought of undry colours, nor yet ride in Coach within the City of Rome, or any other Town nor neerer than a mile from thence, unless it were upon occasion of some solemn feast or publick sacrifice. Now M. Junius Brutus, and P. Junius Brutus, both Tribunes likewise of the Commons stood in defence and maintenance of the said Law Oppia, and affirmed plainly they would not suffer it to be annulled. Many a nobleman was seen in this quarrel: some spoke for the Law, and others gave aid it. The Capitol was full of people, either taking part and favouring the cause, or else opposing themselves, and urging the contrary. The very dames of the City themselves could neither by perswasion and advice, nor by any reverent and womanly regard, nor yet by the exprest and absolute commandment of their husbands be kept within doors; but do what they could, they bespread all the streets of the City, beiter and kept all the waies into the common place, beseeching and entreating their husbands as they passed by and went down thither to permit and give their consent. That seeing the good estate of the Common-wealth now flourished, and the private wealth of every man increased daily, their wives also and mistresses might be allowed to have their ancient ornaments and gay attire again. The number of these women grew every day more then other for now they flocked also out of the Towns, Villages, and other places of resort in the country and shewed themselves at Rome. In so much as they took heart at length, and were so bold as to encounter the Consuls, the Pretors, and other Magistrates, requesting and be-beseeching their favour, to stand with them, and forward the cause. But as for one of the Consuls, Marcus Porcius Cato by name, they could not with all their prayers entreat him to incline unto their suit: who in the maintenance of the said law, and that it might not be revoked, spake in the frequent assembly of the people to this effect. "My Masters and citizens of Rome, If every one of us had fully resolved and purposed with himself to hold his own, and keep the rightful authority and preeminence that he hath over his own wife, less ado and trouble we should have had with them all together at this day. Now having given them the lead at home for much, that the curiuses and threwheds of women hath conquered our liberty and freedom there; behold, here also in publick place it is troden down and trampled underfoot: and because we were not able every man to rule his own in several, now we stand in fear and dread of them all in general. Certainly, I my self thought ever until now, that it was but a feined tale and devised tale that went of a certain Island, wherein by a conspiracy of women, all the men were murdered every one, and that sex utterly made away and rooted out. But well I see now, be they creatures never so weak, so filly and feeble, let them once have their meetings, their conventicles and secret conferences, they will work mischief in the highest degree, and be as dangerous as any other. And surely for mine own part, I cannot resolve in mine own conscience and determine, whether of the twain be worse; the thing I mean in it self, or the precedent example and consequence thereof, considering the manner how it is handled. Of which two, the one toucheth us that are Consuls and the rest of the magistrates the other concerneth you rather my masters and citizens of Rome. As for the matter in question, and proposed unto you, whether it be good and expedient for the weal-publick or no, that relecth in you to determine and judge, who are to give your voices and suffrages. But this seditious insurrection here, of women, be it of themselves, or procured by your motion and instigation, As Furdinus and L. Valerius, no doubt it argueth and implieth a great default in the Magistrates, and I wot not whether it will be a fouler blot and dishonour to you that are Tribunes, than to us Consuls. Yours will the blame be if ye have brought women now to raise and stir up tribunitious seditions; and ours the blame if we needs must admit and accept of laws, whether we will or no, for fear of a commotion and separation of our women, as sometimes we were forced to do by the departure and insurrection of our Commons; I assure you for mine own self, when I passed erewhile into this common-place through the press and throng of these women, I was abashed & could not chuse but blush. And had I not been more respective of the reputation, the honour and reverence of some in particular, than of them all, together, because it should not be thought & said, that they had been checked and taken up by the Consul, I would have laid unto them, What new fashion is this good wives, to run gadding abroad into the open streets, to beset the passages, and to affront ye, and hang upon other womens husbands as ye do? What? could ye not every one at home have dealt with your own good men in the caule, and craved their help? or can ye speak fair and flatter better, can ye be more pleasant and affable abroad in the Town, than within your houses? or make love to other men, rather then to your own husbands? And yet to speak uprightly, if wives were of that modestly and womanly carriage, as to keep themselves within the compais and bounds of their own liberty, and pais no further: it were not befitting you I wot so much as at home to trouble your selves about our laws here, nor to busy your brains, to know either what new Statutes passed, or what old were called. Our ancestors in old time would not, that women in any wise should dispose so much as of their own privat matters without the advice and direction of a Governor and Overseer: and therefore in great wisdom they ordained, that they should be ordered and ruled by their parents, by their brethren, by their husbands, but we (and God will) can abide them to intermeddle in state-matters, to govern the weal-publick, to converse with us in the common place, in publick assemblies and courts of parliament. For what else do they now in the streets in the crows waies & at all I avenues, but, some of them give their voices that the bills of the Tribuns may pais and others advise and be of opinion, that the law Oppia may be repealed? Let this outrageous & unreasonable nature of theirs have the head; let these unruly creatures and untamed animals have their will and bridle them notseethen how of themselves they will keep a mean and measure in their licentiousnes, unless you curb them & hold them in. Tush, this is the least matter of all that displeaseth these women: there are a 1000 things besides that they think hardly of, and are discontented to be held unto by old customs and positive laws. Liberty in all things may to speak more truly, a loose and dissolute licentiousnes, is the very thing they long after and desire. For go they away cleer with this once, what is it that they will not attempt and give the venture for? Do but run through and count the laws provided in this behalf for women, whereby our fore-fathers and predecessors have kept down and restrained their disorderly appetites, and with which they have sought to subject them to their husbands: yet, hardly can ye with the help of them all, keep them in awe and tied fast, but this and that and other thing to it: if I say ye let them wrest from you one thing after another, until at length they be check-mates with their husbands, think ye that ever you shall be able to support and endure them? Begin they once to be equals they will soon be superiours make them your fellows, and straight-ways they will busy your matters. But, alas, we lay too hardly to their charge. The thing that they stand upon is no more but this. That no new Act and statute pais against them: for no equal and reasonable thing do they refuse: their desire and prayer is only that

A "that they might not be wronged. No, no, it is clean contrary: That law which ye have received and admitted, that which by your suffrages you first granted, that which by the practice and experience of so many years you have allowed and approved they would have you to revoke and abolish: which is as much to say, as by annulling that one to infringe, upraise, and diminish the authority and virtue of the rest. No law is there so well devised that is good and commodious, and agreeable unto all. This only is intended principally to be considered, that it may be profitable to the most part, and serve in general. For it as each person find, and in a set prejudicial, hurtful, and offensive to himself, he may be allowed by and by to undo and deminish the same to what end should all the people assemble together to the making of those statutes which they anon against whom they were enacted may abolish & overthrow? But gady woud I know the great occasion and cause, for which our dames in such trouble and upore run out into the streets and have much ado to forbear the common place, and to mount up to the scaffold to make an oration to this audience? Is it for this to redeem out of the hands of Achilles their fathers, their husbands, their children and brethren, whom he keepeth prisoners? Nay, that calamity is far enough off at this day, and far may it ever be I pray God from our City and Common-weal. And yet when the time was of that hard fortune and calamity you wot did not hearken to their piteous and kind prayers in that behalf. But it may well be, that it is not the natural love and kind affection, nor careful regard of their dear friends, but meer touch of conscience, and conscience of religion that hath brought them thus together in a congregation. And ready they are it may be, to receive and entertain dame Cybele or Idaea, coming from Pessinus out of Phrygia. What honest colour and shew, so much as in word only can be pretended to bear out and cover this mutinous edition of women? May this (say they) that they may glitter in our golden jewels, and shine in purple robes to be seen a far off: that as well on work days as holy-days, we may be let up and ride in our coaches and chariots through the City as it were in triumph, for the conquest and victory of a law by us repealed and dismantled: for winning from you and wringing out of your hands, manage your beards, the liberty of your voices and suffrages: to the end that we might not be blunted and gaged in our excessive expenses, in our disolute promiscuous vanities and superfluities. Many a time ye have heard me complain of the wastall and sumptuous bravery of women: and as often have you known me to incite against the lavish spending of men, not privat persons only, but magistrates also in higher place, and how this City of ours is sick as it were at one time of two contrary diseases and maladies, to wit pinching avarice, and superfluous prodigality, two plagues I say, that have been the bane and overthrow of all great monarchies and flourishing empires. These pestilent mischiefs I dread so much the more, as our state and common-weal encreaseth to the better growth wealthy every day more than others: and as our dominion extendeth still farther and farther. And now that we are gotten over into Greece and Asia, provinces full of all enticing pleasures and alluring delights of the world, now that we are come to finger and handle the rich treasures of mighty Monarchs, I fear me that even these things have rather captivated us than we them. The goodly images, statues and pictures that came from Syria: Isis and Antiope (trust me truly) dangerous to this City, and threaten no less than so many enigms of the field displayed against it. And I hear say already, that there are many, and E too too many, that praise and have in admiration the beautiful ornaments of Carinus & Albinus, and begin to make a scorn and game of the images of the Roman Gods made of potters earth, only laughing much at them, where they see them standing forth of the walls. Well, for my part I had rather have these gods so propice and favorable to us as they be than such as those and so I hope they will ever be, if we can suffer them to abide still in their usual shrines and places accustomed. No longer ago than in our fathers days, King Pyrrhus sent his Embassador Cyprius of purpose, and assailed by rich and goodly gifts, to tempt the minds not only of our men, but also of our women. There was no law Oppia as then in force to bridle and keep down the colly pomp and bravery of women: and yet not one of them all received ought at his hands, And what think ye was the cause? even the same and no other, for which our ancestors in times past, never to much as thought upon the providing of any such law. There was no pride then, nor riotousness, nor perfluity to refrain. And like as the skill and knowledge of diseases, must precede and go before their cures and remedies: even so evil desires and enormous lusts had need to bud forth & spring before the laws, which should repress and cut them down. What caused the law Licinia to be made, concerning 500 acres of ground, forbidding that no man should possess above, but the exceeding covetousnes of men, encroaching still and laying land to land? What brought in the law Cincia as touching gifts and presents, but this that the Commons began already to be vassals as it were and tributaries to the Senat. No marvel therefore it is, nor strange may it seem, that neither the law Oppia, nor any other providing for the cutting off the unmeasurable expenses of women, was required and thought needful in those daies when gold, when purple, were tendered and offered unto them was refused. If now at this day Cyprius were come, and went with such gifts round about in the City, he should find receivers enough of women standing in every street ready for him. And verily, with all the wit I have, I can not devise what the cause and reason should be of many lustful desires and appetites that reign in this age. For say that if one of you were kept short and debared of that which another might lawfully have: peradventure there might rise in your hearts (through infirmity) some shame and abashment in nature, or else discontent and discontentment in reason: so being all as ye are brought within one compais of nature

"niture and apparel, and no odds at all between you, what need any one of you to fear, lest she "should be looked into, marked or observed, more than another, I must needs say, the shame that "followeth & attendeth either upon nigardie or poverty is worse of all others: but the law quit-
 "teth and freeeth you both, when you want but that only which by law yemay not have, and
 "no man will reproach you therefore. Yes many quoth some rich and wealthy dame, this same e"quality and no distinction at all among us of all things I cannot abide: Why may not I according "to my calling, be seen arrayed in purple, and adorned with gold? And why is not the poor estate "of others known, but lieth hidden under this pretext & cloak of a law: so as they may be thought
 "yet (were it not for the law) that such and such things they would have: where as indeed they "are not able to maintain and bear it out? Would ye (in faith) my masters and citizens of Rome, "have your wives to strive thus, that the richer fort might deserve to have that, which no other I "can reach unto: and the poor again, because by that means they would not be deprieved, over-
 "strein themselves to go above their calling and ability? Certainly I dare avow, if they begin once "to shame at that which is not shame-worthy, they will not abash at any thing, be it never so "shameful. Have it the will out of her own, so long as it lasteth: and when all is gone, to her hus"bands purse she will go, Alas poor man and wo begun is that husband, as well he that is intrea-
 "ted by his wife, to stretch his purse strings, as he that is not, when he shall see another man to give "her that, which he would not allow himself. And even now ye see how openly in the street (un"der shame-faced as they be) they are in hand with other womens husbands, yea, & that which more
 "is, they keep an intreating for to call the law & for the favour of their voices only. For of some
 "they have got the good will no doubt already, whilst themselves will not be intreated, but draw "misery upon thee, upon thy state, and upon thy children. Well, at the law once came to let down
 "a gage and proportion of thy wives expenses, and never think to have remedy, and to stay the "same of thy self with all thou canst do, Be not deceived thus, to think that the world will be ever "again at the same pals, as it was before this law took place. And as it is a safer course and lesse "dangerous to let a naughty and obdinate person alone, than he be not called into question at all:
 "than after he is once accused to suffer him to be quit and go away unpunished: even so this ex"cessive superfluity, would have been more tolerable, if it had not been meddled & tempered with"al, than it will be now upon the very binding, and curbing thereof: much like a wild and savage "beast, let loose after it hath been tamed up some time, and so made more fell and angry. To conclude
 "therefore of this opinion am I, that of no hand the law Oppia be repealed: and so I pray all the "Gods to vouchsafe for to bless and turn to good, whatsoever you do or go about. When he had
 "thus said, those Tribunes also of the Commons, who openly promised and protested to oppose "themselves, and to cross the passing of the law, made some brief speeches to the same effect.
 "Then Lucius Valerius rose up to maintain the bill by him proposed for the revoking of that law, and "spoke as followeth. If private men stepped forth and advanced forward either to approve "and perfwade, or to reject & disswade, that which by us is proposed, I my self also without open"ing my mouth would have attended your will & expected the delivery of your suffrages, as think"ing it had been sufficiently debated and discussed already, whatsoever might be said for both "parties. But now sith that the Consul M. Porcius Cato a man of great reputation & gravity, not "only by his countenance and authority, (with all alone without any word at all spoken had been "important enough & effectual) but also in a long premeditated Oracion framed with much study
 "and forethinking, hath impugned and inveighed against our proposed ordinance, I must of ne"cessity answer him again as briefly as I can, who nevertheless hath spent more words in repro-
 "ving and chastising the matrons & dames of the City, than he hath bestowed reason to the pur"pose in disswading our new law: & all verily for this intent, that he might leave it doubtful, whe"ther the women had done that which he blamed them for, as induced by their own motives, or "seduced by us and our suggestions. As for me the protection directly of the cause I will take in "hand, and not busy and trouble my head in defence of our persons, against whom the Consul "hath rather glanced and girded at, by way of big words, than charged indeed by found reasons.
 "It hath pleased him to call this, An assembly and mutinous meeting: yea, and otherwiles he ter-
 "meth it, An insurrection and secession of women: as if the wives in open place intreated you
 "to repeal that law, now in time of peace, in the flourishing and blessed state of the Common"weal, which during those troublsome daies of war, had been enacted against them. I wot full "well that both these words and other beides are very significant, sought out, and picked for the "purpose, to enforce and aggravate the matter. And we all know, that M. Cato is an Orator not "only grave and earnest, but otherwiles also of a bold, art, and bitter how ever otherwise by natural "disposition he be of a mild spirit and courteous enough. But to the point. What new & strange "thing is this that our wives have done, in coming abroad and assembling themselves in compa"nies, about a matter that so much concerneth and importeth themselves? What were they ne"ver before now, abroad in open street? I will take the pains, Cato to turn over your own "book of Originals against your self. Listen and mark how often they have done the flemblable, "and likewise only for the common good and benefit of the State. And first and foremost, in the "very beginning and infancy of this City, even in the reign of C. Romulus, when the Capitol was "taken and held by the Sabines: when in the midst of the Common peace, they were ranged in bar"rel array and ready to fight a bloody field, was not the quarrel ended and the conflict stayed by "the dames and wives that ran in, & put themselves between the two armies? After the KK, were "driven

The Oracion
 of L. Valerius against the law Oppia.

A "driven out and expelled, What hapned tho? When as the legions of the Volscians under the con"duct of C. Martius incamped within 5 miles of Rome, were they not the matrons of the City that "turned back this army, which doubtless would have forced our City & put it to ransack? And "is not this likewise true, that when the Gauls were possessed of Rome and masters thereof, the "dames of the City and none but they, even by the consent of all men, came forth into the open "streets, made a contribution, and aid down that gold which paid for the ransom and redempti"on of the City? No longer time than in the last Punick war (because I will not stand so much "upon antiquities) was it not thus, that not only when the City was at a fault for money, the "widows stocks supplied the want of the common treasure? but also at what time as we were "driven to seek for new Gods, and to send for them afar off to succour us in our extremities; all
 "the wives & matrons of the City went to the Sea side forth to receive the goddess Mother Idea?
 "The occasions, qd, he) are different, and the case is not alike. Neither is it my purpose or any "part of my meaning to compare causes, and to prove they are all one. This only I stand upon, and "take it sufficient to excuse and clear the women, for bringing up no strange novelty, in that they "showed themselves in open place, To proceed therefore: seeing that no man made any wonder
 "then, of that which women did in undertaking the affairs that concerned all alike as well men
 "as women: marvel we now that they do the flemblable, in a cause that properly and peculiarly "pertaineth to themselves? And what great thing was it they did? Now in good faith we are too
 "coy and squeamish of our hearings, and our ears over nice and delicate, if when matrons diddian
 "not to hear the prayers of their servants and slaves, we com to give ear to the requests of ladies "and dames of honor. But now I come to the matter in question, in regard whereof the Consul
 "his Oracion consisted in two points. For first, he took it very ill that any law at all once enacted
 "should be revoked: and secondly, he stood upon this that above all others the law devised and "made for repressing the superfluous ornaments and attire of women should remain in force for "ever. So it should seem, that the first part (a common defence as it were, of all the laws) was a "speech befitting the place and person of a Consul: but the other against the exceeding pomp of "women, more properly became a man (as himself) of most severe life and precise carriage. And "therefore it is great doubt and to be feared, lest we should seduce you into some error, if we "lay not down and shew plainly the vanity and defect both in the one and in the other. For as I
 "confeis, that of those laws which are devised and established not for a time, and by occasion of "D some particular occurrence, but for ever and to the perpetual good of a City, none ought to be "abolished: unless it be so that by use and experience the same be checked and found hurtful, or
 "by some change of the State become needless and superfluous: so I see evidently that those sta"tutes and ordinances which are brought in to fit and serve some seasons, are mortal (if I may so "say) and mutable with the times. And oftentimes we see that was disclaimeth those laws which
 "peace proclaimeth: and peace pulleth down that which war set up: like as in the government "and rule of a ship, one thing is requisite in fair weather and calm Sea, another in foul and trouble"some tempests. These things thus being in nature divers and distinct, let us consider I pray you,
 "of whether fort is this law that now we are in hand to revoke. What? Is it one of the ancient "and royal laws made by the Kings, and equal in time with the foundation of our City? or (that
 "E which is the next in time and authority) was it set down and written in the twelve Tables by "the Decemvirs, created of purpose to devise and make laws? Is it of that nature without the
 "which as our ancestors were of opinion, that the honesty and honour of matrons could not "be preferred: so we are to fear likewise left by the repealing thereof, we overthrow the mode"sty, chastity, and integrity of married women? Why? who knoweth not that this is a new law "of 20 years standing and continuance and no more, made whilst Q. Fabius and T. Sempronius
 "were Consuls? And seeing that without it wives lived for many years before in good name and "fame, and in passing good order: tell me what danger can ensue, and why we need to fear lest if "it be annulled, they should break out to all looseness and disorder. May it this law had been made
 "at first, to gage the wantonness of women, believe them then it were greatly to be doubted, that
 "F the putting down thereof would stir them up again to their former outrage. But to what end
 "it was devised, the time it felt is able to shew and testify. Annibal being in Italy, had won a vi"ctory at Canoa: he was now master of Tarentum, Lord of Arpi, and possessed of Capua: every "hour, he looked when he would march forward and advance his conquests against Rome: our al"lies were revolted and gone: soldiers we had no more of our own to supply and make up the "decayed bands: no mariners and Sea servants could we find for the maintenance of our Arma-
 "do: all our treasure in the City Chamber was spent and consumed. Driven we were to this "extreme, as to take up bondslaves for to serve in wars, and to buy them of their masters for day, "yea, and to make payment of their price after the war was ended. For want of money also the "Publicans and Patrons of our domain and publick profits, undertook to serve the army with
 "G corn, and to furnish us with all things needful for war at a certain price, and gave us the like day "and time of payment. The Gallies slaves that served at the oar we found and maintained with "our own proper and private charges: and a rate and proportion was set down according to "our revenues and worth in the subsidy book, what number every one should be charged with.
 "All the gold and silver that we had in private we brought forth in common, and the Senators "themselves led the way first, and gave good example. The widows and orphan Children "brought in their stocks of money to the City Chamber. Straight order was given, that "N n n 3 "we

"we should not have in our houses either of gold or silver, wrought in plate or otherwise above H
 "so much, nor of silver and brass in coin and current money beyond a certain proportion limited.
 "At such a time, our dames (belike) were set all upon their braveries, pruning, trimming, and "tricking themselves, in such sort, as the law Oppia must needs be devised, there was no other "remedy to keep down their excessive pride and superfluous expence in their attire and ornaments:
 "even then, I say, when by occasion that the solemn feast and sacrifice of Ceres was then
 "continued, by reason of the general mourning and heavy cheer of all the wives of the City, the "Senat was fain to take order, that they should finish and end their sorrowful mourning within "thirty dayes. Who is so blind that seeth not, how in regard only of the poverty and extreame "calamity of the City, and because all the monies of private persons should be converted into a
 "common stock, and for a publick use, this law was first framed, drawn, and let down, so long I "only to stand in strength and vertue, as the cause of penning and writing it should endure;
 "continue? For otherwise, if those acts and decrees of the Senat, if those orders and ordinances
 "of the Commons, respective unto that present time, should be in force, and observed for ever;
 "Why make we payment of the loan money unto private men? Why do we set and to ferm let "our commodities, our customs and revenues of the City, unto farmers for ready rent? Why put
 "we forth our publick works for present money paid down upon the nail? Wherefore buy we "not slaves to serve in our wars? Lastly, why are we not put to find mariners and oarsmen, at our "own private charges, as then we did? All other estates and degrees, all men else, of what calling
 "soever, feel a great change in the state of the City, from woe to weal, from adversity to prosperi"ty; and shall our wives only miss the good thereof, and not once tast nor enjoy the fruits of K
 "peace, and publick repose and tranquillity? Shall we that are men be in purple and scarlet? Shall "we wear our embroidered gowns and robes when we are Magistrates? Shall we put on our rich
 "anyces and copes, when we exercise the function and ministry of the high Priests? Shall our "children go in their sild garments, puffed above with purple? Shall we permit and privilege the "head Officers and Magistrates in our Colonies and Burrough Towns? nay, shall we suffer here at "Rome the Masters and Countables of every parish, the meanest and basest officers of all other to "wear embroidered gowns, & studded with purple? and not only so, for to grace and redit them"selves, with these goodly ornaments and badges of worship and honour during their life, but al"so to after their death, the same to be burned and buried with them? And shall we debar and for"bid our women only to use purple and scarlet in their apparel? And when you the husband may L "have purple and scarlet, carpers, counter-points, and foot-cloths, what reason is there to deny "your wife the mistress of the house a gown or mantle of the same? And shall your horse be trap"ped and barbed more richly, and better let out with his caparison, than your wife arrayed in her "apparel? But in truth, for purple and scarlet, which are the worst for the wearing, and waxeth
 "bare, men think I see some reason, such as it is (although it be very hard) of sparing and restraint:
 "many for gold wherein little or nothing is lost but the fashion and workmanship, what niggard-
 "die, what misery is this to make spare of it, and to deny it them? Nay, I dare avow and abide by
 "it: there is great benefit and use thereof in time of extremity; and it may help at a pinch both in "publick affairs, and in private occasions, as ye have found by good experience. But Cato said
 "moreover, There would be no emulation and envy between this good wife and that, if neither
 "one nor other were allowed that liberty of apparel and ornaments. True it is, but instead thereof
 "of they all are mightily discontented and grieved at the heart in the mean while, disdaining to "see the wives of our allies of the Latine name and Nation, permitted to wear those ornaments
 "which they are forbidden to have, to see them, I say, all gorgeously set out with pangles and "jewels of gold, clad in their purple and scarlet cloths riding in their coaches all over their cities, "whiles they at Rome take pains to go afoot on their ten toes, as if the State of the Empire were "seated in their Towns, and not in this their own City of Rome. This indignity were enough to "wound the hearts of men, and make them b'ried: what hurt doth it then, think you, to silylly wo"men, whom small matters, God wot, are wont to trouble? Alas poor souls, no magistracy and "place of government in State, no sacerdotal dignities in the Church, no triumphs no ornaments
 "and titles of honour, are they capable of, no gifts, no spoils and prizes gotten in wars, can fall to "their shares. Neatness and fineness gay garments trim attire and gorgeous habiliments, of it "honour and ornaments of women: in it they take delight, on it they set their hearts, of it they "make their joy. And therefore well have our ancestors called all furniture for the decking of "women Mundus Muliebris. [What lay they off in time of sorrow and mourning, but their gold "and purple? what put they on and resume again, when their mourning is past, but their gold and "purple? what hang they on them besides in time of publick joy and solemn processions, but their "better apparel, their richest attire & most costly ornaments? But peradventure, after ye have once "repealed the law Oppia, it will not be in your power to over-rule them, if haply you should for"bid them to wear any thing that now the law restraineth them of. And perhaps some shall have "more ado with their daughters, their wives, and sisters, and find them less tractable and pliable
 "unto their minds than now they are. Never fear that: women cannot shake off their obedience,
 "so long as their Governors (be they fathers, husbands, or brethren) are alive; nay, of all other "things they abhor and cannot brook to be at their own liberty, when it cometh by the death of "their husbands: or parents: Widows (sate and Orphans) life, they may not abide. Be sure there"fore, they had rather have their ornaments and attire to be at the disposition of your selves, than

A "of the law. And therefore, to speak a truth, you must in equity and reason protect and defend "them in kindness, and not oppress them with hardships and bondage: delight ye must to be good "their fathers and husbands, rather than their Lords and Masters, it pleased the Capitol to send "to give them hard words and odious terms, calling this their meeting, A mutiny of women, and "a very insurrection and departure of theirs: and danger there is no doubt, but being up on city
 "will seize upon the mount Sacer, as sometimes the Commons did in their furious anger, or else "possess themselves of the Aventine, and there encamp and keep an hold. Well, this weak and "feeble sex, born to bear, must suffer and endure whatsoever ye shall ordain and set down against "them. But take this withal at the loole for a final conclusion that the greater power and authori"ty ye have over them, the more discretion and moderation ye ought to use in that sovereignty B "of yours. After debate of words passed in this wise, in favor and disfavor of the law, the day fol"lowing the women flocked in greater multitudes into the open streets, and banding themselves
 "together, as it were, in one troop, they beset the dores and houses of the Bruni, who by interposing "themselves, had hindered and crossed the bill preferred by their fellow Tribunes: and never gave they "over to keep this stir, until those Tribunes flaked in their opposition, for to inhibit the same. Which "done, there was no doubt then, but all the tribes with one voice would abrogate and abolish "that law. This twenty year after the enacting thereof, it was repealed and annulled.
 "M. Porcius Cato after the abrogation of the law Oppia, presently departed with a fleet of five "and twenty Gallies, whereof five were let out by Allies, and arrived in the Port of Livorno, to "which place he commanded his forces to assemble; and after by virtue of an edict sent out along C "the Sea coast, he had gathered together vessels of all sorts as he looked from Livorno: and proclaimed
 "that they should all follow after him to the Port of Pyreneus, from whence he purposed to set "forth against the enemy, with an Armado of many sail, and well appointed. Who having passed "before the mountains of Liguria and the gulf of Gaul, arrived and met all together, at the day "and place appointed. From thence they came against Rhodus, where they expelled the Spanish "garrison that held the fortres. From Rhodus with a good gale of wind, they sailed to Emporia.
 "Where, all the whole army, excepting the mariners, were let a land. At the same time Emporia "were two Towns, separate one from the other by a wall. The one of them was inhabited by "Greeks, who came from Phocaea, from whence the Massilians also are descended: the other was "possessed by Spaniards. But the Greeks Town lieth out into the Sea, so as the whole compass D "of the wall is not half a mile about: but the Spanish Town lieth further into the Land, and divided "from the Sea, is defended with a wall three miles in circuit. A third sort of Roman inhabitants "were joyned unto them by Cesar, the Emperor of famous memory, after he had vanquished "Pompey's children. And at this day, they are confused and mingled one with another, and become "one entire body, by reason that first the Spaniards, and afterwards the Greeks, were made free-"denizens of the City of Rome. A man might well marvel seeing, how open they lie of the one side to "the main Sea, how exposed they are on the other side to the danger of the Spaniards, Nation so "fierce and warlike, what thing it was that guarded and protected them: Discipline it was and good "government, and nothing else, which maintained and preserved them in that weakness of theirs;
 "discipline I say, which is ever best maintained of them, who live in fear of the mightier that are E "round about them. One quarter of the wall looking to the fields, is passing strong and exceeding "well fortified, having but one gate in all that side; which ordinarily is always guarded by one of "the Magistrates. In the night, one third part usually of the citizens kept watch upon the walls. And "this watch they maintained not for custome and fashion nor by virtue of any law: but they per"formed it with as great care, yea, and went the round and law to the sentinels with as much dili"gence, as if the enemies were hard at gates. A Spaniard came not within the City: neither went "they forth themselves, unless it were upon just occasion. But on the Sea side the issue was open for "any man at his pleasure. By that gate which turneth toward the Spanish Town they never used to "go forth but in great number even a third part of the Townsmen, and those who the night "before had watched upon the walls. And this came to induce them to go abroad, for that the Spa"niards being no men at Sea gladly would traffic and trade with them: willingly buying of them
 "their strange merchandise from foreign parts brought in by ships: and venting unto them again "their Land commodities and fruits arising of the main. The desire of this mutual commerce and "necessary intercourse was the cause, that the Spanish Town was open to the Greeks. And in greater "safety and security they were also, by reason that they were shadowed under the wing of the "Roman amity, which they intreated with as great loyalty as the Massilians although they were "nothing so mighty and puissant. And even at this time they received the Consul and his army
 "with great countenance and liberality. Cato sojourned there some few dayes while he was adverted
 "by his siegels where his enemies abode, and what their forces were: and because he would not be "idle whiles he layed there, he bestowed all that time in training and exercising his soldiers. It "happened to be that season of the year, when the Spaniards had their corn within their granges ready "for the thrashing floor, whereupon he forbade the corn-purveyors to provide grain, and sent "them home to Rome. With faith he shall feed and maintain it self, being departed from Emporia, "he waited and burnt the territory of the enemies, forced them to run away in every place where he "came, and put them in exceeding flight.
 "At the same time, as M. Helvius departed out of the farther Province of Spain, with 6000
 "garrison soldiers delivered unto him by the Pretor, he was encountered by a great army of the Celiberians, before the Town Illurgum. Valerius writeth, that they were 20000 strong: that 12000 of them were slain, the Town Illurgum won again, and all above 14 years of age put to the sword. From thence Helvius marched to the camp of Cato: and because the country was clear from enemies, he sent back the garrison into the nether Spain, and took his journey to Rome, where he entered the City Ovunt in petty triumph, for the happy success achieved in his affairs. He brought into the treasury, of silver in bullion or Ingots, 14732 pound weight: of silver coin 17023 bigate peeces: and of Olfane silver 120338 pound weight. The cause why the Senat denied him full triumph, was this, for that he warred under the conduct and name of another, and not in his own province. But it was two years before he returned, by reason that the year between he has layed there, lying sick of a long and grievous discase, and put over his government to Qu. Minutius his successor. Whereupon Helvius likewise entered the City of Rome in that manner of triumph, two months only before his successor Qu. Minutius triumphed. He likewise brought into the Chamber of the City 34800 pound weight of silver in mals: of bigats in coin 78000: of Olfane silver 278000 pound.

All this while the Consul lay encamped in Spain not far from Emporia. Thither repaired unto him from Bilfagesa a Prince of the Ilergets, three Embassadors, whereof his son was one: complaining that their forts were assailed by force of arms, and they had no other hope to make resistance, unless they might have a guard of Roman souldiers to defend them, 5000 lay they will be sufficient: for never would the enemies abide by it if such a power came against them. The Consul answered them and said, that he had a feeling and compassion of the peril or fear (whether it was) wherein they stood: howbeit, he was not at that time furnished with such forces, that he might safely spare so many out of his main army, thereby to diminish the same and to impair his strength, considering a mighty host of his enemies was not far off, with whom he looked every day, and he knew not how soon, to joyne battail in open field with banner displayed. The Embassadors hearing this, fell down prostrate at the Consuls feet, and shed tears, humbly beseeching him not to forsake them in this piteous plight. "For whither (say they) shall we go? we be repulsed from the Romans? No allies we have besides, nor other hope in all the world. This danger we might have avoided well enough if we would have been false and disloyal: if we would have banded and rebelled with other Spaniards: but no menaces, no terrors presented unto us, could drive us to renounce our fealty, hoping always that we should have help and succour enough from the Romans: but now if no help, if no relief come from thence; if we be denied at the Consuls hand: heaven and earth we call to witness, that we must be forced, full against our wills, and upon more necessity to revolt from the Romans, for fear we drink of the same cup that the Saguntins have done afore us: and choose we will to die with the rest of the Spaniards for company, rather than perish alone by our selves. So for that day they were dismissed without other answer. But all the night following, the Consul was much distracted in mind, and careful in both respects. Unwilling he was to, set off his allies and see them destitute; and as unwilling again to break his army: considering that in so doing, he might either delay the opportunity of giving battail, or endanger himself in the very instant of conflict. But at length he resolved in no wise to diminish his own forces: doubting lest in the mean while he should receive some dishonor at the enemies hand. As for his associates, he thought it best to intertain them with good hopes, for want of better helps; considering that oftentimes and especially in war, outward semblances and vain shews, are held and taken for truth and substance, and serve the turn well enough: and when a man is thoroughly perswaded that he hath aid and succour, the very trust and confidence thereof hath ministered heart to give the venture of some exploit and preserved him as well as the thing itself. The next morning he delivered this answer unto the Embassadors. That albeit he feared to abate his own strength, in serving other mens turn with any part of his forces, yet he had at this present more regard of their occasions and dangerous estate than of his own. Whereupon he gave commandment, that a third part of all his bands and companies should have warning to take and dresse viands with all speed, for to bellow and lay in the ships: and straightly he charged, that they should be rigged and ready appointed against the third day: and willed withal, two of the Embassadors to report so much to Bilfagesa and the Ilergets. As for the young Prince his son, he detained still with him, used him graciously, and bestowed labours and rich gifts upon him bounteously. The Embassadors took not their leave nor departed, before they saw the souldiers embarked: and thus by making relation hereof as a thing assured and past all peradventure, they filled the heads not of their own friends only, but also of the enemies, with the bruit of Roman aids coming neer at hand. The Consul now, when he had let this countenance of the matter, and made sufficient semblance to serve his purpose, gave order that the souldiers should be disbarked again & set a land: and himself seeing now that the time of the year approached commodious for action and execution of martial affairs (dislodged and removed his standing winter camp within a mile of Emporia. From whence (as any occasions and opportunities were preferred) he led forth his souldiers a foraging and plundering into the enemies land, sometime one way and sometime another, leaving always a competent guard to defend the camp. Ordinarily their manner was to steal out by night, to the intent that both they might go on still farther from their leaguer, & also surprise the enemies at unawares and unprovided: by which means not only his new & raw souldiers were exercised, but also many of his enemies were caught up and came forth home: whereupon they durst no more peep out of their forts & holds of defence. Now after he had made sufficient

A proof of the hearts as well of his own men as of his enemies, he commanded all the Marshals, Colonels, Horsemen, and Centurions, to assemble before him: and unto them he made this speech, "The time (quoth he) is now come, that you to often have wished for: in which you may shew at full you: vertue and valour. Your service hitherto hath been more like the manner of foragers than warriors: but now shall ye come to a main battail, and as enemies, fight hand to hand with protected enemies. From henceforth you may if you will, not wait their needs only, and spoil their territory, but ransack the pillage of rich and wealthy cities. Our fathers before us and our ancestors in times past, when as in Spain there were both Generals and armies of Carthaginians, having themselves no leaders and commanders, no souldiers and forces there, yet would they needs have this attitude among others capitulated in the accord and composition with the Spaniards. That the River of Iberus should limit their Seigniorie and dominion. Now at this day, when two Pretors and a Consul, when three entire Roman armies have the government and charge of Spain; now, I say, after ten years space almost, wherein no Carthaginians have set foot and been seen in all these quarters of both provinces, we have clost our seigniorie on this side Iberus. This must ye recover and win again by force of arms, by manhood and valour: ye must I say, compel this nation, more rash and inconsiderate in rebelling, than constant and resolute in maintaining war, for to receive once more the yoke of subjection, which they have shaken from off their necks. Having exhorted and encouraged them in this manner, he gave them to understand, that he would let forward in the night and lead against the enemies camp. And to he let them depart to refresh their bodies. At midnight, after he had devoutly taken with him the signs and approbations of the birds for his better speed, he put himself in his journey: and because he might be seized of some place to his liking, before the enemies should descry him, he let a compass in his march, and led his souldiers clean beyond their camp. And having by day light let his companies in battel array, he sent out three cohorts, even close to the rampier and trench of the enemy. The barbarous people wondering, to see the Romans shew themselves behind at their back, ran to and fro to take arms. Mean while, the Consul held his men with these and such like speeches: "My souldiers (quoth he) there is no other hope now left, but in mere strength and valour, and I of very purpose have wrought it so. Between us and our camp the enemies are encamped all: behind at our back we have our enemies Land. The bravest courses are ever safest, namely, to build and ground our hope fully upon vertue. And herewithal he gave order, that the cohorts aforesaid should retire of purpose to train forth as he thought and unprovided: for they imagining that the Romans for very fear were retired, filled forth by heaps out of the gate, and belpeired with armed men all the grounds, that lay between their own camp and the enemies battel. And whiles they made great haile to embattle themselves, the Consul who was already arranged in battel array, and in all respects well appointed, charged upon them before they were marshalled and set in order. First he put forth their cornets and wings of horsemen from both points and flanks of the battail: but they of the right side were straightway repulsed, and by their hasty and fearful retreating, caused the footmen also to be mightily afraid. Which the Consul perceiving, he commanded two elect cohorts of footmen to wheel about the right flank of the enemies, and to shew themselves at their backs before the other companies of foot encountered and charged one another. This sudden terror affrighted the enemies, but let all upright again and recovered the battail of the Romans, which through the fear of the Cavalry began to shrink and go down. Howbeit the horsemen and footmen both of the right point, were so troubled and so fir out of order, that the Consul was, forced to pluck some of them back with his own hand, and turn them with their faces affront the enemy. Thus all the while that the shot lasted, the skirmish was doubtful: so as now the Romans in the skirmish had much ado to make head and stand to it in the right side, whereas the fight and flight first began. But on the left and affront, the barbarous had the worst, and with great horror they looked behind and saw their enemies how they played upon their backs and retted not. After they had done with flinging their iron darts and lancing their fiery javelins, they drew their swords: and herewithal began the conflict afresh. They were not wounded now from a fir off by blind chance and hap-hazard, they knew not from whence: but foot to foot they stood, and hand to hand they coped and let drive one at another: no hope at all was now but to trust in pure strength and main force. The Consul seeing his men wearied, encouraged and refreshed them by lending for to relieve and maintain in the fight, certain cohorts out of the rearward. This new battallion inpointed with like a quoin or wedge at the first nor onlet brake their arrayes and being once disordered, they put them to flight, and in scattering, while they ran as fast as their legs would carry them, to their camp. Cato seeing them flee on all hands, mourned on horseback and rode himself to the second legion, which was in the rearward for supply, and commanded to advance the standard and ensigns before him to march apace, and to approach the camp of the enemies for to give an assault. If he espied any one to slip out of his rank, he would ride before and rap him with his light javelin that he had in his hand; commanding the Marshals and Centurions to chastise him for it. Now was the enemies camp at the point to be assaulted, and the Romans were with stones, pikes, perches and all kind of weapons set back and driver from the trench. But when this fresh legion approached neer, then both the assailants were more encouraged, and also he so, rode a gallop upon the spur to those said cohorts of his own that were left on the other side under the Town, and taking them with him great haste, whiles all the Townsmen were spread abroad in following the chase after the Suesetras, he led them into the Town at a place where there was no noise, no stirring, and not a man to be seen; and made himself master of all, before the Lacetans were returned back: but within a while he received them to mercy upon their submission: who, poor men, had nothing to yield and lose but their bare armor and weapons. Immediately he followed the train of this victory, and led his forces against the ho'd or strong Town of Vergium. This was a receptacle and place of sure retreat for certain Rovers and Thieves, who from thence used to make many rodes into the peaceable parts of that Province. The principal and chief person of Vergium quit the place, and betook himself unto the Consul, and began to excuse as well himself as the Townsmen; saying, that the government of the Town and the fate thereof lay not in their hands. For why? these robbers after they were once received in among them, seized themselves wholly of that strength, and had all at their command. The Consul willed him to go home again, and to devise and forge some likely and probable cause why he had been absent and out of the way; with this charge and direction, that when he saw him approach under the walls, and the robbers afore said wholly amused and occupied in defence thereof, they should remember to join with the rest of his part and faction, and be possessed of the fortrefs and hold of the Town. This put he in practise and execution accordingly. So whiles the Romans of one side scaled the walls, and they on the other side had taken the fortrefs, these barbarians were suddenly at once surprised with a two-fold fear before and behind. The Consul when he had gotten the place into his own hands, gave order, that all those who were gotten into the Cattle and held it, should remain free, themselves and all their kindred, and likewise enjoy their goods. The rest of the Vergetans he commanded the Treasurer to sell and make money of them. As for the Rovers, they suffered according to their deserts. After he had set the Province in quiet, he laid great tributes and imposts upon the mines of iron and silver: which being once ordained and established, the whole province grew in wealth and riches, every day more than other. For these his exploits achieved in Spain, the LL. of the Senat decreed, that there should be a solemn procession at Rome, to endure for three dayes.

The same winter, L. Valerius Flaccus the other Consul, fought in Frdnce a set field with the power of the Boians, near the forest of Litania, and won the victory. And by report, there were eight thousand Gauls there slain: the rest abandoned the war, and slipped every one into their own Hamlets and Villages. The rest of the winter the Cos. kept his army at Placentia and Cremona about the Po, and repaired in these Cities whatsoever had been decayed and demolished during the wars.

The affairs in Italy and Spain standing in these terms: when T. Quintius had so passed the winter in Greece, the letting aside the Ætolians (who neither had been recompensed according to the hope that they conceived of the victory, nor yet could long time like of repose) all Greece throughout in general enjoying the blessing of peace and justice, flourished and maintained their state exceeding well, admiring no less the temperance, justice, and moderation of the Roman General after victory, than his valour and prowess in war: there was an AS of the Senat of Rome brought and presented unto him, importing thus much, That war was determined against Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedæmonians. Which when Quintius had read, he published and proclaimed a general Diet or Council at Corinth against a certain day: when and where all the States associates should assemble by their delegates and Embassadors. Now when there was met together from all parts a frequent number of Princes and great personages, in such sort, that the very Ætolians also were not absent, Quintius used unto them this or the like speech, "The Romans & Greece have warred against King Philip as ye well know; and as with one mind and common counsel they have so done, so either of them had several quarrels unto him, and private causes and occasions by themselves to take arms. For Philip had broken the league and amity with us Romans, one while by sending aid and maintenance to the Carthaginians our enemies: otherwhiles by assisting our allies in the parts: and to you wards he hath so demeaned himself, that albeit we could not forget and put up all the wrongs that he hath done unto us, the very injuries that ye have received at his hands, minister sufficient cause unto us to war against him for your sake. As for this dayes consultation, it setteth wholly in your selves. For, this I propound unto you, Whether your will is to suffer Argos (which as ye know your selves Nabis the tyrant holdeth) to remain still under him in obedience: or whether you think it meet and reason, that a most noble and ancient City as it is, seated in the very heart of Greece, should be reduced unto liberty, to enjoy the same condition and state wherein other Cities of Peloponnesus and Greece do stand. This conclusion I say, as you well see, by the servitude of that one only City, we can not have us Romans no farther than thus, that by the servitude of that one only City, we can not have the full and entire glory of setting Greece wholly in liberty. But if you regard not the state of that City, and are not moved with the example thereof and the danger, for fear the contagion of this mischief spread farther: we for our parts are content, and take all in good worth, and will not let you down and teach you what to do. Only I require your advice in this point, mind you to resolve upon that, which the Major part of you shall carry by voices. After the Roman General had ended his speech, he there began to deliver their opinions. And when the deputed delegate or agent for the Athenians had magnified and extolled as highly as possibly he could, the good

A good demerits of the Romans towards Greece, yielding them great thanks, that upon their request they had granted them aid against Philip, and without any petition at all, offered them help and succour against Nabis the tyrant; and seemed therewith to be offended and displeased at some, yet nevertheless in their talk and speeches found fault and carped at these forgotten favours and demerits: how much they were bound and beholden already to the Romans for good turns past: it well appeared that he pointed out directly the Ætolians, and girded at them. Whereupon Alexander, a principall and chief man of their nation, in sight left against the Athenians, who having been in times past the head Captains and maintainers of freedom, betrayed now a common cause for love of their own private flatteries. Moreover, he complained that the Athenians, who first served Philip in his wars, and at the last (when they saw him down the wind and fortune to frown upon him) fell away like disloyal traitors & possessed themselves of Corinth to their own behoof practising also to compass and gain unto them the City of Argos. As for the Ætolians, the unit and principall enemies of Philip, and alwaies allies and friends to the Romans howsoever they had expressly and precisely covenanted in the league, to enjoy their towns and territories, after Philip was vanquished, were notwithstanding put besides Echinum and Pharjæ. He charged the Romans with fraud and deceit, who pretending an outward shew of a vainitie and colour of liberty, held the Cities of Chalcis and Demetria with strong garrisons: and yet when Philip made some stay and halting to withdraw and void from them, his armed guards, they were ever wont to object and say, that Greece would never be in freedom so long as the pretence of Argos and Nabis were in his hand: and finally he alledged against them, that unarmies there, Let them (quoth he) transport their legions once into Italy, the Ætolians would then undertake and promise, that Nabis should remove his garrison out of Argos, upon composition and with good will, or else they would compell him by force and arms, to be overruled by the puissance of all Greece united together in one general content. By this vain babble of his, he roused Antisthenes first, the Prator of the Achæans, who spake in this wise, Never will Juniper Op. Alex. quoth he, and Queen Juno the Patroness of Argos, suffer that City to be the recompence or prize between the Lacedæmonian Tyrant, and their pilling and thieving Ætolians: to be brought to this hard point and these terms of extremity, as to sustain more milery and calamity when it is recovered by us, than when it was won and taken by him. Quintius, it is not the us, in case they should make themselves a fort and Cattle of strength in the midst of Peloponnesus? Nought have they of the Greeks but their language, like as they carry nothing of men but their shape and visage. For look into their manners, their fashions and behaviour, they are more rude and cruell than any barbarians, nay, they are more savage than the most wild and ravenous beasts that be. We beseech you therefore O Romans, both to recover Argos out of the hands of Nabis, and also to establish the State of Greece in such sort, that ye leave these parts also safe and secure enough from the robberies and thieving hostility of these Ætolians. The Roman General Quintius, seeing them of all sides to blame and rebuke the Ætolians, said, that he would have answered them himself, but that he perceived them all so hatefully bent against them, that more needfull it was that they were to be appeased, than farther provoked. And therefore holding himself satisfied and contented with that opinion which was conceived of the Romans and Ætolians, he said, that he would demand what their pleasure was to advise, concerning the war against Nabis, unless he rendered Argos to the Achæans? And when they all were of one mind to make war, he exhorted them to send aids proportionably to the power and strength of each State and City. To the Ætolians he sent an Embassador, more to discomfite and lay open their intention (as it fell out accordingly) than upon any hope he had to obtain ought at their hands. Unto the Provoit Marshals of the camp, he gave commandment to send for the army from Latia.

About this time, when the Embassadors of King Antiochus came unto him to treat about alliance and league, he answered, That he could say nothing to them nor determine of that point in the absence of those Delegates abroad; and therefore they were to repair unto the Senat of Rome. Then, himself in person prepared to make an expedition and voyage against Argos, with those forces which were brought from Elitia. And when he was about to set forth, the Prator, with 10000 foot of Achæans, and 1000 horse met him in the way: and not far from thence they joined both their forces and encamped together. The next day after they came down into the Plain of Argos, and chose a place for fortification, and by evening about four miles from Argos now was Pr. Argos the Captain of the Lacedæmonian garrison, who had long married the tyrant his daughter, and was his wives brother besides. This Pr. Argos against the coming of the Romans had fortified with strong guards both the Cattles (for two there were within Argos) and the towers, which either had castles or were inspected. But as he was employed in these preparations, he could not disguise and hide the fear which this evil and approaching of the Romans wrought into him: and beside this fear, for fear from without, there appeared in him the more within. There was one Dinocrates an Atrive, (a young Gentleman of more than wisdom and discretion) who at the first by interposing a murmurall speech, and was conversed with certain persons of good sufficiency, about expelling the Romans, he studied to strengthen the conspiracy and his own side, he was not well assured assured of their fidelity, and could not judge which of them were true and which not. As he talked upon a time with his complies, the Captain of the garison sent for him by one of his guard; whereupon he perceived that his complor was revealed: he exhorted therefore the conspirators that were in the way to take arms with him, rather than to die by torture upon the rack: and so with some few about him he marched forward into the market-place, crying often aloud, That as many as loved the safety of the Common-weal should follow him as their head and maintainer of their liberty: but no man moved he with his speech to go after him and take his part: for no hope saw they of any succour at all near at hand: so far off were they from making good account of a fire guard of defence. And as he spake those words, the Lacedæmonians were come round about him, and killed both him and his fellows. After this were others also apprehended: the most part of them were slain, and some few cast into prison. A great number the night following I slid down the wall by ropes, and fled to the Romans. These assured the Romans, that if their army had been near the gates, the commotion and conspiracy aforesaid would have taken effect: and in case their camp approached nearer, the Argives would not be in quiet, but make some insurrection: whereupon Quintius sent out the footmen lightly appointed, together with the horsemen; who skirmished with the Lacedæmonians about Cylarobis (a publick school and place of exercise about a quarter of a mile out of the City) who were fallen out at the gate, and without any great difficulty chased them within the town: and in that very place where the conflict was, the Roman General encamped. One day he sent in scouting an epiplai, whether any new trouble and uproars arose among them within the City. But when he perceived once that they were all amovt for fear, he assembled a Council to take advice. Whether he were best to give the assault upon Argos, or no? All the heads of Greece, (except Arifannus) agreed with one accord, that since there was no other cause of war elsewhere, it should begin there especially. Quintius in no case would like of that counsell, but willingly he gave ear with evident approbation unto Arifannus, as he discoursed and reasoned against the generall opinion and consent of them all: and over and besides added this of himself. That considering the war was enterprised and taken in hand in the behalf of the Argives against the tyrant, there was nothing less beleeving and more without sense, than to leave the enemy himself, and to assail and batter the poor City of Argos. For his part he would fight at the head even against the Lacedæmonians and their tyrant, the principall cause of this war. Then having dissolved the Council, he sent certain cohorts lightly appointed to purvey store of grain. As much as could be found ripe in those parts was cut, mowed, and reaped down immediately and laid up: all that was green they trampled under foot and spoiled: that the enemies soon after might have no good thereof. So he dislodged and removed from thence, and having passed over the mountain Peribonius, at three daies end he encamped in the territory of Caryæ near to Argos. In which place he expected the aids of his allies before he would invade the territory of the enemies. From Philo there came a thousand and five hundred Macedonians, and of Thebians forty horse. The Roman General staid not now for succours of men (whereof he had sufficient plenty) but for his provision of victuals, which he had commanded the towns bordering near hand to furnish him withall. Besides there came great forces by sea, and met him there: for by this time was Lucius Quintius arrived with forty sail from Leucas: also eighteen covered ships of Rhodes. And now also was Eumenes the King, about the Islands Cyclades, with ten clofe hatched and decked ships, thirty gallions, with other smaller vessels among of sundry sorts. Likewise of Lacedæmonians that were exiled and banished persons there were very many; who, chased and driven out by the oppression and wrongfull dealing of their tyrants, repaired now into the Roman Camp, in hope to recover their native country again. Now a great number had been expelled in divers and sundry ages, since time that the tyrant first usurped rule, and were possessed of Lacedæmon. The chief of these exiled persons was one Agessipolis, a man to whom by right of descent and lineage the inheritance of the kingdom of Lacedæmon appertained. He whiles he was but an Infant hapned to be expelled by Lycurgus after the death of Cleomenes, who was the first tyrant at Lacedæmon.

The tyrant being thus round about with wars threatening both from sea and land, and destitute in manner of all hope, (considering the proportion of his forces to the power of his enemies;) yet nevertheless neglected not to wage war, but levied out of Creta one thousand more (even the chosen flower of all their youth) to the other thousand that he had from thence already. He had besides of mercenary souldiers three thousand in arms: also ten thousand of his own subjects and Citizens of Lacedæmon, together with those that he had taken out of the burroughs and villages in the country. Moreover, he fortified the City with trench and mure. And that there might arise no trouble and stir within the town, he held the spirits of men in awe with fear of sharp and rigorous punishments. And so much as he could not hope not imagine that they desired and wished his good and safety, for that he held some Citizens in suspicion and jealousy: after he had brought forth all his forces into the plain, whome they call Dromas, he commanded the Lacedæmonians to assemble together without any armour and weapons to an audience; and when they were assembled, he environed them with his armed guard. And after some few remonstrances by way of a short preamble, Why they ought to hold him excused at such a time, if he feared every thing, and made all sure as well as he could: considering withall, it was expedient even for them also (as many as the present state of the world might bring in suspicion) to be kept short for being able to execute any attempt, rather than be surprized in the midst of their practices and complots, and

A and to be punished accordingly: even for this cause (quoth he) I will have certain persons in custody and durance, untill such time as the tempest be overblown which now is coming. And when the enemies be once repulled, (from whom less danger there will be in case domesticall treasons may be prevented) then incontinently will I enlarge them and set them at liberty. This he commanded the names to be called of fourscore or thereabout of the principall of the youth, and as every one of them answered to his name, he clapt him up fast in prison: and the most part following, murdered them every one. After this, certain lotts (these were they who ever of old time were the Burghers and Villagers, a kind of peasants and country kerns) were accused to have intended to flie unto the enemy and to band with him: who likewise were whipped & scourged throughout all the streets, and then put to death. By the fearful example of this cruelty, the outrages of the common sort were well cooled and abated, yea, and so abated, that they durst not once quench nor give attempt of any new designments tending to change and alteration. His forces he kept within his strength and places of defence, for neither thought he himselfe strong enough to enter the field and fight a set battell, nor durst abandon the City seeing the minds of men so wavering, and their affections so unconstant.

Quintius having made his provision and set all things in good order, departed from his standing camp, and the second day came to Selasia upon the river Oreus: in which very place Antigonus sometime King of the Macedonians (struck a battell (men say) with Cleomenes the tyrant of the Lacedæmonians. And there, having intelligence, that from thence he was to mount up an hard ascent and narrow passage, he set a short compass through the mountains, having first before certain men to level the ground and make the way even, and so got into a large and broad portage, untill he came to the river Ennaus, which runneth in manner hard under the walls of the City of Sparta: where, as the Romans were pitching their tents, even as Quintius himself with the horsemen and light van-couriers gone before, the Auxiliaries of the tyrant charged upon them: who looking for nothing less, because no man had encountered them all the way as they marched, but passed on in their journey as in a peaceable country, were much troubled and affrighted herewith. This fear of theirs continued a good time, while the horsemen called upon the footmen, and they again unto the horsemen; and both the one sort and the other trusted in themselves but little or nothing at all. At length the standards of the legions with their ensignes came forward; and were within sight, and so soon as the companies of the vanguard advanced forth to fight, they who erewhile terrified others, were driven in fearful haile themselves into the City. The Romans being retired so far from the wall, as that they were without dart-shot, stood a while ranged in battell array. But after that they saw none of the enemies come abroad against them, returned to their leaguer. The next day after Quintius took his way and marche again his army in order of battell along the town side, near unto the river, hard at the foot of the hill Mosianus. The companies of the legionary footmen led the march in the vanguard, the light footmen and the horsemen followed in the reeward, and flanked the rest. Nabis kept within the walls his mercenary souldiers (in whom he reposed greatest confidence) arranged under their ensignes, and in readiness to fight, purposing to charge the back of his enemies. And the reeward of the Romans was not so soon passed by, but they talked out of the town at sundry places at once, with as tumultuous a noise as they made the day before. Appian Claudius had the leading of the reeward, who having prepared beforehand the heats of his souldiers, and advertized them to be preit and ready for what occurrent soever might happen, presently turned the ensignes, and set a compass with the whole army to make head against the enemies. Whereupon there ensued a hot fight which endured a good time, as if two armies had directly encountered one another. In the end, the souldiers of Nabis began to give ground and flie: in which flight of theirs they had made less halt and better saved themselves, but that the Achæans who were acquainted well with the ground, and knew the coasts of the country, hotly followed the chase: there made a foul slaughter and butchery among them; and the most part, such as were dispersed here and there in their flight they disturned. Then Quintius encamped near unto Amycla, and having harried and wasted all the territory round about the City (which places were very well peopled and very pleasant) when he saw no enemies issue out at the City gates, he removed his camp hard to the river Ennaus. From whence he made excursions, walled all the vale lying under the hill Tageus, and the lands butting and adjoining close to the sea.

Much about the same time L. Quintius made himself Master of the towns, first on the sea side: some yielded willingly, others for fear or perforce. And being afterwards advertized, that the town Gythium served for a place of safe retreat and refuge unto the Lacedæmonians in all their exploits and service at sea, and that the Romans lay encamped not far from the sea side; he resolved to assail it with all forcible means. This town at that time was very strong, well peopled with Citizens and other inhabitants, and sufficiently furnished with all warlike provision and munition. And in very good time it fell out, that as Quintius was entered into this difficult enterprise, Eumenes and the Rhodian fleet arrived. A mighty number of mariners and sea-servitors, gathered out of three Armadoes, within few daies made and furnished all engines and fabricks, which were to assault a City so well fortified both by sea and land. Now was the town-wall broken down with the undermining of the tortures, now was the wall shaken by the push of the ram, and with all there was one tower that by continuall battery was overthrowen, and with the fall thereof, the wall that stood of each side came tumbling down and lay along. And the Romans endeavour red at one time to enter the town, both from the haven (where the passage was more plain and easy) to the end, that the enemies might abandon the defence of the more open place; and also at the breach made in the wall: and they misfed but very little of entrance there where they intended, but the hope they conceived of yielding the City, which anon was crossed again, and turned to nothing, flaid their violence and heat of assault. Dexagoridas and Gorgopas governed the town then in equal authority. Dexagoridas had dispatched a courier to the Roman lieutenant, to signify that he would betray the town: and when the time and place of execution of this designment was agreed upon between them, the traitor was killed by Gorgopas: by occasion whereof, the City was the better defended with more careful heed by him alone; yea, and the assault thereof had been more difficult, but that Titus Quintius came to succour and help with four thousand chosen souldiers. He was no sooner discovered with an army arranged in battell array from the brow and top of the hill that is not far distant from the town: whiles L. Quintius withall from another side followed the assault with his ordnance and artillery both by sea and land, but Gorgopas then began himself to despair in very deed, and was driven perforce to take that very course, which in another he had punished by death: and upon composition that he might depart and have away with him those souldiers which he had in garrison, he delivered up the City to Quintius.

Before that Gythiennus was rendered, Pythagoras left as Captain at Argos, leaving the guard and defence of the City unto the charge of Timocrotas of Pellene, came with a thousand waged souldiers, and two thousand Argives unto Nabis at Lacedaemon. And Nabis like as at the first arrivall of the Roman fleet, and the surrender withall of the towns standing by the sea side, was much affrighted, so he recovered again some little hope and was well quieted in mind, so long as Gythiennus held out still & his garrison within the town kept their own. But after he heard once, that it also was yielded unto the Romans, and lost; seeing no hope left by land side, which was wholly possibled by the enemies, and that he was altogether shut up from the sea, he thought it best to yield unto fortune. And first he sent an herald into the camp to know whether the enemies would permit and suffer him to send his Embassadors unto them. Which being granted, Pythagoras repaired unto the General with no other charge and commission, but only to request that the tyrant might parly with the Roman General. Hereupon the Council was assembled: and generally opined it was, that there should be granted unto him a conference: in omuch, as both time and place was agreed upon and appointed. Now when they were come to the hills standing in the midst of that quarter, with some small companies of souldiers attending on either side upon them: they left their cohorts behind them, standing in guard, within the open view and sight of both parts: and then Nabis came down with a certain chosen guard for his body; and Quintius accompanied with his brother, Emmencus the King, Sublatus the Rhodian, and Aristhenus the Prator of the Achazans, with some few Knight Marshalls and Colonels. And then the tyrant being put to choice, whether he would speak first, or hear another, began his speech in this wise.

"If I could have bethought my self (O Quintius, and you all that are here present) & imagined what the cause should be, that you either proclaimed or made war first against me. I would have attended the issue of my fortune with silence. But now I could not have that Maltreat and command of my self to forbear, but that before I perish, I would needs know the reason and cause of my ruin and overthrow. Surely, if ye were such men as the Carthaginians are reported to be (with whom there is no regard of truth, no trust and security in covenants of society and alliance) I would not then marvel at all if you made small reckoning, & cared but little what measure ye offered unto me. But now, when I behold and advise you well, I see you are Romans, whose manner is to entertain most doly and precisely the observation of holy rites & divine Religion, and the faithful keeping of human league and alliance. When I consider and look into my self, I hope and think verily that I am one, with whom in generally, as well as with the rest of the Lacedaemonians ye are linked by virtue of the most ancient league; and in particular regard of myself, private amity and society hath been lately renewed by the war with Philip. But peradventure some man will say, That I have broken and overthrown the same first, in that I held the City of the Argives. And how shall I be able to answer this, and excuse my self? Shall I plead the instance of the matter, or to the circumstance of the time? The thing it self presenteth unto me a twofold plea for my defence. For being called by the inhabitants themselves of the City, who offered the town unto me, I received it at their hands, and in no wise seized upon it by force: I received it, I say, when it sided and took part with Philip, before it was compelled within your league. As for the time it justified and cleareth me also and my doings. For even then when as I was possessed of Argos, I was allied and affiait with you in good accord: and in our covenants, we articulated and capitulated to send aids unto you for your wars, and not to withdraw the garrison from Argos. And verily in this difference and question about Argos, I have the vantage as well in regard of the equity of the fact (in that I received a City not of yours but of your enemies received it I say, not surprised by force, but offered and delivered willingly) as also by your own confession, for that in the conditions of the affocation agreed between us, ye left Argos free unto me. But it may be that the name of tyrant hurtheth me: and some of mine actions condemn me much, and namely, that I set slaves free and divide lands to the poor commons. As for the name, thus much I am able to answer: that such as I am, better or worse, still I am the very same man, and no other than I was when you, even you O Quintius, entered alliance with me: then, I remember well, I was called King among you: and now I see I am termed a Tyrant. And therefore

A "therefore if I my self had changed the title and stile of my dignity and government, I must have yielded a reason and account of my levity and inconstancy: but seeing you have altered it, ye ought to answer for your vanity. Now as concerning the multitude, so augmented by the enfranchising of slaves as touching the land also, parted and distributed among the poor and needy; I can maintain and justify my doings herein, & protect me under the defence and privilege of the very time. For all these things be they as they be, I had done already, when ye made a league and covenant with me, and received aids at my hand in the war against Philip. But in case I had done so at this very present, I stand not now upon this, whether I either had offended you, or broken your amity; but thus much I aver, that done I had according to the custom and fashion of our anctours. And ye must not think to square and try the practice of Lacedaemon according to the rule and square of your laws and ordinances. For to let pass many other things, and needles it is to compare particulars, ye chuse your gentlemen or men of arms according to their revenue: according to revenue ye chuse likewise the footmen. Your will is that some few should excel in wealth and power, & the commons be subject and vassals unto them. Our Law-giver thought not good that the common wealth should be ruled by a few, whom you call Senators: that one or two States should excel & have preeminence in the City; but he thought that in the equality of wealth & worship, there would be many more to bear arms for their country. I have made a longer discourse I confess, than the ordinary and natural brevity of our speech in these parts will bear. And I might have knit all up in one word and said, that I had done nothing after I was entered into amity with you, wherewith you needed to have taken any offence & been displeased. Then the Roman General made answer to these points in this manner. Not friendship nor association at all have we made with you, but with Pelops the true & lawful King, of the Lacedaemonians: whereof I must needs say that the tyrants also who afterwards held the signory & sovereignty of Lacedaemon, have usurped the right, and enjoyed the benefit during the time that we were otherwise employed, and wholly buied one while in the Punic wars, another while in the Gauls, and evermore in one or other: like as you also have done in this last Macedonian war. For what was less unfitting and more absurd, than for us who waged war against Philip for the liberty of Greece, to conclude amity with a tyrant; and such a tyrant as of all others that ever have been is most cruel, most violent and outrageous with his own subjects? And considering that we were entered into the consule and train of setting all Greece at liberty, albeit you had not possessed your self of Argos by covin, nor held the same by force, yet it behoved us to restore Lacedaemon also to her ancient liberty, and to restore her in her own laws, wherof she would seem to make mention, as if you had followed the steps of Lycurgus. Shall we make care and take the pains to void the garrisons of Philip out of Tassus & Bargilus, and when we have done, leave to be trodden under your feet Argos & Lacedaemon, two most noble Cities, the two lights as it were in times past of all Greece, which remaining still in servitude and slavery, might deface the rest of our glory, & mar the title that we aim at, of Saviours and Deliverers of Greece? But you say, that the Argives friended Philip and took his part. We are content well enough, that you should not trouble your self, and be angry for our sake. For we know for certain, that this was the fault of two or three persons at most, and not of the whole City: and we know as well, that it was not agreed in any publicke council, that you and your party were sent for and received into the Castle. As for the Thebaisians, the Phocians, & Locrians, they sided with Philip, we wot right well by a general content of all hand yet when we enfranchised all Greece besides, we also set them at liberty. What think you then should we do in regard of the Argives, who are innocent for any publicke counsel intended against us? You said that you were blamed & charged sore for setting bondslaves free. No small objections these are I assure you, not of little importance. But what are they in comparison of other bad parts and heinous facts committed by you and your followers day by day, one in the head of another: Crime but liberty of an Assembly general either at Argos or Lacedaemon, wherein the people may speak their minds freely, and what they know by you without empaichment: if you would learn the truth indeed, and hear the particular of a most proud and unupportable dominion and tyranny. And to let all old matters go by. What a bloody massacre committed this son in law of yours, Pythiennus, even almost within my very sight in Argos? nay, what a slaughter and butchery in the very self, even when I was within the marches of Lacedaemon? But come on to those persons whom in a general assembly you caused to be attached, and promiscled in the presence of all the Citizens to keep them safe and sure in ward: come on, I say, command them to be brought forth now bound as they be: that their poor fathers & mothers may understand and they are alive, whom they have mourned for so much, without cause, as if they had been dead. But you will say, let case all this be true, what is that to you Romans? Dare you indeed speak out and lay to much to those that deliver Greece and set it free? to those I say, that for the freedom thereof have passed the seas have warred both by land and sea? And yet all this while (if you) I have not directly & truly wronged you nor properly infringed & broken your friendship and amity. No have you not? How often would you have me to convince you of the contrary? But I will not use many words & much circumstance, but come to the very catch and point of the matter. What be the things I pray you, wherewith friendship is commonly broken? I take it they are these two especially, namely, if you take my friends for your foes; and joyne your self to my enemies. You have done both the one and the other: for you have taken by force and arms Messina, a City received

Hereupon it is, that they who use few words, and pity, are said to speak Lucanice: and that manner of speech is called Lucanice. The influence of Quintius.

 "you I say our allies, have forced a City allied unto us, Again, with Philip our enemy, you have not "only concluded amity, but (God save all) contracted alliance and affinity by means of Philætes
 "a Colonnell and Commander of his: and making war against us, you have kept the seas all about
 "Mæla with your men of war and rovers: and I think I may safely say you have taken priors, rans, "and killed more Roman Citizens than Philip himself. And the whole sea-coast of Macedony hath
 "leis inelled our ships that use to bring provision unto our armies, and been more lafe for passage
 "than the promontory & cape of Mæla. Do you forbear therefore to make such want of a deli-
 "lity: spare you of a lather, to speak of the rights of alliance; and laying off the mask of popular "language and civil speech, talk as a tyrant and enemy as you are. Upon this, Antiochus dealt with Nabis, one while demonifhing and adverting him, another while requefing and entre-ting him. I now that the opportunity was offered, to provide for himself and his whole estate: he began to difcoufe unto him of the Tyrants of all the flates confining thereabout one after another by difcoufe unto him of the Tyrants of all the flates confining thereabout one after another by name who when they had reigned up and laid down their absolute foveraignty of command, and reftored liberty to their fubjects, paffed their old age among their Citizens, not only in repofe and fequity, but also in great honour and reputation. These words uttered & heard between them to and fro, the night drew on apace & parted the conference. The morrow after, Nabis prom-ifted, seeing the Romans would have it so to quit the City Argos, to withdraw his garrison from thence and to deliver again all the captives and fugitive traitors that were under his hands: and if they demanded any more of him, he requested that they would fet it down in writing, that he might confute thereof with his friends. So both the Tyrant had refpite and time granted to take advice, and also Quintus late in Council with the principal heads of his allies what to do. K
 The molt part were of opinion to maintain the war till, and to kill the tyrant out of the way: for never would the liberty of Greece be otherwise firm and fure: and better far had it been, never to have entred into arms with him than being once begun, to give it over. And he will, say they, be greater and more strong hereafter, as if his tyrannical government were approved, and no doubt he would vouch his example many in other free States and Cities, to lie in wait to work means to overthrow the liberty of Citizens, and to bring them into thraldom and bondage. The Generall, of himself was more affected and inclined to peace: for he saw, "that if the enemy were once driven within the walls, there was no way but to lie in siege against the City, and that would re- L quire long tract of time: forasmuch as it was not Gythium (and yet that was betrayed and ren-dred and not forced by assault) but Lacedæmon, a molt strong town both for men and munition, "that they were to lay siege unto and assault. And whereas the only hope was, that when they "approached with the army, there might some diffection and ledion have rifen among themselves within: now when as they saw the engines in manner advanced hard to the City gates,
 "there was not one that mutin'd or fiftred at all. He added more over and said, That Philo the "Embaffador newly returned from Antiochus, reported, how all was not found there, nor the "perve like to continue: and that he had paffed over into Emper, with far greater forces both for "land and at sea than at any time heretofore: and if (quoth he) the army should be wholly em"ployed in the siege of Lacedæmon, what other power have we to maintain war withall against M "so puiffant and mighty a Prince as is Antiochus? These were the remonstrances that openly he gave out: but secretly he was troubled in mind for fear lest a new Confil should come in his place, and have the government of the Province of Greece: and so he should leave unto his fuffellor, the honour of the victory of a war commenced by him, and in good forwardness. But when he perceived that his allies were nothing inclined to his waies, notwithstanding all his contradiction and bending to the contrary, by making semblant that he now drew with them and was of their mind, he won them all to approve his designment and intention. "Well, God speed our "hand (quoth he) let us besiege Lacedæmon since ye will needs have it so: but considering that "the laying siege unto Cities, is a thing as ye well know, that goeth so slowly forward, and o-
 "fentimes maketh the aflailants looner weary than the defendants: you ought even now to cast N
 "this account presently with your selves, that we must lie all winter long about the walls of "Lacedæmon. And were there nothing but travell and perill, that during so long time we were "to endure, I would exhort and encourage you to suffer and abide the fame, with stout bodies
 "and resolute minds. But besides all that, we must be at great cost and expences about fabricks,
 "engines, and instruments of artillery, requifit to the aflault of so great a City: we must I say be "provided of victuals good store against winter, as well to serve us as you. Be well advised
 "therefore to the end that you should not suddenly in halle huddle up these matters. Or after ye
 "are once entred into the aflion, give over and abandon it with shame) that ye dispatch
 "your letters aorhand every one to the State wherein he liveth, and found them to the depth,
 "how their hearts serve them and what strength and forces they have. Of aids & incourcs I have O
 "enough and to spare: but the more in number we are, the more maintenance we have need, at "this time the winter is coming on apace, all which feason, carriage (especially for off) is cum-"burfome and hard. This Oration at the first caused them every one to regard and look homeward
 "to domestical difficulties and inconveniences, namely, the idleness, the envy and backbiting
 "of those which tarry at home, against them that are employed in warfare: the common liberty

A (which causeth men of one society and commonaity hardly to accord and fort together) the pub-like want of treasure, and the niggardice of private persons, when they are to part with any thing out of their own purses. And therefore suddenly changing their minde, they put to the discretion of the Roman Generall, to do and determine what he thought expedient for the good of the people of Rome and their allies. Whereupon Quintus taking the advice only of his own Lieutenants and Provost-Marshals, engrossed these Articles and conditions following, according to which peace should be concluded with the Tyrant, In primis, That the election of a Tyrant for the term of fix months between Nabis and the Roman King Lacedæmon and the Rhodians. That both T. Quintus and Nabis should immediately fend Embassadors to Rome, that they might be ratified and confirmed by the authority of the Senate, that on that day forward where-B in the conditions put down in writing should be entered unto Nabis, the time should should begin. Item, That within ten daies next after ensuing, all the territories out of the land and the rest of the towns within the territory of the Argives, and then those parts to be delivered, old and free unto the Romans. Item, That no slave taken captiv in war, belonging either to the King, or to any publique state, or private person, be had away from thence, and in the before time had been carried forth, they should be restored again dry to their right Masters. Item, That Nabis should deliver again those ships that he had gotten from the Argives, and that that himself have no vessel at all but only two gallions, and those to be common to him and twenty oars apiece to direct and rule them. Item, That he render all the summe of his rans and captives unto all the Cities confederate with the people of Rome, as also make restitution to C the Messenians of all their goods again, that either could be found, or the towns were lawfully to be theirs. Item, That he restore to all the banished Lacedæmonians, their wives and children: but of the wives, so many only as would be content to follow their husbands: and that none of them should be compelled against their wills to go with any called persons. And that none of mercenary foundiers of Nabis, as were either gone from him into their own Cities, or to the Romans, all their own goods should be justly and truly delivered again. That in the Island of Grete he should not be poffessed of any one City: and took what Cities he should find, he yield them to the Romans. Item, That he enter into alliance with no Carthage, nor with any other whatsoever, nor yet make war with them. Item, That he remove all the garrisons out of all the D Cities that himself had delivered up and which had surrendered themselves and all they had under the protection and obedience of the people of Rome, and not molest them neither by himself nor any of his. Item, That he build no town nor Cattle, either in his own land or in any other.
Item, That for the more assurance of performing these covenants, he give twelve hostages, such as it should please the Roman Generall to choote: and namely, his own son or one of them. Last of all, That he make present payment of one hundred talents of silver, and fifty more yearly until the term of eight years be run out. These Articles engrossed were sent to Lacedæmon, after the Camp was removed nearer to the City. But nothing was pleaded was the Tyrant with any of them. Only he was well paid, that beyond his hope and expectation, the Romans were merrion at all therein of reducing the called persons home into the City. But there withal offered and displaced him molt was this, that both shipping was taken from him, and also the maritime E port towns: for great commodity he gat by the sea. In taking the land from the cape of Mæla with his pyrras and men of war: and besides, the youth and able men of those Cities, received his turn very well to furnish and man his ships with the very best soldiers and men of service that were. And albeit he feared and considered upon these articles ingrossed, so they with his friends, yet were they all of them divided abroad and current in every mans mouth: to maintain are these courtiers commonly and hardly to be untied, as in all things else to be kept in keeping of secret counsell. These conditions were controlled and found fault with, notwithstanding by men in generally, as by each one in particular, as they took exceptions against the points that concerned and concerned themselves. They that had married the wives of the banished, or were poffessed F of any part of their substance, chafed, and stormed thereat, as if they were to lose, or were poffessed of their own, and not to render and restore the goods of others. The slaves who had been freed by the tyrants, were now not only to lose the benefit of their freedom, but also to endure harder servitude and bondage than aforetime: feting before their eyes how they should return again into the houses and hands of their old Masters, angry and incensed now against them. The hired foundiers were malecontent, for that they saw they should lose their pay after peace concluded: and saw full well, that there was no being for them in those States and Cities, who hated the tyrants themselves no more than their followers and adherents. At first they muttered and murmured, whispering these things among themselves in their secret meetings and conventicles: afterwards they mutined, and on a sudden ran and took arms. The Tyrant seeing the multitude disquieted enough of themselves with this tumult, assembled the people to-G gether. Where after he had declared the conditions imposed upon him by the Romans, and in every article had intirely put to somewhat of his own device, to aggravate all matters and make them seem more grievous and intolerable, at the rehearsing of every particular the whole assembly one while cried out, and another while the fudry parts thereof. For up a noise of utter dislike. Then he asked their opinion what answer they would have him to return unto those Articles, and what to do? They all in manner with one voice answered him that there was no answering of the matter, but that he should plainly go to war, and make no more

P. Scipio returned out of his Province and government of Gaul for the election of new Consuls, and to that purpose was the general assembly summoned; wherein were chosen L. Cornelius Merula, and Q. Minutius Thermus. The next morning after were created Pretors, L. Cornelius Scipio, M. Fulvius Nobilior, C. Scribonius, M. Valerius Messala, L. Porcius Licinius, and C. Flaminius, C. Atilius Serranus, and L. Scribonius Libo. Ediles of the chair, were the first that exhibited the Stage-plays called Megalæsa. And the Roman plays or games represented and set out by these Ediles, the Senat now first and never before beheld apart from the rest of the people. And this (as all novelties and new fashions) ministered much talk: whiles some gave their opinion and said, That now at length that was given to this most noble and honorable State, which long ago was due; others again construed thus, and gave out, "That whatsoever was added to the Majesty of the Senators and Nobles, was derogatory from the dignity of the people: and that all such kind of distinctions, whereby estates and degrees are levered one from another, are prejudicial as well to common peace as public liberty." For these five hundred and eighty years say they, these plaies and games have been beheld and looked upon in common, without any such precise difference. What new accident is suddenly befall, why the Nobles should not be willing to toler the Commons be intermingled with them in the Theatre? and why a rich man should disdain his poor neighbour to sit by him? This is a new appetite and strange longing of theirs indeed, full of pride and arrogancy, a thing never desired nor taken up and practised by the Senat of any nation whatsoever. So as in the end even Africanus besought himself (men say) and repented thereof, for that he in his Consulship moved and perfwaded the bringing up of this new fashion. So hard a matter it is to alter an old custome, and make a new order to be well liked of. And men are ever more willing to keep them to ancient customes, unless they be such as practise and experience do evidently check and condemn.

In the beginning of the year, wherein L. Cornelius and Q. Minutius were Consuls, news came to thick of many earth-quakes, that men were not only weary of the thing it self, but also of the holy-dayes and solemnities that were published and proclaimed in that regard. For the Consuls could not intend either to assemble the Senate and sit in Council, or manage the affairs of the Common-weal, for being wholly employed about sacrificing and appeasing the wrath of the gods. In conclusion, the Decemvirs were commanded to peruse the books of Sibylla, and according to their answer and direction, a procession and supplication was for three daies solemnized. And before the Altars and shrines of the gods and goddesses, they made their prayers with garlands and coronets on their heads: yea, and commandment was given, that every household and family by it self should fall to their prayers and devotions. Also the Consuls by order from the Senat made proclamation, That upon what day a feast or solemnity was ordained by occasion of one earth-quake, no man the same day should bring news of another. Then the Consuls cast lots for the government of their provinces, and after them the Pretors did the like. Unto Cornelius befall Cauls, and to Minutius the Ligurians; C. Serranus had the charge of the civil jurisdiction, and M. Valerius of the forraign; L. Cornelius governed Sicily, L. Porcius Sardinia, C. Flaminius high Spain, and L. Fulvius the lower. The Consuls looked for no war that year: but even then at that instant were letters brought from M. Cincius Lord President of Pise, gave notice, that twenty thousand Ligurians were up in arms, having conspired together in all market Towns and places of resort throughout the whole nation, and that they had already wasted the territory of Luna, and having invaded and passed through the Pisan Land, had over-run also the Sea coasts. Wherefore Minutius the Consul, unto whom the government of Liguria was allotted, by the advice of the LL. of the Senat mounted up into the pulpit Refraja, and published an act, That those two legions of Roman citizens, which the former year had been enrolled, should within ten daies present themselves at Arretium, in lieu whereof he would levy two other legions out of the City. Also he commanded the allies and Magistrats of the Latin nation, and their Embassadors leaguers, who owed knight-service, and were bound to find souldiers to come before him into the Capitol. And from among them he enrolled fifteen thousand foot and five hundred horse, according to the number of young and servicable men that were to be found in each State: which done, he commanded them forthwith, to go directly from the Capitol to the gate of the City, and presently to take musters that all might be done with greater expedition. Unto Fulvius and Flaminius were appointed three thousand Roman footmen and two hundred horsemen apiece, for to supply and strengthen their forces: also five thousand foot to either of them of allies of the Latin nation, with two hundred horse. Moreover the Pretors were charged to dismiss and call the old souldiers, so soon as they were arrived into their provinces. Now, when as the souldiers who were enrolled in the City-legions, returned thicket unto the Tribuns of the Commons, that they should take knowledge of as many of them as were exempted from warfare, for that they either had served out their full time by law appointed, or were sickly and diseased: behold the letters of Serranus dashed all this, and cleared every difficulty and scrupulosity: wherein it was written, that fifteen thousand Ligurians were entered the territory of Placentia, and had made great wast and laccage therein putting all to fire and sword as they went, even as far as to the very walls of the Colony it self, and the banks of P. Padus. Also that the nation of the Boii made commotion and gave suspicious of rebellion. In which regards seeing there was a tumultuous and sudden war toward, the Senat passed a decree, wherein they signified that it was not their pleasure that the Tribuns should accept any excuses pretended by the souldiers, but that they should all meet

A meeting and assemble together, according to the Edict. Over and besides they gave order, that the allies of the Latin nation, who had served in the armies of P. Coracius and L. Sampsonius and were discharged from souldiery by them being Consuls, should now be ready to free themselves, as they should command by way of proclamation: Also that the said L. Coracius the Consul in his march and journey toward the Province, might take up, enroll, and arme, what souldiers he thought good, out of all the burroughs and villages in his way, and have them with him whither soever he would, yea, and have commision to dismiss whom of them he thought good, and when soever he listed at his good pleasure.

After that the Consuls had taken musters, and were gone into their Provinces, then T. Quintus demanded to have a day of audience in the Senate concerning those affairs that he had concluded with the assistance of the ten Delegates above said: and that it would please them to confirm and establish the same by virtue of their assent and authority. Which they might do with more ease, in case they would hear the Embassadors themselves speak, who were come out of all Greece: great part of Asia, and from the Kings. These embassies were admitted into the Senat by C. Serranus the Pretor for the City, and all dispatched with a gracious answer. But because the dispute about Antiochus required long time of debate, therefore it was referred and put over to the ten Delegates, of whom some had been in Asia, or at Lysimachus with the King, and Quintus was commanded, that together with those said Delegates he should hear what the King his Embassadors could say, and to return unto them such an answer, as might stand with the honor and welfare of the people of Rome. The chief of this embassage from the King were Menippus and Hegesias. Then Menippus began and said, "That he knew no such perplexed difficulty in their embassage, considering they were come simply to treat for peace, and to contract a league and alliance. For, saith he, there are three sorts of confederacies and associations, whereby States and KK. ordinarily conclude league and amity one with another. The first, when they that are vanquished in war, have conditions and articles imposed upon them: for when all is yielded into the hands of him that is the mightier and more puissant, then it is in his power and at his discretion and will, to give unto the conquered party what he list, or to take from him as he pleaseth. The second is, when they that are equal in warlike forces give over on even hand, and be content to make peace and amity upon indifferent and equal conditions, one with the other: in which case, demand and claim is made, restitution and amends performed according to the accord and agreement: and if in time of the wars, any have been molested and troubled in their possession, they fall to composition either by the form and tenor of ancient law, or respective to the good and profit of both parties. The third is, when they that never were enemies, meet and confer together about concluding some friendship by way of solemn alliance and society, who neither give nor take any conditions: for that belongeth properly to Conquerors, and not to those that are conquered. Seeing then that Antiochus is compelled in this kind, I marvel (qd. he) that the Romans should think or say, It is reasonable to them, to impose upon him, or to prescribe and set down, what Cities of Asia they would have to be free and exempt, and which they would have to be tributary: and into what Cities they would expressly forbid the King his garrisons, or the King himself to enter and set foot. For in this wise ought they to make peace with Philip their enemy in times past, and not to draw a contract of amity and association with Antiochus, a friend at this present. To this Oration Quintus returned his answer in this sort, "For as much as it pleaseth you to make your speech thus diffident, by way of distinction, and severally to rehearse all kinds of confederacies and accords: I also will set down as methodically in order two conditions, without which you may let the King your master to understand, that he must not look to entertain any friendship with the people of Rome. The one I this, that if he would debar us to intermeddle with the Cities of Asia likewise himself, have nothing to do with all Europe. The other, that if he cannot contain himself within the compass of Asia, but will needs encroach upon it the Romans likewise may have liberty and power both to maintain those amities, which they have already, and also to entertain new with the States of Asia. Hereat Hegesias interceded and said, "That this was an indignity intolerable, and which he could not abide to hear, namely that Antiochus should be disfavored of those Cities of Thrace and Chersonesus, which S. Scaurus his great grand-father had conquered with singular honor from the King Lysimachus, whom he vanquished in war and slew in field, and seized the same in him as his rightful inheritance. As for the same cities possessed by the Thracians, Antiochus thinketh with as great praise and glory hath partly by force of arms regained out of the Thracians, and partly re-peopled with the old inhabitants called home again, whereas they lay abandoned and desolate, and namely Lysimachus it self as all the world seeth, and more than that hath red-dified to his exceeding charge and expence, those that lay along in their ruins, and were consumed with fire. What likens then is there between these two demands: namely, that Antiochus should be restored out the possession of that which either he acquired or recovered in that sort: and that the Romans should obtain and forbear Asia, which never appertained unto them? To this indeed, Antiochus (saith he) is desirous of the Roman friendship, but in such terms as shall not diminish his honor, nor purchase him self shame and reproach. Then Quintus rejoined a word in this manner, "For as much as qd. be we balance and weigh things according to honesty (as in truth it is becom the chief and principal state of the world), and to great and mighty a King to prize that only or as

"Teatt wife principally above all other regards) I would gladly know of you. Whether ye think it more honest, or the twain, either to will and wish that all the Cities of Greece whatsoever and wherefore should enjoy liberty: or to make them homagers and tributary? If Antiochus thinketh it be an honorable thing for him to reduce into servitude and bondage as his own, those Cities which his great grand-father held by right of arms, and whereof neither his father nor grand-father afore him were in possession: the people of Rome likewise esteemeth it a material point that toucheth their faithfulness and constancy, not to forsake the Greeks, whose protection and defence they have enterprised and taken in hand. And like as they have freed Greece out of the hands of Philip, so they intend to deliver those Cities of Asia which are of Greekish race and descent, from the subjection of Antiochus. For the Greek Colonies were not sent into Eolia and Ionia, to live in servitude under the Kings, but to increase and multiply, that a most ancient nation might spread over the face of the whole earth. Now when as Hegesfanax knew not how to flit and turn himself, and could not deny but that the cause of liberty which the Romans pretended in the title of their quarrel, was of more honesty and credit, than that other of slavery: Let's lay away all these circumstances of words (quoth P. Sulpitius, the ancientest person of all the ten Delegates) and choose ye one of the two conditions which even now were expressly offered unto you by Quintius, or else make no more talk about amity with the Romans. Then quoth Menippus, As for us, we may in no case, neither will we capitate and covenant any thing prejudicial to the Kingdom and royal state of King Antiochus. The morrow after Quintius when he had brought all the Embassies of Greece and Asia into the Senat, that they might know what affection the people of Rome carried, and what mind Antiochus bare to the Cities of Greece, he declared before them all as well his own demands, as those of the Kings part: willing them to make report unto their own Cities, and assure them, that the people of Rome would maintain them against Antiochus (unless he departed out of Europe) with the same virtue, valour, and fidelity wherewith he had defended their liberty against Philip. Then Menippus was earnest with Quintius and the LL. of the Senat, beseeching them instantly not to proceed in hait to a decree whereby they should set all the world in trouble and upore: but both take leisure themselves and give respite unto the King to deliberate farther of the matter: for no doubt, upon the relating of the conditions, he would consider upon them, and either obtain somewhat at their hands, or for peace sake yield his consent to all. Thus was the matter wholly and entirely deferred: and agreed it was, that the same Embassadors should be addressed unto the King, who had been with him at Lysimachia, to wit, P. Sulpitius, P. Villius, and P. Helms.

Scarcely were they gone from the City and entered upon their journey, but Embassadors arrived from Carthage, who reported, that without all doubt Antiochus made preparation for war, and therein used the hand and ministry of Annibal: in so much, as it was feared also that a third Punic war would break out withal. Annibal, as we said before, having fled his native country, repaired unto Antiochus, and was in great account and estimation with the King, for no other cause and policy in the world, but that the King who projected and plotted long time in his spirit to levy war upon the Romans, could find no man more fit than Annibal to break his mind unto, and with whom to discourse upon a matter of such consequence. Annibal his long and resolution was ever one and the same still, namely, To make war within Italy: and that Italy was able to furnish a forrain enemy, with men, munition, and victuals. For this he cast with himself and considered, that if all were quiet there and no troubles set a foot, but that the people of Rome might with the forces and riches of Italy, furnish themselves to make war without Italy, there was no Monarch nor nation under the sun able to make head against the Romans. He demanded therefore to have the command of 100 close ships with hatch and deck, 16000 foot, and 1000 horse: and with the said fleet he would first fall into Affrick, where he assured himself that he should be able to solicit and induce the Carthaginians to rebellion: but if they held off and made it goodly and strange, yet would he settle in some part of Italy and levy war against the Romans. His advice and counsel furthermore was, that the King should with all his other forces pass into Europe, and in some one part of Greece keep his power together, and not to take the Sea, but to be ready ever to cross over; which would be sufficient to make a shew and raise a bruit all abroad of war. When he had perswaded the King to this designment and resolution, supposing that he was likewise to found and prepare the hearts afore-hand of his own countrymen to this purpose: he durst not dispatch any letters unto them, for fear they might chance to be intercepted by the way, and so discover the whole plot. He happened at Ephesus upon a Tyrian one Arifon, a man whole industry and dexterity he had tried in some small ventures wherein he had employed him. Him he plyed with gifts in hand, but fed him more with large promises of great rewards, which King Antiochus also himself seemed to make good and give his word for: and so sent him to Carthage with credence and instructions. He acquainted him with the names of all those persons with whom he was to talk and confer: he furnished him with secret tokens, whereby they might assuredly know that he was no counterfeit, but came with a message from him. Now whilst this Arifon conversed in Carthage, the friends of Annibal knew no sooner about what errand he came, than his very enemies. At the first, much talk and discourse there was in every corner of the City where they met, and at their feasts and merriments, of this matter. Afterwards at their counsel table some stuck not to say, that the exile of Annibal was to little or no purpose, if whilst he was absent he could contrive and compass new plots, and by soliciting and tempering men's minds,

A disquiet and trouble the state of the City. There is a stranger, say they, one Arifon a Tyrian, hither come with instructions from Annibal and King Antiochus: certain men there are, that daily have privy conference with him, and devise in secret of that, which anon will break out to the utter ruin and overthrow of all. "Whereupon they all cried with one voyce to convene Arifon presently before them, and to examine him about what business he was thither arrived and unless he would bewray & declare the matter, to lend him with Embassadors for purpose, to Rome: For why? we have (say they) felt the smart enough, and paid sufficiently for the folly and rash head of one herebrained man already. Let privy persons bear their own load hereafter, and at their own peril commit a trespass: provided always, that the Common-wealth be preserved clear not only from all fault, but also from all appearance and bruit of any such intent. Arifon being called before them (stood stiffly upon his integrity and excused himself, and evermore used this for his best and surest defence, That he had brought no letters at any one person: howbeit he could not render a ready & found reason of his coming thither: but especially he was shrewdly troubled and put to his trumps when they charged him, That he had talk and communication with those only of the Barchine faction. Hereupon arose some debate and altercation in the house: whilst some were of opinion that he should be apprehended for a spy, and clapt up fast in ward: others again were of mind that there was no cause to make such a stir and tumult: for it was an evil precedent to be given, that strangers coming to their City, should be troubled and hardly intreated: and the like measure no doubt would be offered to the Carthaginians in Tyrum & in other Towns of marchandise, whereunto they used to have resort for exchange and traffique. So for that day the matter was put off. Arifon framing himself to play the crafty Carthaginian among these Carthaginians, wrote a certain bill, and in the shutting in of the evening, hung it up in the most conspicuous and publick place of all the City, even over the seat where the head Magistrate useth daily to sit: and himself about the third watch gat to hipboard and elcaped. The morrow after, when the suffetes were set on the bench to minister law, the bill afore said was seen, taken down, and read: wherein to this effect was written, That Arifon was not come with a message to any person in particular, but to all the Seniors or Elders in general (for so they call the Senat.) After that the thing was by this means made a publick matter, and the whole state of the Senators reputed culpable: they were not so earnest to search into privy persons. Howbeit thought good it was, that Embassadors should be sent to Rome to give information hereof to the Consuls and the Senat, and whithal, to make complaint of certain wrongs done by Masaniissa.

D Masaniissa understanding that the Carthaginians were suspected and in some ill name among the Romans, and also at jar and variance within themselves: and namely, that the great and principal men were had in jealousy by the Senat for their conferences with Arifon: and their Senate likewise suspected by the people, by reason of that writing above named of the said Arifon, making thus a good advantage and opportunity to do them some injury, not only invaded their maritime parts and made spoil, but also forced certain tributary Cities to the Carthaginians for to pay himself tribute. That quarter of the country they call Emporia. It is the Sea coast of the lesser Syria, and the country is exceeding fertile: there is in it one only City named Lepcis, which paid to the Carthaginians for tribute, a talent every day. All this region Masaniissa then had plighted, loe, and for one part thereof he made some claim, as being litigious whether it pertained to his Kingdom, or the Seignory of the Carthaginians: and because he knew for truth, that the Carthaginian Embassadors were about to go to Rome, as well to purge themselves of some crimes wherewith they were charged, as to complain of him: therefore himself also addressed his Embassadors to Rome, who should lay open more matter against them of deeper suspicion, and debate whithal as touching the right of those tributes. The Carthaginians were no sooner heard speak concerning that Tyrian stranger but the LL. of the Senat grew into some doubt: lest they should wage war with Antiochus and the Carthaginians both together. And this presumption of all the rest made the suspicion most pregnant, because when they had the party among them and were purposed to send him to Rome: they neither made the man himself sure, nor the bark wherein he arrived. After this, they fell to debate and argue with the Kings Embassadors, about the territory and land in controversy. "The Carthaginians pleaded for themselves, and stood much upon their bounds and limits, for that the land in suit lay within that precinct, by which P. Scipio the Conqueror limited out that territory which pertained to the seignory of the Carthaginians. Also they alleged the confession of the King himself, who at what time as he persued Aphercer, that fled out of his own realm and with a company of Numidians ranged abroad about Cyrene, made request unto them to give him leave to pass through this very ground, as if (without all question) it belonged to the Carthaginians. The Numidians answered again to these points & said plainly to their faces, that they lied in their throats, as touching that supposed limitation and bounding by Scipio: and moreover, if we would go (say they) and search the very original indeed of the law, what land at all ought the Carthaginians have of their own proper inheritance? For being but meer strangers, they had after much prayer and entreaty, as much ground allowed them and no more, to build them a City in, as they could compass with things cut out of one bull hide. And look whatsoever they had encroached upon: without that nest and seat of theirs in Byssa they gat and held it by force and violence. And as for the land now in strife, they are not able to prove, that they always held the same in possession no, nor that they kept it any long time together. But as occasion and opportunities served of advantage, one while they, and another while the Numidian 44 Kings made security, and enjoined it; and evermore he went away with the possession thereof. It was as he longer, and had the keener sword, for these considerations they requested the Romans to leave the thing in that state and condition, wherein it stood before that the Carthaginians were enemies, or King Masinissa friend and ally to the Romans and not to intermeddle between, nor take a part, but let the winter wear it, and him have it that can hold it. In conclusion it was thought good, that to the Embassadors of both parties this answer should be returned, namely: That they would send certain Commissioners into Affrick, to decide this controversy about the land in question, between the people of Carthage and the King. So there were sent of purpose, P. Scipio Africanus, C. Cornelius Cethegus, and M. Minucius Rufus. Who having heard what could be said, and seen the thing, left all hanging still in suspense and undecided, without adjudging it by their definitive sentence to the one or the other, But whether they did so, on their own head and self-accord, or by direction from the Senat, is not so certain, as it seemeth agreeable unto that present time in policy, to leave them as they found them, and the contrary still depending, For unless it were so, Scipio himself alone, in regard of the knowledge that he had of the thing, and of his authority with the persons (to much bound they were unto him on both sides) might with a word of his mouth, or a nod of his head, have ended all this matter.

The five and thirtieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the x City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the five and thirtieth Book.

Publius Scipio Africanus being sent Embassador unto Antiochus, talked at Ephesus with Annibal (who had sided with Antiochus) to the end, that he might rid him of that fear which he had conceived of the people of Rome, as touching the taking away of his life. Among other matters passed between them, when he demanded of Annibal, upon what judgment he have been the noblest and greatest warrior, or that ever was, he answered that it was Alexander King of the Macedonians; for that he with a small power had discomfited and defeated an infinite number of armies, and with that, passed through those far distant and remote parts of the world, unto which a man would not believe that it were possible for any person to go and see them. When he asked again of him whom he deemed for the second: Whom Pyrrhus (qñ he) because he taught the manner how to pitch a camp, & besides, no man had the cost to gain places and holds for advantage, nor could set his corps de guard, or plant garisons better than he. And when he proceeded to know whom he took to be the third, Annibal named his own good self. At which answer Scipio smiled laughing: And what would you I say (said then qñ he) if your hap had been to have vanquished me, Marry then (said he) I would have set my self before Alexander, before Pyrrhus, and before all other. Among other prodigious fights, whereof there were reported very many, it is said, that in the year wherein Cn. Domitius was Consul, an Ox spake, and said these words: Rome, look to thy self, The Romans prepare to war with Antiochus, Nabis the tyrant of the Lacedemonians, provoked by the Aitolians, who solicited both Philip and also Antiochus to wage war against the people of Rome, revolted from the Romans and after he had levied war against Philip, the Pretor of the Acheans, was by the Aitolians slain. The Aitolians likewise abandoned the friendship of the people of Rome, with whom Antiochus King of Syria banded: who warred upon Greece, and surprised many Cities, and namely, Chalcis and Euboea among the rest. Besides, this book containeth the martial affairs in Liguria, and the preparation of Antiochus for the war.

The five and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

IN the beginning of that year where in these affairs thus passed, Sext. Digitius Pretor in high Spain, fought battles (rather ordinary, and for number many than otherwise memorable and worth the speaking) against those States, whereof after the departure of Cato a great sort had rebelled. And those battles for the most part were so unfortunate, that hardly he could deliver up to his successor the one half of those soldiers which he had received. And doubtless all Spain would have taken heart again, if the other Pretor P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of Cneus, had not sped better in many of his conflicts beyond them. Upon which terror, no fewer than fifty good Towns revolted unto him, And these exploits performed Scipio as Pretor. Who also in quality of Propretor, encountered the Lusitanians upon the way, as they returned homeward charged with a mighty great booty raised out of the bare Spain, which they had utterly pillaged and spoiled: where he fought from the third hour of the day unto the eight, with doubtful event. For number of soldiers he was inferior to his enemies, but for all things else he had the vantage and went beyond them. For his battalions were well appointed and close compacted of a med men and so charged upon the enemies marching in a long train, and the same encumbered with a deal of cattle: besides, his soldiers were fresh and in heart, whereas the other were wearied with long travel,

A vel. For the enemies set forth at the third watch, and besides their night journey, they had marched three hours also of the day, and without any repose or rest at all, they came to a conflict presently upon their travel on the way. And therefore at the beginning of the battle, so long as they were in any heart, and their strength served, they troubled and disordered the Romans with the first charge they gave; but afterwards for a while they came to be equal in fight, in which hazard of doubtful issue the Propretor vowed to set forth certain solemn games to the honour of Jupiter, in case he might discomfit the enemies, and kill them in chase. At the length the Romans advanced forward more hotly, and the Lusitanians retreated: yea, and anon turned their backs quite. And when as in this train of victory the Romans pursued them hard in the rout, there were of the enemies slain upon 12000, 500 and forty taken prisoners, all in manner horsemen; and of military engines they carried away one hundred thirty and four. Of the Roman army twenty and three only were lost. This battle was fought not far from the City of Ilipta. And thither brought P. Cornelius his victorious army, enriched with prey and pillage. Which was laid all abroad before the Town, and every man had leave given to challenge and claim his own. All the rest was given to the Treasurers for to be sold, and the money raised thereof, was parted among the soldiers.

Now had not C. Flaminius the Pretor as yet taken his leave of Rome, when these things fell out in Spain, and therefore both he and his friends talked and discoursed much upon these occurrences both good and bad, and so far as much as a great war in his Province was broken out to a light fire, and himself was to receive from Sext. Digitius but a small remnant of an army, and the same timorous still and full of fright, as not well recovered of their former flight, he had assented to bring about, that the Senat would assign unto him one of the City-legions; to the end that when he had joined thereto those soldiers which himself had enrolled according to an order let down by the Senat, he might out of all that number choose forth six thousand and five hundred footmen, and three hundred horsemen. With which legion (for in the army of Sext. Digitius he reposed small confidence) he minded to make war. The ancient Senators denied and said, That acts of the Senat were not to be made upon every flying tale and report set abroad and blazed by some particular persons in favor of Magistrates. Neither would they hold any thing for certain, but that which either the Pretors themselves wrote out of the Provinces, or Embassadors sent of purpose, related. And if there were any such commotion and trouble in Spain, they were of advice that the Pretor should levy in half without Italy, such tumultuary soldiers, as in that case were usually taken up. D The intent and mind of the Senat was, that soldiers should in that sort be prest out in Spain, Valerius Antius wisteth that C. Flaminius both failed into Sicily to levy and muster men, and also as he made sail from Sicily toward Spain, was by wind and tempest put with the shore of Affrick; where he found certain soldiers dispersed over the country, remaining of the army of P. Africanus: of whom he took a military oath to serve him in his wars: and that to these levies raised in two Provinces, he joynd also a third in Spain.

The war of the Ligurians likewise grew as fast: for they had already besieged and invested Pise with forty thousand men: and thither resorted and flocked daily unto them great multitudes as well for hope of pillage, as upon the bruit and rumor that went of the war. Minutius the Consul came at the day appointed to Arretium, which was the Reverendissimi where he had commanded all his soldiers to meet him: from whence he marched with a foursquare Battalion toward Pise. And when the enemies had removed their camp a mile from the City on the other side of the River, the Consul entered the Town, which no doubt by his coming he preferred. The next day himself also encamped on the other side of the River, almost half a mile from the enemies, from which place he made light skirmishes with them and saved the territory of his allies from the excursions and robberies of the enemies. He durst not as yet try a battle in pitched field, as having but raw and new soldiers, and those gathered out of many kinds of men and not so well known among themselves: that one might surely trust another. The Ligurians bearing themselves bold of their numbers, not only came forth into the field ready to bid battle, and hazard all upon a throw: but having multitudes at commandment and to spare, sent out into all parts sundry companies to spoil and raise booties as far as to the marches and frontiers of the country. And when they had gathered together much cattail and great store of pillage, they had a strong place of defence ready at hand, well manned and guarded, by means whereof all was conveyed into their boroughes and Towns.

Thus while the Ligurians war was settled about Pise, the other Consul L. Cornelius Merula entered with his army by the utmost confines of the Ligurians into the territory of the Boians: where the war was managed far otherwise than with the Ligurians. For the Consul entered the field in battail array, but the enemies fell off, and would not fight. In so much as the Romans seeing none to come forth and present themselves, ran abroad into all parts to speed their hands with pillage. And the Boians chose rather to suffer their goods to be ransacked making no resistance, than to save the same with the hazard of a battail. The Consul when he had wrought his pleasure and consumed all with fire and sword departed out of the territory of the enemies, and marched toward Marina securely without any regard of himself, as through a peaceable country of his friends. The Boii perceiving one that they were gone out of their limits, followed after with a still and silent march, seeking some convenient place for to lay an ambush. And having in the night season passed beyond the Roman camp, they sailed themselves of a streight passage within a fastness, through which of necessity the Romans must pass, and there they forlaid them.

This

This was not so closely carried, but the Consul had an inkling thereof: and therefore where as his manner was to set out in his march early in the morning, long before day light, now for fear left the darkness of the night should increase the terror of a tumultuary skirmish, he waited for the day. And albeit the sun was up before he removed and set forward, yet he sent out a Troop of horsemen to scour and discover the quarters. And after he was adverted by these espials what number there was of enemies, and in what place they were, he commanded that all the baggage and carriage of the whole army should be bestowed in the mids, and that the Triarii should stake and pale it all about, whilst he with the rest of his forces marched in order of battle, and approached the enemy. The like also did the French, after they once saw that their ambush and trains were detected, and that they must of necessity fight a set pitched battle, where down right blows, clean strength, and pure valour, was to carry away the victory. Thus about the second hour of the day they affronted one another. The left wing of the horsemen of the allies and the extraordinaries fought in the vanguard, under the conduct of two Lieutenants that had been Consuls, to wit, M. Marcellus, and T. Sempronius, Consul the year before. The new Consul one while was in the front of the battle, another while at the tail to keep in the legions, left for eager desire of fight they should advance forward to the conflict before that the signal was given. As for the men of arms belonging to the legions, he commanded Quintius and P. Minutius, Marshals or Colonels, to bring them forth, and conduct them without the battle into a large plain, from whence out of the open ground they should on a sudden charge the enemies, when he gave them a signal by sound of Trumpet. Thus as he was marshalling and directing his men, there came a messenger from T. Sempronius Longus with a report, that the loose Extraordinary K soldiers aforesaid were not able to abide the violence of the Gauls: that very many of them were slain, and those that remained, partly for weariness of travell, and partly for feartful cowardice began to quail their heat of fight; and therefore if he thought to good, he should send one of the two legions to succour, before they had received further dishonor. Whereupon the second legion was sent, and the Extraordinaries retired themselves out of the battle. Then began the conflict anew, by reason that the soldiers came in fresh and in heart, and the legion besides was compleat and fully furnished with all her companies: the left wing of horsemen aforesaid was retired out of the battle, and in lieu thereof, the right wing advanced into the fore-front. By this time the sun with extreme scorching heat, roasted and fried the bodies of the Frenchmen, which of all things can least abide heat: howbeit, standing with their ranks thick and close together, one while they L leaned one upon another: other whilst they rested and bare themselves upon their targets, and sustained the violence of the Romans. Which when the Consul perceived, he commanded C. Livius Sabinus who had the conduct of the light horse in the wings, to send in the quickest horse in all his company, with full carrier to break their ranks: and gave charge that the legionary horsemen should abide behind in the rereguard. This tempest and storm of Cavalry first shuffled and put in disorder the battle of the Gauls, and afterwards brake their ranks and files clean, yet not so, that they turned their backs: for why, their Captains and Leaders would not suffer them, laying about with their runcheons upon the backs of them that so trembled for fear, and forced them again into their ranks: but the light horsemen aforesaid riding among them would not permit them to stand to it, and keep their place. The Consul for his part encouraged and exhorted M soldiers to stick to it awhile, for the victory was in their hands; and to charge still upon them, so long as they saw them disordered and affrighted: for if they suffered their ranks to close again they should abide another conflict, and the same perhaps doubtful and dangerous. The Ensign-bearers he commanded to advance their banners: and thus at length with putting all their power and good will together, they discomfited the enemy, and put him to flight. After they shewed their backs once and took them to their heels, running away on all sides, then the legionary horsemen were sent out after to follow the chase: fourteen thousand Boians that day were slain, a thousand and nine hundred taken prisoners alive: 221 horsemen, three of their Leaders, and of Ensigns were won 212, and chariots 63. The Romans likewise won not this victory for clear, but it cost them some blood. For of their own soldiers and allies together, there died above five thousand, N 23 Centurions, besides four Colonels of Allies, and two Marshals of the second legion, to wit, M. Genutius, and M. Martinus.

At one and the self same time in manner, both the Consuls letters were brought to Rome. Cornelius his letters touching the battle fought at Mutina with the Boians: but the other of Q. Minutius from Pisa were written to this effect. That whereas by lot it belonged to him to hold the assembly for the election of new Magistrates, yet considering in how doubtful terms of hazard his affairs stood in Liguria that he might not possibly depart from thence without the utter ruin of the allies, and hindrance of the weal publick: therefore if it might seem to good unto the LL of the Senat, he would advise them to send unto his brother Consul, that he, who had finished his war, might return to Rome for to hold the foresaid general assembly for the election: but in case O he should think much thereof, because this charge properly appertaineth not to him; he promised them, that himself would do whatsoever the Senate should think good. But he requested them to consider and be well advised. Whether it were not more expedient for the common-weal to proceed rather to an interregnum, than that he should leave the Province in that state of jeopardy. The Senat hereupon gave in charge to C. Scribonius for to send two Embassadors both of Senators calling, unto L. Cornelius the Consul, who should carry also with them unto him the

A the letters of his colleague written and sent unto the Senat: and withal, to let him understand, that unless he would come himself to Rome for the election of new Magistrates to succeed, the Senat would suffer an interregnum rather than call away Q. Minutius from the war unfinished, and wherein he was wholly employed. The Embassadors that were sent, brought word back, that L. Cornelius would repair to Rome himself for the chusing of new Magistrates. As touching the letters of L. Cornelius, wherein he gave them to understand, what happy issue & success he had in the battle with the Boians: there was some reasoning and debate in the Senat-house: for M. Claudius his Lieutenant had written other letters privately to most of the Senators, to this effect; That they were much beholden and bound to give thanks unto the good fortune of the people of Rome, and the valour of the soldiers, in that they sped so well as they did: for by means of the Consul, not only there were a good number of men lost, but also the army of the enemies was escaped out of their hands, when they had fit opportunity presented unto them, of a final defeat and overthrow thereof: and that by this occasion there was a greater number of the soldiers miscarried; for that they who should have rescued and succoured those that were distressed, came too late out of the rereguard: and the reason why the enemies got away and escaped was this, because the legionary horsemen had not the signal soon enough sounded unto them, and could not possibly pursue them in the chase. Therefore as concerning that point, they would not determine any thing rashly and hand over head, but the matter was referred and put over to a more frequent assembly of Senators.

A greater object there was to trouble their heads: for the City was much oppressed with misery: and albeit the avarice and covetousness of men had been well gaged and bridled by many laws concerning usury, yet there was a cautious device and snift found out, to avoid all statutes in that behalf: to wit, that all obligations should pass in the names of allies, and be sealed unto them, who were not tied and bound to observe the laws aforesaid. By which means the creditors enwrapped their debtors in what bonds they list, and forced them to pay extreme interest as they would themselves, without stint. For to see into this disorder and enormity, and to redress the same, it was thought good and order taken, to let down and limit a certain day, namely, upon which the misers were last restrained. From which day all those allies should come in and declare and protest, what money they had put forth upon usury to any citizen: of Rome: and that the creditor should have right to recover those monies put forth from that time, according to such conditions as the debtor would himself. Hereupon, after there were discovered great sums of money and debts contracted by this fraudulent practice, M. Sempronius a Tribune of the Commons, by advice of the Senat propounded a law, and the Commons allowed it. That the same course of putting out money practised between citizen and citizen of Rome, should likewise be in force among the allies of the Latin Nation. In this sort went matters in Italy, both within the City of Rome, and also in the wars abroad.

In Spain the war was nothing so much as the bruit that ran thereof. C. Flaminius in high Spain, wan Ilucia, a Town in the Oretans country: after which exploit, he laid up his soldiers in their winter harbour. And in winter time there passed certain light skirmishes (not worth the naming) against the exursions of brigands and thieves, I may rather say, than enemies: and yet the fortune was variable, and not without some loss of men. As for M. Fulvius he achieved great matters: for he fought in a ranged battle with boians displaced against the Vaccæans, the VeStones, and the Celtiberians, before the Town Toletum: where he discomfited and put to flight the army of those nations, and took prisoner alive, their King Hilernus.

Whiles these things thus passed in Spain, the day drew near, of the solemn election of Magistrates at Rome: and therefore L. Cornelius the Consul having left M. Claudius Lieutenant in the army, came to Rome: who, after he had discomfited in the Senat-house of his own exploits, and in what estate the province stood, he complained to the LL of the Senat, that considering to great a war was brought to an end, by one battle so fortunately and happily fought, there was no solemnity to the honour of the Gods, performed in that behalf. Over and besides, he demanded, That F they would decree a procession and triumph withal. But before the Senators were to deliver their opinions to this demand, Q. Metellus, who had been Consul and Dictator, rose up and said, That there had been letters brought at one and the same time; both from the Consul Cornelius to the Senat, and also from M. Marcellus to a great many of the Senators; and those letters importing contraries: whereupon the consultation of that matter had been deferred and put off to the end that it might be argued and debated in the presence of them both, who wrote the letters: and therefore I ever looked (quoth he) that the Consul (knowing especially that his Lieutenant had written and informed somewhat against him, and considering that himself was to repair to Rome) would have brought him also with him; seeing that it had been more meet and befitting him to have delivered the army to T. Sempronius, one that was in the commission and G had a command, than to a Lieutenant. But it should seem now, that he was left behind far enough off of very purpose, for fear he would avow and justify personally his hand-writing, and charge him face to face: and that if the Consul should make report of any untruth, he might be challenged therefore, and the thing sifted and canvased, until the truth appeared clearly and came to light: and therefore my opinion is (quoth he) that nothing be determined at this present, as touching the demands of the Consul. But when as he persisted notwithstanding, and followed the suit still, namely, that they would ordain a solemn procession, and that himself might enter the

the City, riding in triumph: then Marcus and C. Titinius, both Tribuns of the Commons, protested, that they would interpose their negative, and cancel the order of the Senat in that behalf.

The Censors for that time, were Sex. Julius Pater and C. Cornelius Cethegus, created the year before. Cornelius took a review of the City and numbered the people; and there were accounted by his survey 143704 polls of Citizens. Great floods arose that year, and Tyber overflowed all the flats and plain places of the City: and about the gate Flumentana certain houses and buildings were overthrown withal, and laid along. The gate Calmontana besides, was stricken with lightning, and the wall about it was likewise blasted from heaven. At Aricia, Lanuvium, and in mount Aventin, it rained stones. And reported it was from Capua, that a great swarm of Walps came flying into the market place, and leaped upon the Temple of Mars: which being with great care taken up and gathered together, were afterward consumed with fire. In regard of these prodigious tokens, order was given, that the Decemvirs should search and peruse the books of Sibylla: whereupon a novendial sacrifice (to continue nine days) was appointed, a publick procession solemnized, and the City was cleaned and hallowed. About the same time M. Porcius Cato, dedicated the Chappel of Virgin Victory, near to the Temple of the Goddess Victory, two years after that he had vowed it. In that year also the Triumvirs, C. Manlius Vulso, L. Apulius Fullo, and P. Aelius Tubero, (who had preferred a bill of request about the planting of a Colony) had commission granted, to conduct a Colony of Latins into the country of Arurium: and thither went three thousand footmen and three hundred horsemen: a small number in comparison of the largeness and quantity of the territory. There might well have been set out thirty acres for every footman, and three score for an horseman: but by the motion and advice of Apulius, one third part of the Lands was excepted and reserved; to the end, that afterwards in time, they might enrol new Colonies if it pleased them. And therefore the footmen had twenty acres, and the horsemen forty apiece.

Now approached the end of the year, and more ambition there was, and hotter suit for place of dignity in the election of Consuls, than ever had been known any time before. Many mighty men, as well of the Patritii and nobles, as the Commoners, toiled and laboured hard for the Consulship. To wit, P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of Cneius, who lately was departed out of Spain after he had achieved many worthy deeds. L. Quintus Flaminius who had been Admiral of the navy in Greece, and Cn. Manlius Vulso, all of the Nobility. But of the Commons were C. Lelius, Cn. Domitius, C. Lucius Sulpicius, and M. Atilius. But all mens eyes were fixed upon Quintus and Cornelius. For they desired one place, being both of them nobly descended, and their flesh glory for feats of war. They recommended both the one and the other. But above all other things, the brethren of these competitors, two most renowned warriors of their time, let the debate on a light fire. The glory of Scipio, as it was the greater of the twain, so it was more subject to envy. The honour of Quintus was more fresh, as who that year had newly triumphed. Over and besides, the one of them had been now almost ten years continually conversant in the eyes of men (a thing that maketh great men not so highly regarded, by reason that they are grown stale, and the world is full already of them) also he had been twice Consul, and Censor since he vanquished Annibal. But in Quintus all was fresh and new, to win the good grace and favor of men. And more than that, he neither after his triumph had obtained ought of the people, nor, to say a truth, requested any thing. He alleged, that he made suit for his own natural and whole brother by both sides, and not for a Cousin German: in the behalf of a very companion and partaker with him in the managing of the war (for as himself served by Land, to his brother performed many exploits by sea.) So he obtained, that Quintus should be preferred before his competitor, whom Africanus and his brother Alaricus brought in and graced, whom the whole race of Cornelii seemed to countenance. even then when a Cornelius Consul, was president of the election and held the assembly: whom the Senat had given so grave a testimony of, in adjudging him to be the best man simply in all the City, and thought most worthy to receive the goddess, Jane Idæa, coming from Pellus into the City of Rome. Thus were L. Quintus, and Cn. Domitius Enobarbus created Consuls, in such sort, that Africanus was of no credit, and bare no stroke at all (ye may be sure) in the election of a Consul out of the third estate of Commons, albeit he employed himself, and did his best for C. Lelius. The next day after were the Pretors elected namely, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Fulvius Centimulus, A. Atilius Serranus, M. Papius Tampilus, L. Valerius Tappus, and Q. Salinius Sarras. In this year M. Aemilius Lepidus and L. Emilius Paulus, the Censors, bare themselves off in their office, as they made their year to be notable and much spoken of. They condemned and fined many of the City graziers or farmers of the common pastures: and which were set up on the final or lastern of Trifurcus Temple. They made one terrace or gallery without the gate Trigenia, with a high batt. Hall or Burle adjoined thereto, near Tyber: and another from the gate Fontinalis they built in length as far as to the Altar of Mars, leading to Mars field.

For a long time nothing was done in Liguria worth the remembrance. But about the end of the year twice were the Romans in great jeopardy: for both the camp of the Consul was assailed and hardly defended. and also not long after, as the Roman host marched through a straight pass, the army of the Ligurians kept the very gullet of the passage, and the Consul seeing he could not make way through, turned his ensigns, and began to retire the same way he came: but by that time, some of the enemies had gained also the back part of the pass, inasmuch as the lamentable

A lamentable remembrance of the Gaudine overthrow, not only presented it self to their spirit and mind, but also was in manner an object to their eye. Now had he amongst his auxiliary or aid-forces, to the number almost of eight hundred horse. Whole Captain promised the Consul, that he and his would break through whither way he would, let him only bid him which of the two quarters were better peopled and inhabited: for the first thing that he did, he would fire their Villages and houses: to the end, that the fear and fright thereof might force the Ligurians to depart out of the chafe which they held and bfer, and run to succour their own neighbours. The Consul commended him highly, and fed him with hope of large rewards. Whereupon the Numidians mounted on horseback, and began to ride about the camp, degrading of the enemies, without offering to charge upon any man. At the first, a man that had seen them, would have

B thought nothing more contemptible, being both men and horse, little, spare and gaunt. The horseman unarmed and without weapon, save that he carried about him some light darts: the horses without bridles: and as they ran shouting out their stiff necks, and bearing their heads forward without any reining at all, they made a very ill favoured sight. And the riders, for to make themselves more despised, would on purpose seem to take fals from their hories, and made their enemies good sport. Whereupon they (who if at first they had been assailed, would have been heedful and ready to have received the charge, now at full (many of them unarmed) to behold this pleasant pastime. The Numidians would gallop toward them and presently ride by, as by little and little they gained ground, and advanced nearer to the pass, yet making semblance, as if they had had no rule of their hories, but were carried thither against their wills. At last, they set spurs to their hories indeed, and brake through the midst of the enemies guards: and so soon as they had recovered the open ground, they let on fire all the houses near the high way side, and so forward they burnt the next village they came unto, and destroyed all afore them with fire and sword. First, the smoke that was delcrid, afterwards, the outcry heard of them that were affrighted in the villages, and last of all, the children and old folk that fled to save themselves, made a trouble and hurlyburly in the camp: inasmuch, as every man of himself without advice, without warrant or direction, made what halt he could to run and save his own. Thus in the turning of an hand, the camp was abandoned, and the Consul delivered from siege, arrived thither where he intended.

But neither Boians nor Spaniards (with whom that year the Romans made war) were so spitefully and maliciously bent against them, as the whole nation of the Ætolians. They at the very first were in very good hope, that presently upon the remove of the forces out of Greece, Antiochus would have entred Europe, and seized upon the vacant possession thereof: and that neither Philip nor Nabie would be in reit and do nothing. But seeing them not to stir in any place, they thought it high time to make some trouble and confusion themselves, for fear lest by delays and lingering, all their designments would turn to nothing: and therefore they published a Dict or Council to be holden at Naupactum. In which assembly Thoon their Pretor, after he had made grievous complaint of the wrongs received by the Romans, moving and soliciting the Rate of Ætolia (for that they of all other nations and Cities of Greece, were least honoured and let by after that victory, whereof they had been the cause) gave his advice, That there should be Embassadors sent to all the neighbour Kings, not only to sound their minds and affections, but also to incite

E and prick them every one forward to enter into arms against the Romans. So Damocritus was addressed to Nabie, Nicander to Philip, and Dicaarchus the brother of the Pretor unto Antiochus. Damocritus was in commission to signify unto the tyrant of Lacedæmon, "That by the loss of his maritime Cities, the very strings and sinews of his tyranny and Kingdom were cut in sunder: "For from thence was he furnished with soldiers, from thence had he his ships and servants at sea: whereas now, he might see the Achæans LL, and rulers of Peloponnesus, whilst himself was pinned up and enclosed within his walls and never should he have opportunity to recover himself. If he let pass this that presently was offered unto him, No Roman army was now in Greece: "and never would the Romans think it sufficient cause, to pass over the Seas with their legions into Greece, for any occasion of Gythium or other Laconian inhabiting the Sea-coasts. These reasons were laid forth to incense the courage of the tyrant, to the end, that when Antiochus was once passed over into Greece, he being touched in conscience, that he had broken the Roman league by committing outrage upon their allies, might of necessity join and band with Antiochus. "Scemblable remontrances and reasons used Nicander for to provoke and persuade Philip: and "much more matter he had to enforce that point, as the King was depoled from much higher degree of estate than the tyrant had been, and also had sustained far greater losses. To this, he alleged the ancient name and renown of the KK, of Macedon; and how that nation had overrun the whole world and filled all places with their noble conquests & victories. Moreover he said, That he advised him to take a courie, which was safe both to be enterprised, and also easy to be executed. For he gave not Philip counsel to stir, before that Antiochus were passed over with "an army into Greece: and considering that he without the aid of Antiochus had maintained war so long against the Romans and Ætolians, what possible means had the Romans to withstand "him assisted with Antiochus & the Ætolians his allies, who even then were fiercer enemies than the Romans? Over and besides, he inferred this reason also, what a brave and doughty Captain "Antiochus was, a man even born to be an enemy to the Romans, and who had slain already more leaders and soldiers of theirs, than were left behind. These were the allegations of Nicander to "Philip. As for Dicaarchus, he had other motives to persuade with Antiochus. First, and principally pally above all others, he affirmed, "That howsoever the prize and booty of Philip fell to the Romans, the victory was gained and achieved by the Ætolians, and none but they either gave the Romans entrance and passage into Greece, or furnished them with forces for the performance and accomplishment of the victory. Then he shewed and made promise what power as well of foot as horse they would present unto Antiochus toward his wars, what places they would give him for his land-forces, and what havens and harbours for his strength and army at Sea. After all this he stuck not (to serve his own turn) for to over-reach and tell a loud lie as touching Philip and Nabis, in giving out confidently that they were both of them ready and at the point to renew war: and would take the vantage of the very first opportunity and occasion that could be presented, to recover those things which by war they had lost. Thus the Ætolians laboured to set all the world at once upon the top of the Romans. Howbeit, the King, were he not moved at all with their sollicitings, or belittled them more slowly than they looked for. But sent immediately about all the Towns by the Sea side, certain persons of purpose to sow discord and kindle seditions among them: and some of their principal citizens he won by gifts and presents to his own purpose and designs: but such as stiffly continued fast and firm in alliance and allegiance with the Romans, those he made away and murdered. Now had T. Quintius given in charge and commission to the Ætolians, for to guard all the Laconians that dwelt upon the Sea-coasts: and therefore presently they both dispatched their Embassadors unto the Tyrant, to put him in mind of the confederacy and affection with the Romans, and to warn him and give him advertisement, that in no wise he would trouble that peace, which he had so earnestly craved and fought for: and also sent aid unto Gythium, which now the tyrant began to assault: yea, and addressed other Embassadors also to Rome to give intelligence of these occurrences.

Antiochus the King after he had that winter time given his daughter in marriage to Prolemæus the King of Egypt: at Rhaphia a City in Phœnicia, retired to Antiochia: and in the very end of that same winter, passed through Cilicia over the mountain Taurus, and came to Ephefus. And from thence in the beginning of the Spring, after he had sent his son Antiochus into Syria for to defend and keep in obedience the utmost frontiers of his Kingdom, left in his absence there might arise some troubles behind his back, he marched with all his Land-forces against the Pisidians, who in some habit abode at Salga.

At the same time the Romans Embassadors P. Sulpicius and P. Villius, who as we said before had been sent unto Antiochus with direction, first to visit K. Eumenes, arrived at Elaa, and from thence went up to Pergamus, where Eumenes kept his royal court. Eumenes was desirous in his heart that Antiochus should be warred upon: supposing verily, that if he were at peace, being a Prince so much mightier than himself, he would be but an ill and dangerous neighbour to fear onto him: but if war were once foot, that he would be no more able to beard and match the Romans than Philip had been: and that either he should wholly be overthrown and come to utter ruin: or if, being vanquished, he had peace given unto him by the Romans: then, as he lost much thereby and would be weaker, so himself should gain by the bargain, and grow mightier, that afterwards he might be able easily of himself to make his part good, and hold his own against him, without the help and aid of the Romans: or if any misfortune should happen unto him, he were better by far to hazard any fortune whatsoever in the Roman society, than either alone to endure the Lordly dominion of Antiochus and be subject, or in refusing to obey, be compelled thereto by force and arms. For these causes he employed all the credit and authority he had, yea, and addressed all counsel that he could devise for to prick on and set forward the Romans in this war. Sulpicius all counsel that he could devise for to prick on and set forward the King was occupied and busied remained behind sick at Pergamus. But Villius advertised that the King was occupied and busied in the Pisidian war, went to Ephefus: and whilst he abode there some few days, he endeavoured and made means to have conference oftentimes with Annibal, who haply at that time sojourned there, both to sound his mind if possibly he could, and also to secure him of all fear from the Romans. In these meetings and communications, no other thing passed nor was done between them. But few what ensued hereupon of it self, as if it had been a thing wrought and compassed of meall policy. Annibal by this means was lessened by and in smaller credit with the King, yea, and in all policy. Annibal by this means was lessened by and in smaller credit with the King, yea, and in all policy. matters began to be more and more suspected and had in jealousie. Claudius (the Historian) who followed the Greek books of Ælius, writeth that P. Africanus was joyed in that embassy, and that he talked and devised with Annibal at Ephefus: and namely, maketh report of one conference and speech between them twain: and that is this, Africanus demanded of Annibal, whom in his judgment, he took to have been the greatest commander for feats of arms, that ever was: to which he made answer, that he judged Alexander the King of the Macedonians was simply the most excellent warrior: in this regard, that he with a small power had defeated innumerable armies: and besides had passed as far as to the utmost bounds of the whole earth, even to those lands, that a man would think incredible for any one to reach unto. And when he asked again whom he deemed worthy to stand in the second place: he answered, that Pyrhus was the man: for that he first taught how to pitch a camp and above all other points of military skill no man knew better to choose out commodious ground and places of advantage, or more cunningly to plant and dispose garrisons: besides he had such a sleight and dexterity to draw and win men unto him, that the Italian nations had rather been subject to him a foreign Prince, than to live under the people of Rome, notwithstanding they had of long time the Seignory and rule of those parts. And

A when he proceeded still to know whom he reputed for the third, he made no striking at the matter, but named himself. Whereupon Scipio took up a laugh, and replied again: What would you say then, if your hap had been to have subdued me? May then, quoth he, I would think I were worthy to be set before Alexander, before Pyrhus, yea, and before all other martial men and commanders in the whole world. At this answer, Scipio took delight and pleasure, to see how subtly and cautiously he had like a cunning Carthaginian, touched his words in a certain kind of flattery, as if he had requited him from out of the range and rank of all other Captains as being by many degrees incomparable, and far above all others. Then Villius went onward from Ephefus to Apamea: and thither Antiochus also repaired for to meet him, hearing of the coming of Roman legats. In this communication and conference at Apamea, the matter was debated much after the same sort, as it had been at Rome between Quintius and the Kings Embassadors. But the news of Antiochus the Kings son his death (whom I said a little before to have been sent into Syria) brake off the peace. Great mourning and sorrow there was in the Kings Court, and much was that young Prince misdeed and moaned, for that good proof he had given of himself, that if he had lived any long time, he would have proved by all likelihood of this towardsness, a great, a mighty, and a righteous King. The deerer and better beloved he was of all men, the more fulpitious was his death: and namely, that his father doubting that he would prefigure and be instant to succeed him in his old age, took order by the ministry of certain Eunuchs or gilded men (persons greatly accepted with Kings for such services) to have him poisoned. And they say that another cause also set him forward to commit this secret act, because having given the City Lysimachia to his son Seleucus, he had no such place to bestow upon Antiochus his son, for to keep his residence in, whereunto he might have removed him farther off from his own person, under colour of doing him honor. Howbeit, great semblance and shew there was of much mourning and lamentation all over the court for certain dayes: in so much as the Roman Embassador retired himself to Pergamus, because he was loth to converse there uncivilly, at so unseasonable a time. The King returned to Ephefus, and gave over the war that he had enterprized. Where, the court res being shut by occasion of the mourning time, he devised and consulted in great secret with Minio an inward friend unto him, and whom of all other he loved best, and trusted most. This Minio a meet stranger and altogether ignorant in foreign affairs and forces, meaning and effecting the power and greatness of the King by his exploits done in Syria or in Asia, deemed verily, that Antiochus had not only the better cause, in that the Romans demanded unreasonable conditions: but also should have the upper hand in the trial thereof by war. When as now the King resolved to have any conference and dispute with the Embassadors, either for that he knew by good experience that it would be bootless for him to do so, or because he was troubled in spirit upon this late and fresh object of grief and sorrow: Minio undertook the business, and protested that he would speak to the point of the matter and to good purpose, and so persuaded the King to send for the Embassadors from Pergamus. By this time Sulpicius was recovered of his sickness, and therefore both of them repaired to Ephefus: where Minio exalted the King, and in his absence they began to treat about their affairs. Then Minio with a premeditated oration began in this wise. "I see well (qd, he) that you Romans pretend unto the world a goodly title of letting free the Cities of Greece, but your deeds are not answerable to your words: and ye have let down unto Antiochus one manner of law to be tied unto, and practise your selves another. For how cometh it about that the Smyrneans and Lampacens should be Greeks, more than the Neapolitans, the Rhégins, and Tarentins, of whom you exact tribute and require ships by virtue of the accord and covenants between you? Why send you yearly to Syracuse and other Greek Cities of Sicily, a Pretorin sovereign authority, with his rods and axes? Certainly, ye have nothing else to say, but that ye have subdued them in war, and by right of conquest have imposed these conditions upon them. The like, yea, and the same cause know ye that Antiochus allegeth as concerning Smyrna, Lampacis, and other Cities and states of Ionis and Æolis. For having been conquered in war by his ancestors and progenitors, having I say been made tributary and liable to impositions, he challenge length of them the ancient rights and duties due from them, and to him belonging. And therefore if ye will debate and treat the question according to equity and reason and not rather pick quarrels and seek occasions of war. I would gladly know what ye will answer to him in this point? To this Sulpicius made answer in this wise. "The Antiochus (qd, he) hath done very well and with good regard of modesty, in that having no other matters to plead unto for his defence and the maintenance of his cause, he hath made choice of any other rather than himself to be the speaker. For what one thing is there alike in those cities which you have named and put in comparison? Of the Rhégins, Neapolitans and Tarentins, we demand that which is our due according to the deeds of covenants indentured, and hath ever been since time that first they were in subjection under us: that I say which we have challenged and enjoyed by virtue of one continued course and tenor of right, by us ever practised without any intermission or interruption. And are ye able to avouch, that as those nations neither by themselves nor by any other have altered and changed the accord between us and them, so the Cities of Asia, when they once became subject to the ancestors of Antiochus, remained always in the perpetual possession of your Kingdom? And not rather, that some of them have been under the obedience of Philip & others obedient to Prolemæus? Yea, and divers of them for many years have been free & used their own liberties without contradiction, and no words or doubt made thereof? For admit this once,

"that (because these Cities sometime were in bondage through the iniquity of those times where-
 "in they were oppressed) there shall be a right pretended, and the same be effectual to reduce
 "them again after so many ages into servitude? What wanteth it but ye may as well say, that we "have done just nothing, in delivering Greece out of the hands of Philip? and that his successors "and posterity may claim again and lay title to Corinth, Chalch, Demetrius, and the whole Thessa-
 "lian nation? But what mean I to maintain the cause of the Cities of Greece, whom I was more
 "meet and reasonable that both we and the King himself would give audience unto, and let them "plead what they can for their own selves? With that he commanded the embassages of the Ci"ties to be called in, which were prepared and instructed aforehand by Eumenes, who made this "reckoning, that whatsoever strength went from Antiochus, should accrue and come unto him and "his Kingdom. Many were admitted to speak: and whilst every one set forward his own cause, I
 "some by way of complaint, others in manner of demand, each one putting in for himself without "regard of right or wrong, so he served his own turn, they fell at length from reasoning to warbling
 "and wrangling: in so much, as the Embassadors returned to Rome as uncertain and doubtful in all "matters as they were when they came, without releasing or obtaining any one thing at all.

When they were dismissed and gone, the King held a Council as touching the Roman war. In "which assembly, some delivered their opinion more freely and stoutly than others: but generally
 "the more bitter speech that any one used against the Romans, the greater hope he had to enter in"to especial grace and favour with the King. One above the rest, inveighed much and spake against "those proud and insolent demands of the Romans, who imposed hard laws and conditions upon "Antiochus, the mightiest King of all Asia as if he had been no better than Nabis, whom they had "conquered and subdued. And yet (saith he) they left unto Nabis some seignory and dominion in "his own country and City of Lacedemon: whereas if Lampsacum and Smyrna should be at the "command of Antiochus, they deemed that an unworthy thing and a very indignity. Others opined
 "and said, "that those two Cities were but small causes, and not worth the naming, for so puissant
 "a Prince to stand upon and to war for. But always (say they) men begin with just and reasona"ble demands, to make an overture and way to compels and obtain that which is unjust. Unless "one would believe, that when the Persians requested of the Lacedemonians, water and earth,
 "they stood in need of a clot & turf of ground, or a draught of water. In like sort for all the world
 "the Romans do but sound and try the King in their demands touching these two Cities. For o"ther Cities likewise, so soon as they shall perceive that those two have shaken off the yoke of "obedience, will soon revolt and turn to that people which is their deliverer, and at whose hands
 "they hope for liberty. And say, that freedom were not to them more dear and precious than "bondage, yet it is the nature of every man to feed and please himself with a bare hope of a change "and new world, much more, than with the assured hold of any present fate whatsoever. There "was in place at this council, Alexander of Acarnania, one who sometime had sided with Philip: but
 "of late days was slain from him and followed the court of Antiochus, a more wealthy and magni"ficent Prince: and being taken for a politician who had a special insight into the state of Greece, &
 "was not ignorant of the affairs of Rome, had wound himself into high favour and inward friend"ship with the King, that he was taken in to be one of his privy council, and acquainted with all "his secrets. This man, as if the question in hand had been, not, Whether war should be levied or "no: but, Where, and by What means, and How it should be managed, spake aloud & said, "That "he made full reckoning and account in his very spirit and heart of the victory, in case the King
 "would pass the Seas over into Europe, to plant & settle himself in some part of Greece, and there
 "wage war: for at his very first coming he should see in arms already the Aetolians, that inhabit
 "the very heart and centre of Greece, who would be the only Captains and port-enigens to march "before them, ready to venture and enter upon the most difficult and dangerous enterprises of "war. Again, in the two cantons and angles as it were thereof, he should find Nabis of the one "side from Peloponnesus at hand to rise and raise those quarters, with intent to regain the City of "the Argives, to win again the maritime Cities, which the Romans have disfeized & disposed "him off, and have muted and shut him within the walls of Lacedemon. On the other side from "Macedony, Philip would no doubt take arms, so soon as he shall hear the first alarm and sound of "trumpet. Full well (qd. he) know I his courage, and of what spirit and stomach he is right well I
 "wot that he hath fostered in that breast of his for a long time, anger and despite like to these wild
 "and savage beasts, which either are kept within iron gates or fast tied and bound: and as well I "remember, how many a time he was wont (during the wars) to pray heartily to all the Gods,
 "to vouchsafe for to give him Antiochus for his helper and assistant: and if now he might enjoy "his wish and have the thing so long desired and prayed for he would without any delay, enter in"to arms and war incontinently. Only (qd. Alexander) we must not linger and stay nor drive off,
 "for as much as herein consisteth the very point of victory, even betimes to seize upon commo"dious places of advantage, before the enemies be possessed of them. Also with all speed, Amibal
 "dies place into Affrick, whereby the Romans may be distracted, and compelled to turn them "selves sundry wayes. Amibal only was not called to this council: for by reason of the fore said "conferences with Philip, the King had him in some jealousy, and therefore he was out of favour,
 "and of no credit and account with him. At the first, he put up this disgrace and made no words,
 "but afterwards he thought it a better course, both to demand the cause of so sudden strangeness
 "and alienation of his, and also to take some good time to excuse and purge himself. And therefore "upon

A upon a day having simply asked of the King, and heard the cause of his anger toward him, "My "father Amilcar (qd. he) O Antiochus, when upon a time he sacrificed unto the Gods, caused me
 "a (a very little one) to be brought and presented before the Altar, where he forced me to touch the "flame with my hand, and to take an oath, Never to be friend unto the people of Rome, To accom"plish and fulfill this oath, I maintained the wars for the space of six and thirty years by virtue of "this oath, in time of peace I was driven out of my native country: and being fled from thence,
 "this oath brought me into your court: and by the guidance and direction of this oath, if you "should disappoint me of my hope, yet whatsoever I know there are forces, whereof ever I hear
 "there is any stirring and rustling of arms, I shall seek all the world over, until I find some Roman "enemies. And therefore, if there be any of your Courtiers that have a mind and desire to advance "themselves in your good grace and would grow by carrying tales and accusing me unto you, let "them find some other subject and matter to do this by me: for I hate the Romans, as you like"wise hated of them, That this is truth which I say, my father Amilcar and the Gods in heaven,
 "can testify. Wherefore, whensoever you shall think to make war with the Romans, see you enter"tain Amibal for one of your greatest and most assured friends: but if any o current civil force
 "you to peace, seek some other councillor and not me, to consult withal about that point. This "speech was so effectual, that not only it prevailed with the King, but also reconciled Amibal unto "his grace. And so they departed out of the council with a full resolution to make war.

At Rome it was commonly talked and discoursed, that Antiochus was an enemy, but no provi"sion and preparation there was for war, but only whetting the edge of their stomaks. For both
 "C Consuls had no other Province but Italy assigned unto them to govern. And they were either to "agree between themselves, or else to call lots, whether of the twain should hold the general assem"bly, and be president of the election for that year. And the whole hap was not to be charged with "that business, was to be in readiness to lead forth the legions into any place out of Italy, as need "should require. And to this Consul it was permitted to enrol two new legions of Citizens, and
 "besides of allies and Latins 20000 foot, and 800 horse. To the other Consul were appointed "those two legions, which L. Cornelius the Consul of the former year had under his governance: al"so of allies and Latins 15000 footmen out of the lame army, and 500 horse. As for Q. Minutius, "his commission was continued still for the conduct of that army which he had in Liguria. And for
 "to supply and make up the broken companies, he was allowed to enrol 4000 Roman footmen, "and 150 horse, and likewise to levy of the allies 5000 foot, and 250 horse for that service. To
 "D Cn. Domitius it fell by lot, that he should go with a power out of Italy, whither (soever the Senate "gave order: and unto Quintius to govern Gaul. Then the Pretors election followed, who like"wise call lots for their Provinces. M. Fulvius Centumalus had the civil jurisdiction, and L. Scri"bonius Libo the forraign. L. Valerius Tappus governed Sicily, Q. Salonus Sarcus, Sardinia: M. Ba-"bius Tampilus high Spain, and A. Attilius Serranus the bale. But these two changed their Pro"vinces, first by an order from the Senate, and afterwards by an act also of the Commons. For to "Attilius Macedonia was assigned and the navy, and to Babius the country of the Bruttii. Flami-
 "nius and Fulvius continued in the government and command of Spain, and to Babius Tampilus
 "for the rule of the Bruttii, were those two legions: appointed which the year before lay in the City,
 "E with commission to take up and levy of allies fifteen thousand foot, and five hundred horse to go
 "thither. As for Attilius had in charge to cause thirty galleies to be made with five banks of oars
 "on a side, and to take out of the harbors and docks as many old vessels as were fit for service, and "to enrol mariners and rowers. The Consuls also were enjoined to deliver unto him two thou"sand allies of the Latin nation, and a thousand Roman footmen. It was commonly voyced, that "these two Pretors with two armies both by Land and at Sea, were prepared against Nabis, who "openly now assailed the confederates of the people of Rome. But still the Embassadors were look"ed for, who had been sent unto King Antiochus, and the Senat commended the Consul Domitius "not to depart from the City before their return. The Pretors, Fulvius and Scribonius, whose "charge it was to minister law and execute justice in Rome, had commission to provide a hundred
 "F galleies, besides that fleet which Attilius was to command. But before that either Consuls or
 "Pretors went forth into their Provinces, there was a profection holden, in regard of the prodigies
 "and fearful sights that were reported. For word was brought out of Picenum, that a three-
 "goat had yeained six kids at once, and that it rained earth at Amerinum: and at Formia, that a gate "and wall of the City were smitten with lightning: and (that which most of all troubled and "frighted the Consul Domitius) that an Ox spake these words, Rome, take heed to thy self. In regard
 "of the other prodigious tokens, there was a supplication holden: but as for the Ox, the Sooth-"sayers and bowel-priests gave commandment, that he should with great care be kept and nourish"ed. The Tyber also with more violence overflowed into the City than in the former year, and over"threw two bridges and many buildings, especially about the gate Flumentana. Moreover, a mighty
 "G huge flood shaken out of the Capitol cliff, fell from thence into the street called Ingarum, either "by the force and violence of rain, or some earthquake (which if there were any was so little, that it "could not be perceived) and that stone killed many a man. In the country also, by reason of this "deluge, much cattle was carried away with the flood, and many farm houses and granges were "born down and laid along.

Before that L. Quintius the Consul was arrived into his Province, Q. Minutius fought a bat"tle with the Ligurians in the territory of Pise, and slew nine thousand enemies: the rest he dis"comfited,

committed, put to flight and chased into their camp; which being assailed, was defended manfully with much fighting until dark night: and then the Ligurians slip away in the night season secretly. And by the dawning of the next day the Romans entered and seized thereof when it was empty of the enemies. Lest pillage was there found, for that ever and anon what booties looted they got in the country they sent home to their homes. Mimnius notwithstanding gave the enemies no repose from that time forward. For being departed out of the territory of Pisa he came into Liguria, where he destroyed their boroughs and Castles, and put all to fire and sword. There the Roman souldiers filled their hands with the Tulcan prizes, sent thither by the forragers and robbers.

Much about this time the Embassadors returned to Rome, from the KK, who brought word and made relation of nothing that was sufficient to enforce them to proceed in any halt to war. I but only against the Lacedæmonian tyrant, by whom (as the Achaean Embassadors also gave intelligence) the Sea coasts of Laconia were wronged and assailed, against the covenants of the league. Whereupon Attillus the Pretor was sent with a fleet to defend the associates. And forasmuch as there was no imminent peril from Antiochus, it was thought good, that both the Consuls should go into their Provinces. Domitius took his journey, and went the neerest way by Ariminum, and Quintus came into the Boians country by the way of Liguria. And these two Consuls armies in divers quarters, waited all abroad the enemies country. At the first time few of their Gentlemen and Horsemen, together with their Captains; afterwards, all those of Senators calling; and last of all, as many as were of any repute, worth and worship, to the number of fifteen hundred fled to the Consul.

Likewise in both Spain that year, the affairs went prosperously: for not only C. Flaminius won by force of mantelets and engines of battery the rich and strong Town Litabrum, and took prisoner alive their Lord Corribilo a noble Prince, but also M. Fulvius the Pro-consul fought with two armies of the enemies twice, and put them to the worke; and won by assault two Towns of the Spaniards Vesetia and Holone, with many other fortresses: the rest of themselves revolted unto him. After this he made a journey into the Oretans country, & there having gotten two towns, Nolit and Cusibi, he set forward and marched to the river Tagus. In that quarter there stood Tolennum a small City, but strongly fortified: whiles he assaulted it, there came a mighty army of the Vectons to aid the Toletans, with whom he fought a free field, and won the day, and having defeated the Vectons, he forced the Toletans with engines of battery, and won the Town.

But all the wars which at that time were in hand, nothing troubled the LL, of the Senate so much as the expectation of the war, which Antiochus had not yet begun and enterprised. For albeit they had ever and anon certain advertisements and intelligences of all things by their Embassadors, yet many flying tales and headless bruits there went without any certain Authors, reporting lies as well as truths. And among the rest there ran a rumor, that Antiochus, so soon as he was come into Æolia, would presently put over a fleet into Sicily. Whereupon the Senate, notwithstanding they had sent Attillus the Pretor with a fleet into Greece yet forasmuch as there was need not of forces only but also of authority to entertain the hearts and affections of their allies, they sent over T. Quintus, Cn. Octavius, Cn. Servilius, and P. Villius as Embassadors into Greece, and gave order that M. Fabius should advance his legions out of the country of the Brutians, toward Tarentum and Brundisium, that from thence if need required, he might sail over into Macedonia. Moreover, that M. Fulvius the Pretor should put out a fleet of thirty sail, for the defence of the coast of Sicily, and that the Admiral thereof should have full commission there to command (now L. Oppius Salsitor, who the former year had been one of the Ædiles of the Commons, had the conduct of those ships.) Also, that the same Pretor should address his letters unto L. Valerius his Colleague, and advertised him that it was to be feared, that the armada of King Antiochus would cross over out of Æolia into Sicily; and therefore it was the will and pleasure of the Senate, that he should take up and enrol into that army which he had already, of sumutuary souldiers 12000 footmen, and 400 horse, by whole means he might defend that coast of the Province which looketh toward Greece. For the levy of these forces, the Pretor took musters not only in Sicily, but also in the Isles adjacent and lying thereabout, and fortified with good garrisons all the Towns upon the Sea side which lie toward Greece. Those Romans afore said were fed still and maintained by the coming of Attalus the brother of Eumenes, who reported that King Antiochus was passed over Hell Spontis with an army; and that the Ætolians were in that forwardness, that they would be preit and ready in arms against his arrival. Great thanks were given as well to Eumenes in his absence, as to Attalus there present in place. Also order was taken, that he should have a lodging allowed him at his pleasure, and his charges born for his diet and house-keeping. Moreover, there were given him as presents two great horses of service, two pair of horsemens armors, as much silver plate as amounted to an hundred pound weight; and of gold plate, as much as weighed 20 pound.

And forasmuch as messengers one after another advertised and gave warning, that war was at hand, it was thought requisite and expedient, that the new Consuls should be chosen in all convenient speed: whereupon a decree passed from the Senat, that M. Fulvius the Pretor should forthwith dispatch his letters unto the Consul, to certify him of the Senats pleasure, namely, that he should commit the government of his Province and the army unto his Lieutenants, and return himself unto Rome, and in his way send out his writs aforehand for the publishing of an assembly general

* or Nobilis, * Tolenn

A general for the election of Consuls. The Consul obeyed these letters, directed forth his summons in manner afore said, and came to Rome. In this year also great ambition there was, and much suit for the dignity of government. For that three noblemen stood for one place namely, P. Cornelius Scipio the son of Gnaeus, who the former year had the repute, L. Cornelius Scipio, and Cn. Claudius Vellej. The Consulship was conferred upon P. Scipio, so as it might appear to the whole world, that this honour was deferred only, and not fully denied to so worthy a personage. His adjoint companion in government was M. Atilius Glabrus, a man by calling a commoner. The morrow after were the Pretors chosen, to wit, L. Aemilius Paulus, L. Aemilius Lepidus, M. Porcius Cato, A. Cornelius Mammula, C. Licinius, & L. Oppius, both surnamed Salsitor. This Oppius was he that had the conduct into Sicily of a fleet of thirty sail. Mean while that the new Magistrates came into the government of their Provinces, M. Fabius was commanded to pass over with all his power from Brundisium into Epirus, and to keep his forces about Apollonia, and M. Fulvius the Pretor of the City had in charge to build fifty new Galeaces called Quinquemeis, of five banks of oars on either side. And thus verily the people of Rome was provided against all enterprises and attempts of King Antiochus whatsoever.

Neither was Nabis behind for his part in levying war; but afflicted with great fear of the Town of Gybeum; and of a mischievous and malicious mind against the Achaean, for tending a gatredon to aid the besieged Townsmen, he forraged and waited their country. The year was not put on in hand with war, before their Embassadors were returned from Rome, in which they might know the pleasure and will of the Senat; but after the return of those Embassadors, they both published a Diet and general Council at Sicyone, and also sent their Embassadors to Quintus for his advice and counsel. In this Diet, all their opinions inclined and tended to make war out of hand: only the letters of T. Quintus made some stay of the enterprise, wherein he advised them to expect the Pretor and navy of the Romans. Now when the States there assembled in council were distressed, some perishing still in their former opinion, and others of mind to take with them the advice of him unto whom they had sent for counsel: the multitude at length looked what Philopomenus would say in that behalf. The Pretor he was for the time and in those dayes surpassed all other in wisdom and authority. Then he rose up and used this preface, and said, "That it was a good custom among the Ætolians, and well ordained and provided, that the Pretor himself in all consultations of war should not deliver his own opinion; and therefore willed them of their selves to resolve and determine with all speed possible what they pleased. As for the Pretor, I desire he, he will be ready to execute with fidelity and careful diligence their decrees accordingly: yea, and endeavor, so far forth as mans policy may reach unto, that they shall not repent of their resolution be it war or peace. This brief speech of his was more forcible and effectual to incite them to take arms, than any perswasive Oracion, wherein he openly could have shewed his desire to follow the wars. And therefore with exceeding accord of all in general they agreed upon war. As for the time and means of managing the same it was wholly referred to the discretion of the Pretor, to use his own liberty and pleasure. Philopomenus, besides that Quintus so advised, was also himself minded to wait for the Roman fleet which on the Sea side might defend Gybeum; but fearing again that their present necessity could abide no delays, and lest not only Gybeum should be lost, but the garrison also misfary, which was sent to the defence of the war he set afloat and put to the Sea the Achæans shipping. The Tyrant likewise had rigged and dressed a small fleet to empeach any aid and succours that haply might be sent to the besieged by Sea, to wit, three covered ships with hatch and deck, three Brigantines or Pinnaces, and as many Gallions. For the old ships were by composition and covenant delivered up to the Romans. And to make proof and tryal of these new vessels how swift and nimble they were, and wishal to see how all things else were well fitted for a battail, if need were: he made every day certain shews and representations of fight at Sea, and exercised both mariners and souldiers by such kind of false alarms: supposing that herein principally consisted the hope of his siege, in case he could cut off all their aid from the Sea side. Now the Pretor of the Achæans as he was equal to any of the best and most renowned commanders of that time in Land service, either for experience and practise, or wit and policy: so at Sea he was but a novice and a learner, as being an Arcadian born, an Inlander for within the main, and ignorant besides of all foreign forces, but that he had born arms and served a little in Castry, whiles he had the leading there, of some auxiliaries. One old Gally there was a Quadrime, taken at Sea 80 years before, at what time as he carried Nicela the wife of Clearchus from Naupactum to Corinth. And having heard much talk of this ship (for indeed she had been sometime of great name in the Kings royal fleet) he commanded her, all rotten as she was now, and ready to fall in pieces, to be shot into the Sea from out of the Bay of Argos. This ship as admiral, made way before the rest, wherein Tisofus Parus, a Captain General of a fleet was aboard; and encountered the ships of the Laconians, making sail from Gybeum. And at the first he chanced to assault and run against a new strong ship and being old of herself leaking and taking water at every joint she was rent asunder and fell in pieces. All within her were taken prisoners. The rest of the fleet having lost their captains fled as fast as possibly their oars could move the speed and away. Philopomenus himself was in a light swift frigate or pinnace, and fled again, and never had until he was arrived at Parus. This mishap nothing did encourage and abated the heat of this martial war, or who had run through many and sundry adventures: but contrary-wise wrought this effect, that he assured himself and said, That if he were overtaken and put to the worke in service at Sea, wherein he had no skill, he would so much the rather quit himself upon the Land (where he had such experience and was to ready) as that the Tyrant should not long joy and make boast of his winnings. Nabis puffed up with pride of his fortunate victory, and perfwading himself assuredly that he had no cause to fear any more danger from the Sea, purposed likewise to stop up all the avenues and passages by Land; and therefore beset all the ways betwixt his strong guards, which he bestowed in convenient places. And retiring with a third part of his forces from the siege of Gythium, he encamped before Fleia. This is a place that overlooketh and commandeth Leuca and Acra, by which ways it seemed that the enemies would make their approach with their army. Whiles he kept a standing camp there, and few of his souldiers were provided of tents and pavilions, and the rest of the common sort had made them cabins of reeds, wound and interlaced one within another, and the same covered with leaves only to give them some shade; Philopomenus I devised, before that he were discovered and came in sight of the enemies, to assail them at unawares and not looking for his coming, after a new fashion of war that they little doubted. Certain small cries or boats he got together into a secret blind bay, lying within the territory of Argos: in which he bestowed certain souldiers nimble appointed, most of them having round bucklers, with slings, darts, and such like offensive light weapons. From thence he coasted along the River neer the shore, until he was come to the promontory or cape adjoining close to the enemies camp: then he went a land, and by known ways he came by night unto Placia; and whiles the watch was fast asleep, as mistaking no such fear neer hand, he set fire upon the cabins aforesaid in every quarter of the camp. Many men were consumed with the fire before they wist that the enemy was come: and they that were ware of them, had no means to help and save themselves: so with fire and sword all went to wrack. Some viewey escaped out of this extremity of danger, and fled to the main camp before Gythium. Thus Philopomenus having discomfited and frightened his enemies, led his army forth with to wait Triphlus in the territory of Laconia, bounding fast upon the confines of the Megalopolitans: and having driven from thence great prizes of men and cattle, he departed before that the Tyrant could send any guards from thence for the defence of the Country. And when he had gathered and assembled his army at Tegai, and published and made known unto the Achæi and other Allies, a Diet or general council to be holden there, whereto also were the chief States of the Epirots and Acarnanians: he determined (for as much as both the hearts of his own people were sufficiently recovered after the disgrace and shameful dishonor received at Sea; and also the courages of his enemies well cooled and they affrighted) L to lead his forces against Lacedæmon: supposing that, that only means to draw the enemy away from the siege of Gythium. And first he encamped before Crisia within the enemies ground. But that very day was Gythium forced by the enemies and won. Philopomenus nothing ware thereof, set forward, and encamped neer Barpholentes, a mountain ten miles from Lacedæmon. Nabis also, having gained Gythium, departed from thence with his army lightly appointed: and marching apace beyond Lacedæmon, seized upon a place, called. The Camp of Pyrrhus: which he made no doubt but that the enemies intended to be possessed of. And then from thence he went to meet them. Now by reason of the narrow way, they took up in their march almost five miles of ground in length. At the tail of the army were the horsemen, and especially, where the Auxiliaries marched: because Philopomenus thought, that the tyrant would charge his men behind with his mercenary souldiers, in whom he reposed his greatest trust. Two things fell out contrary to his expectation at once, which troubled him much: the one was, that the place was gotten by the enemies before, which he intended to have seized upon for his own advantage: the other was, for that he saw the enemy affront his vanguard in a place so rough and rugged: that without the guard of his light-armed souldiers, he could not possibly march forward and advance his Ensigns. Now Philopomenus had a singular dexterity and skill, yea, and great experience in leading an army, and in making choice of his ground either to pitch or fight: and not only in time of war, but also in peace. he busied his head and employed himself principally therein. His manner was, when he rode forth any whither and was come to a straight passage hard to pass through, to look every way, and diligently to view and consider N the situation and posture of the place on all sides: and if he were alone, to call about and advise with himself: but if there were any in his company, to aske their advice in this wise: What if the enemy appeared and shewed himself in that place? How if he came affront or aslant on this or that side? nay, How if he should charge upon our back, what were best to be done? It may be the enemies will encounter us directly ranged in battail array: it may be they march disorderly and loosely, minding nothing else but their way, and to travail on. Thus I say, would he either devise with himself or seek advice of other, what place he were best to seize for his own purpose and commodity: also what number of armed men he should need to employ; or what kind of armour and weapons were needful to use (for therein also lay no small importance.) Moreover, where he should bestow his carriages? where he should lay his baggage? and where he should place and dispose of the multitude that were not meet to bear arms? what strength and what manner of guard was needful for their defence? and whether it were more expedient to go forward still the way that he was entred into, or better to go back again as he came? likewise, what ground was meet to be chosen for to pitch his camp upon? what compass and space were necessary to be taken up for the fortification of the place? from whence he might have convenient watering? from what quarter he might be best provided of fodder and fuel? and finally,

A Finally, against the morrow, which way were safest to remove the camp? and what form and manner of march were best? In these courses and discourses, he had from his childhood to inward and exercised his spirits, that he was never to leech what to do upon any such sudden occasion or occurrent presented unto him. And now at this present, seeing his enemies to neer, first and foremost he made a stand with his vanguard; then heient out toward the most ominous enigms, his auxiliary Candiors that came to aid him, and those horsemen which they call Tarentin, whose manner is to have with them, two horses apiece; and then commanding his own men of arms to follow after, he possessed himself of a rock standing over a brook or running rill, from whence they might water commodiously: into that place he gathered together all his bag and baggage; there he bestowed all the pages and horse-boys, and followers of the camp, whom he entertained also with armed men: and as the nature of the place would give him leave, he fortified his camp. But to pitch pavilions in a craggy, rugged, and uneven ground he found much ado. Now were the enemies about half a mile off: and at one end the time risist they watched both, with the guard of their light armed souldiers: but before that they could make and skirmish together (as commonly they do when the camps stand so neer one to another) the night overtook them. It appeared plainly there would be some fighting the next day about the brook for water: and therefore in the night season he bestowed close in a valley, farthest out of sight from the enemies, as many of his targeters s apolly the place would contain and hide. When day-light was come, the light armed Candiors and those Tarentin horsemen (of both sides) entered into skirmish upon the very banks of the brook. Leontias the Candior that had the leading of his country-men; Lycorides the Megapolitan commanded the light horse. The Candiors, who likewise were auxiliaries and aid-souldiers to the enemies, and the same sort also of the Tarentin horsemen, guarded those that came to water for them. Doubtful was the skirmish for a good while (as being managed and maintained of the one side and the other by men of one Nation, and those furnished with the same kind of weapon;) but those that were for the Tyrant, were more in number than the other. And by reason that Philopomenus had given charge and direction to the Captains, after they had held skirmish a while, to seem to retreat and flee, thereby to train the enemy into the afore said place of ambush, they followed hard in haik upon them as they fled along within the valley, and most of them were either slain or wounded before they saw the enemies hidden there within. Now those targeters aforesaid, were led in that order (so far forth as the breadth of the valley would permit) that they might each receive their fellows as they fled, within the spaces between their ranks and files. Then at once they rove, fresh in heart, and ordered in good array, and charged upon the enemies, disordered, dunned, loath, scattered, weary with travel, and faint of their wounds. Then was it out of doubt and past all peradventure where the victory went: for presently the Tyrant souldiers turned their backs, fled a good deal faster than they made pursuit before, and were beaten into their camp: many were either killed or taken prisoners as they fled; and they had been put in a strait also within the camp, but that Philopomenus commanded to sound the retreat, fearing more the rugged and broken ground, and the disadvantage and difficulties thereof in case he should rashly venture forward any farther, than he did the enemy. Then he, taking his conjecture by the issue of the fight, and judging by the nature of Nabis the General, in whose ear and sight he might be, sent unto him one of his auxiliaries that were strangers, concealing himself to be a runaway revolt, to inform him assuredly, that the Achæans determined the next day to march as far as to the river Eurotas, which runneth hard by the walls of Lacedæmon, for to stop the passage, that neither the Tyrant might retire himself into the City when he would, nor any munition or victuals be carried from thence into the camp: moreover, that they would give the attempt, and assay if they could solicit any of the citizens to revolt from the Tyrant. This counterplot carried himself so in this errand, that the Tyrant believed not so much his words, as took hold thereby of a good pretence and honest occasion for to quit and abandon the camp: and therefore the next morrow he commanded Phibagoras, with the auxiliary souldiers and the horsemen, to keep a good guard about the trench and enclosure of the camp: himself in person with the strength of his army, marched as it were to a battail, and commanded to advance forward the ensigns in all halt toward the City. Philopomenus perceiving that the army marched so fast through the narrow passage down the hill, put forth all his own horsemen and the auxiliary Candiors, against the guards of the enemies that watched before the camp. They, seeing the enemies to approach and themselves forsaken of their own fellows, at first went about to retire within their hold: but afterwards when they perceived the whole army of the Achæans advancing against them in order of battail, seeing that they and their tents should be at once surprised, made apace after their own host which was gone a good way before. With that, the targeters of the Achæans assailed the camp, entred upon it, and razed the tents, whiles the rest went forward and pursued the enemies. The way was such, as that an army at liberty and free from fear of enemies, might hardly and with much ado rid any ground and march without encumbrance: but so soon as the skirmish began in the tail of the reeward, and the noise and cry of them affrighted behind was heard in the vanguard: every man made shift for one, flung away weapons, and fled into the woods on either side of the way; and ere one could turn about, all the ways were firewd and choaked up with armour and weapons and especially with darts or javelins, which lighting for the most part with one end full against the enemies, were in stead of a flaked or empalled palisade to hinder their passage. P. 166

Philopemenes having given commandment to his light armed aid-souldiers to preele forward fill, H and to follow the chafe as fast as they could (knowing well that the horiemen would have much ado and trouble in their flight) conducted himself the main army and heavily charged by a more open way to the River Eurotas: where he encamped himself a little before the going down of the sun, and there he staied for his light appointed souldiers, whom he had left to follow after the enemies. Who being come about the time of the first watch, brought word, that the Tyrant with some few was entered into the City, but the unarmed multitude were dispersed, and wandered all about the forest and the woods. Then he willed them to repose and refresh their bodies: which being done, himself chose out of all the souldiers besides (who becaue they were come first into the camp, had well hearned themselves with taking their recreation and some small sleep) certain elect and special men, and took them forth immediately with him: availing about them nothing but I their words, and let them in good order to keep two port-waies, by which men go to Phara and Barbophenes, where he presumed that the enemies would take their way and retire themselves upon their flight: and nothing was he deceived. For the Lacedæmonians, so long as the day light lasted, had withdrawn themselves to the middle of the forest, through by-lanes and blind paths: but when the night was once come, and that they desired lights within their enemies camp, they kept themselves also over-against them within close and secret lanes: and when they were once passed beyond, and thought all to be in safety and security, they came down into the more open high waies, where they were received and caught up by their enemies that forsailed them in ambush: so they were every where by numbers either killed or taken prisoners: insumch as scarce one fourth part of their whole army escaped. Philopemenes having shut up the tyrant cloie within the City, spent almost thirty daies consequently ensuing in waisting and spoiling the territory of the Laconians: and when he had thus weakened and in manner broken the back of his enemy, he returned home, and the Achæans held him a paragon, and equal to the Roman General for glorious deeds of arms, nay, in the service of the Laconian war they preferred him before the other.

During the war between the Achæans and the tyrant, the Roman Embassadors, who carefully and diligently visited the Cities of the Allies, for fear lest the Ætolians had alienated any of their affections from them to King Antiochus travelled but little in going about to the Achæans, whom by reason of the hatred they bare to Nabis, they hoped verily to be fast and faithful enough unto them in all other things, and first they came to Alibet, from thence to Cheloni, and so into Theffaly: and after they had conferred with the Theffalians in a frequent council of theirs, they turned their way to Demetrius, where there was published a solemn Diet to be holden by the Magnesians. Where they were to frame their speech more curiously than in other places becaue certain of their great men and Potentates were elranged from the Romans, and altogether made for Antiochus and the Ætolians. The reason was this: becaue when news came that Philip his son, who was left hostage with the Romans, should be rendred again unto him, and likewise the tribune remitted which had been imposed upon him, among other false tales and untruths it was reported, that the Romans would redeliver Demetrius also into his hands. And rather than that should come to pass, Eurylochus (a principal and chief man among the Magnesians) and some others of that faction, desired to have a new world and an alteration, by the coming of the Ætolians and Antiochus. To these Magnesians, they were to couch and place their words so, in ridding them of that foolish vain fear which they had conceived: that thereby they did not put Philip clean beside his hope, and so give him occasion to be ill affected unto the Romans: considering that he alone was to them of far greater importance in all respects, than were the Magnesians, put all together. Thus much only they said by way of advertisement. That as all Greece generally was much beholden and bound unto the Romans for the benefit of Liberty, which they by their means enjoyed, so that City and State especially above all others was obliged unto them. For there, not only a garrison of Macedonians had been maintained to keep them in awe, but also the King had built him a royal palace, to seat himself there, to the end, that they might evermore have in their eye, their Lord to command them. But in vain, and to no purpose was all this, in case the Ætolians brought Antiochus in his stead to make his residence in the house and place of Philip: and would needs entertain a new and unknown King in lieu of the old, so long a time and so well known. The sovereign Magistrat of that City, they call Magnetarches: and for that time Eurylochus was the man: who bearing himself big and stout of his high place, said plainly, that he knew no cause, why either he or the Magnesians should suspect and smother the rumour that run so vile touching the delivery of Demetrius into Philip his hands. For rather than to suffer that, the Magnesians were to oppose themselves, yea, to do and dare any action whatsoever. And in the vehement heat of speech he went so far, that inconsiderably he cast out one word and said, That Demetrius seemed free in outward shew and appearance, but in very truth was at the command and devotion, yea, and at every beck of the Romans. At this speech there arose a dissonant bruit and murmuring of the assembly, which jarred and varied one from another, while some footed him up, others were offended, and took it in great despite, that he should presume to utter and speak so much. And Quintus was in such an heat of choler therewith, that stretching forth his hands to Heaven, he called the Gods to witness this ingratitude and disloyalty of the Magnesians. At whose words they were all greatly terrified. Then Zeno one of the chief, a man at that time of great authority and reputation, as well in regard of the honourable port that he ever carried in the whole course of his life, as also for that he always stood firm and sure

A "to the Roman side, besought Quintus and the rest of the Embassadors with tears, Not to impute the folly of one man to the whole City, for every man is to bear his own burden, and as he hath brued, so to drink, and abide the smart of his own scratching. As for the Magnechans (saith he) they acknowledge to owe unto T. Quintus and the people of Rome, not only their freedom, but all other things else that are most dear and precious unto men. Neither could a man pray or wish at the hands of the immortal Gods for any thing, which the Magnechans had not received by their means: and sooner would they like frantic persons pluck the very heart out of their own bellies, yea, and tear themselves in peeces, before they would violate and break the amity which they had with the Romans. This speech of his was followed and seconded with the humble prayers of the multitude. Eurylochus departed out of the assembly, and through by-ways and blind lanes recovered the gates, and from thence fled straight into Ætolia. For now by this time, and every day more than other, the Ætolians did cover and shewed themselves how they were affected to revolt. And happily at the same time, Thas, a principal personage of that Nation, whom they had sent as Embassador to King Antiochus, was newly returned, and brought with him Menippus the Kings Embassador, Who, before they had audience given them in a council assembled for them, had filled every mans ears and blubbered forth, what forces were prepared both for Land and Sea, what a mighty power was coming both of foot and horie, how Elephants were sent for out of India, and above all (wherewith they thought the minds of the people would be most moved) That there was such a mass of gold brought, as would buy all the Romans out and out. It was easy to see what trouble and boill such language might make in the general diet and assembly. For the Roman Embassadors had intelligence, both of their coming, and of all that ever they did. And albeit there was little hope or none at all to do any good, yet Quintus thought it not amiss, that some Embassadors from the allies and associate Cities should be present at that Council, such as might admonish and put the Ætolians in mind of the Roman alliance and society, and not flick to speak their minds frankly, yea, and thwart the King his Embassador. The Athenians of all other were thought the meetest men for that purpose, both in regard of the authority and reputation of their City, and also for the ancient league between them and the Ætolians. So Quintus requested them to send their Embassadors to the Panætolian Parliament. When the assembly was met, and the Counciler, Thas first declared his embassage: and after him was Menippus called in, who being entered in place, spake in this manner: "It had been (qd) the best course for all them that inhabit both Greece and Asia, that Antiochus had intermeddled in these affairs, during the upright fortune and entire state of Philip: then, every man had enjoyed his own, and all had not been reduced to the appetite and devotion, nor brought under (subjection) of the Romans. And even yet (quoth he) in case ye persist still in the same mind, and purpose resolutely to accomplish and finish these your designs and commenced enterprises, possible it is by the favor and help of the Gods, and by the means of the Ætolian association that Antiochus may recover the State of Greece, crased as it is, and much broken and bring it again to her first fresh hue, to her lively and lightsome liture, which consisteth in true liberty, even that which is able to stand alone and maintain it self, and dependeth not upon the will and pleasure of others. The Athenians, who first after the Kings embassage was delivered had audience given E them and liberty to speak their mind, without making any mention at all of the King, "Ad certified the Ætolians of the Roman society, and put them in mind of the favours and good turns done by Quintus to all Greece in general: advising them to take heed, that without dictation they overthrow not the welfare thereof, by running rashly and too soon into a new world of strange courses and fine devices: for hot, hasty, and heady counsels are at the first light and entertainment, pleasant and amiable: in the handling and managing, hard and difficult: in the end and issue, heavy and dangerous. Consider how the Roman Embassadors, and namely, Quintus among them, are not far off: and whiles things stand in good terms of integrity, it were better to treat and debate of matters in question and doubt, by words and reasons, than to let all Asia and Europe together to take arms and to make lamentable and deadly war one upon another. The multitude desirous of a change, enclined altogether, and were wholly devote to Antiochus, being of opinion, that the Roman Embassadors were not to be admitted into the Council: but the more grave and ancient persons of the nobility and states-men, obtained thus much by virtue of their authority, That they should have audience granted unto them. And when the Athenians had made relation of this decree and conclusion passed, Quintus was of mind to go into Ætolia: for this accompt he made, either to obtain somewhat that he came for, or else to have all Gods and men to bear him witness, that the Romans would enter into the action of war justly and in manner upon constraint and necessity. "Quintus being thither come, began at first to discourse before the whole assembly, as touching the society of the Ætolians with the Romans, and how often they had broken for their parts the faithful accord between them: and when he had so said, he used a brief speech concerning the right of those Cities that were in question. And if they thought that they had any law and reason of their side, how much better (quoth he) were it to send Embassadors to Rome, either to argue and expostulate the matter with them, or to demand their advice (whether they would themselves) than to cause the people of Rome to make war with Antiochus and the Ætolians together, not without great trouble of the whole world: and certain ruin of all Greece? For none should feel the smart & calamity of this war sooner than they that are the very causes thereof & began first. Thus spake the Roman Embass. by way of prophely, but but in vain and to no effect. After him Thon and the rest of that faction, were heard with the general applause of all; and they effected so much, that without any farther proroguing of the Diet, and referring the matter to another day, yes, and without staying so long until the Romans were out of the place and absent, they concluded to make a decree, by virtue whereof Antiochus should be sent for to enfranchise Greece, and to decide the quarrel between the Romans and the *Ætoli*ans. This decree was not so proud and insolent, but Damocritus their Pretor accompanied it with as arrogant and reproachful a trump of his own. For when Quintius required of him to see the said decree, he without any respect of the honorable personage of the man, made answer, That for the present time he had somewhat else to do of greater importance; but he would give him the decree and an answer withal shortly, and that within feast, encamped upon the bank of Tyberis. So great a spirit of senseless folly in those days had possessed the nation of the *Ætoli*ans, I and their chief Magistrates! Then Quintius and the delegates returned to Corinth.

After the Romans were dismissed, the *Ætoli*ans held no more general council of the whole Nation, because they would make semblance and seem to do nothing of themselves as touching the cause and question of Antiochus, but sit still and expect the coming of the King. Many, they treated and debated the matter by their Apollates (for so they call their special and privy Council which consisteth of certain elect chosen persons) by what means there might be an alteration and change in the affairs of Greece. This was held of all men for certain, that in every City and State, the chief and the best men generally were for the association of the Romans, and contented themselves with the present condition wherein they stood: but the multitude and those who had not all things to fall out to their own good liking, were desirous of a change. And one day K above the rest, the *Ætoli*ans entered into a designment and plot, which was not only out of all measure audacious, but also most shameful, namely, to surprise and possess themselves of Demetrius, Chalcis and Lacedæmon. And to each of these Cities there was sent one of their principal personages, namely, Thon to Chalcis; Alexamennus to Lacedæmon; and Diocles to Demetrius. This Diocles had the help and assistance of Eurylochus a banished man (of whose flying away, and the occasion thereof we have spoken before) who otherwise had no hope at all to return again into his native country. The kinsfolk and friends of Eurylochus and the rest of that faction, upon instructions given them by his letters, willed his wife and children to present themselves in the frequent assembly of the citizens in habit of mourners, in poor array, and vailed after the manner of humble suppliants, there to beseech them all and some, not to suffer him a guiltless person, neither convicted nor condemned, to wax old and pine away in exile. All that were plain and simple men seemed to be touched with pity and commiseration. The wicked and seditious persons conceived some hope to make a confusion in the State by these Ætolian troubles: in so much as every one was of opinion and gave his voice, that he should be restored and sent for home. This ground being laid and matters thus prepared, Diocles with his horsemen (for then was he the Captain of the Cavalry) took his journey. Under a colour and pretence to reduce and bring home this banished person his host and good friend; and in one day and night travelled a mighty great journey, and came within six miles of the City. And sometimes in the morning by day light, accompanied with three elect troops he marched forward, commanding the rest of the horsemen to follow after. When he approached the gate, he caused them all to alight on foot and to lead their M horses in their hands by the reins of their bridles, and to go without order, resembling travellers and waiting men, so as they seemed more like to the ordinary train of Captain Diocles, than to the men of arms and warriors under his charge: and leaving one of his troops at the gate, for fear lest the horsemen behind might be shut out, he led Eurylochus by the hand, and brought him through the mids of the City and the market place home to his house: and all the way he was met with many of his lovers and friends that welcomed him, and joyed for his return. At once the whole City was full of horsemen, and all places of opportunity and advantage were seized and possessed by them. Which done, divers were sent to massacre the chief of the adverse part in their houses. Thus the *Ætoli*ans became masters of Demetrius.

As for Lacedæmon, they devised in no hand to force the City, but by some vile to entrap and N surprise the tyrant. For seeing the Romans had deploiled him of all his Sea coast Towns: and the Acheans driven him within the walls of Lacedæmon, there was no doubt, but who for ever could first take his life from him, should carry away all the thanks, and carry especial favor with the Lacedæmonians. Good occasion and pretence they had to send unto him a power of armed men, for that he had importuned them by his prayers for some aids, considering that by their advice and perswasion he had rebelled. So there were given unto Alexamennus a thousand footmen, and thirty elect horsemen, drawn out of all the flour of the City. Damocritus the Pretor delivered unto them from the privy council of that nation (of which we have before spoken) "That they should not believe that they were to be employed in war against the Acheans, or in any other service, according as each one might imagine and conceive in his own head: but he charged O them to be ready to perform and execute obediently whatsoever sudden designment Alexamennus upon the present occasion should happen to attempt, were it never so unlooked for, strange, inconsiderate, and audacious: and to rest upon this, That they were sent with him to accomplish that, that for no other purpose. Thus Alexamennus with the conduct of these men thus prepared to his hand came unto the Tyrant: and no sooner was he arrived, but he possessed him presently with a world of hopes, giving to understand, "That Antiochus was already passed over into

A "into Europe: that shortly he would be in Greece, and over-spred all seas and lands with his armies and armados; that the Romans should full well know and find, that they had not now to deal with such an one as Philip; that the numbers of his foot and horses by land can not be counted, nor his ships at Sea numbered; that the battail of his Elephants at the very sight will decide the matter and finish the war. Moreover, that the *Ætoli*ans with all their forces, were ready and prest to come to Lacedæmon, (as need required) at any time: but indeed, delicious they were to shew and muster before the King at his arrival, a goodly number of armed soldiers, Nabis therefore himself should do very well, not to suffer those forces which he had, to decay with long repose and idleness, but bring them forth and train them abroad, make them to run in their armour thereby both to whet and sharpen their courages, and also to exercise and B "inure their bodies: for by use and customs, the labour will be lighter; and by the courtesy and graciousness of their General, not without delight and pleasure. Hereupon, they began to issue out of the City, and oftentimes went into the plain lying hand by the River Eurotas. They of the tyrants guard kept commonly in the battail or middle ward: and himself with three horsemen at the utmost (with whom Alexamennus for the most part was) used ordinarily to ride before the ensigns, taking survey and viewing the utmost points and wings of the army. The *Ætoli*ans were placed in the right wing, as well those that came before to aid the tyrant as those thousand that were new arrived with Alexamennus. Now had Alexamennus taken a custom, one while to tourney as it were amongst the ranks before in the company of the tyrant, and to instruct him in some matters sounding to his commodity: otherwhiles, to ride to his own men into the right wing, and C soon again to return to the Tyrant, as if he had given them charge of somewhat necessary to be done. But upon that day which was appointed for to do the feat and murder the tyrant, after he had ridden forth with the tyrant to the usual place, and kept him company a while, he took occasion (as his manner was) to make a step aside to his own souldiers: and then he went in hand with those horsemen which were sent with him from out of Ætolia, and said thus unto them: "Now first, you must adventure and execute that lustily and without delay which you were com- D "manded to perform by my direction and leading. Be ready with heart and hand, and be not slack and idle to exploit that, which ye shall seeme to undertake and enterprise. And look whosoever he be that either standeth still, or will seeme to argue and interpose his own wit and advice to cross "mine, let him make account, he shall never go home again to his own country. With that he set them all a quaking, for well they remembered what their charge was when they came forth from home. Now was the Tyrant coming on horseback from the left wing: Then Alexamennus commanded his horsemen to couch their lances down, and to have their eye upon him. He also setled himself to take a good heart unto him, which was not a little daunted at first with the cogitation of so great a designment that he had projected. When he was now approached and came near the Tyrant, he ran with full carrier at him, gored his horse, and overthrew himself to the ground. He was not so soon unhorsed and laid along, but the horsemen stabbed him with many a thrust: whereof the most part did no harm, considering they were driven against his coat: but in the end, they found where his body was naked and unarmed, so he gave his last gasp before he could be rescued by his guard in the main battail afore said. Then Alexamennus taking with him E all the *Ætoli*ans, made all the haste he could to possess himself of the royal place. The Penioners and Squires of the body, seeing this murder done before their eyes, were at first mightily affrighted: but afterwards perceiving the army of the *Ætoli*ans to go their wayes and depart, they ran to the breathless carcase left among them, and of men that should have guarded his body and revenged his death, they became a sort of idle gazers and lookers on. And surely there would not a man have once stirred, in case the multitude had immediately been called to an assembly: and if after arms laid down, they had been entertained by him with some Oration or Remonstrances framed according to the time. The *Ætoli*ans were kept many together, in arms still, without any outrage or wrong done or offered to any one person. But all things that they did, hastened the speedy ruin and destruction of those that had committed this last: as it could not otherwise be F all reason, but they should be served, who had plaid so lewd and treacherous a part. The Captain and Ring-leader of all this mischief, kept him self close shut within the royal palace, spending both night and day in rifling and searching the Tyrants coffers and his treasury. And the *Ætoli*ans for their part also fell to ransacking as if they had won that City by assault, which they made countenance and semblance to set free. The indignity of these their pranks, the contempt withal and small regard made of them, encouraged and animated the Lacedæmonians to gather together and consult of the matter. Some were of opinion and said, That the *Ætoli*ans were to be thrust out by the head and shoulders, and to be sent away with a mischief, and their own liberty to be recovered. Which under a colour of being restored, was intercepted and taken from them: others advised and said, that for fashion at leastwise, some one of royal blood should be set up G for to be the head in this action. Now there was of that race and stem one Luconicus a young Child, brought up with the children of the late Tyrant: him they mounted upon horseback, and then they took arms with all speed, and as many *Ætoli*ans as they could light upon, wandering here and there in the streets, they ran upon and hewed in peeces. Then they assaulted the palace, where they also murdered Alexamennus, albeit with some few about him he made resistance and defended himself. The rest of the *Ætoli*ans gathered together about Chalciceas (which is a Chappel of Diana made of brasse) and there likewise they were massacred. A few of them

Antiochus bearing himself aloft now principally for that Demetrius was evolted from the Romans unto the Etolians, determined no longer to delay the matter, but presently to take a voyage into Greece. But before that he embarked and took the sea, he went up to Ilion from the sea side to sacrifice to Mimerva; and when he was returned to his fleet, he made sail with 40 close covered and barched ships, and 60 uncovered and undecked, and after those followed 200 vessels of burden, charged and fraught with viuals, munition, and warlike furniture of all sorts. And first he fell with the flood Ambros: and from thence he cut over to Seyathos, whereafter he had rallied his ships which were had scattered one from another in the wide and deep sea, he arrived at Peleum, the first town of the main and continent. Where Eryclochi the Magistrates, [the Polem, the sovereign of Magnesia] and the principall citizens of the State, who were come from Demetrias, met him and joynd with him; who rejoicing exceedingly to see so goodly a company of them in his train, the next day put into the haven of the City of Demetrias: and not far from thence landed all his forces, which amounted in the whole to ten thousand foot, five hundred horse, and six Elephants: a small power (God wot) and insufficient to leize upon Greece, ill naked and alone, far shorter than to hold and maintain war with the Romans. After this it was reported that Antiochus was come to Demetrias, the Etolians proclaimed a councill, wherein they made a decree to lend for Antiochus. For now the King knowing that they would passe such an Act, was determined for Demetrias, and had withdrawn himself to Phalera within the gulph of Malota: And parted from Demetrias, and had withdrawn himselfe to Phalera within the gulph of Lamia, where he after he had received once the patent of that decree, he went from thence to Olympia, where he was received with exceeding favour of the common people, with clapping of hands, shouts, acclamations, and others signs, whereby the multitude used to shew & tell their great joy. When they were assembled together and lot in Councill, Phanias the Pretor and other chief citizens brought him solemnely in: where Oyes made, thus the King began his speech, first exulting himself, in that he was come with a far smaller power than all men hoped or looked for. "And even this (quoth he) may serve in stead of the greatest argument that may be of my exceeding love and affection toward you, in that being to unprovided and unfurnished of all things, and yet at a time so unreasonable for sail, as too early to rike the sea, I have not thought much but am willingly come at the call of your Embassidors: being thus shurdly perswaded, that the Etolians seeing me once, will suppose that in me alone consisted altheir hope and defence whatsoever. And yet I would accomplish I assure you, and satisfie to the full even your contentment also, whose expectation for the present may seem to have been disappointed: for soon as the tips

Receptus was clean estranged and badly affected to the Romans, ever since the death of Regillus and these troubles that ensued thereupon. They were nevertheless so to the Philoponians a great present, and principal leader of the Achæans, was both munificent and odious unto Quintus for emulation and jealousy of honour in the Lacedæmonian war, Antiochus had been coupled and taken to wife Apama the daughter of one Alexander a Megapolitan, who wanted himself to be defended from Alexander the Great, named his two sons Philip and Alexander, and his daughter Apama: whom being thus advanced by marriage with a King, her elder brother Philip accompanied into Achæmania. This Philip a vain-headed young man, the Ætolians and Antiochus had induced into a foolish hope (considering that for certain he was of the royal blood) to sustain the Kingdom of Macedony, if haply he could bring about to join Alexander and the Achæmans to Antiochus. And these vain conceits of great benefit wrought mightily not with Philip only, but also with Antiochus.

Now in Achaia there was a council holden at Arginum, and audience given there to the Ambassadors of Antiochus and the Ætolians, before T. Quintus. Where the King his Ambassador spake first, and being, (as all those commonly are, that have intermingling and maintenance of Kings) full of foolish dabble, & making sea and land resound again with his vain prattling and foolish words; let ake an end, and told them, what an infinite number on his men were passing over by Hellespont into Europe: whereof some of them were in complete bargoes, armed at all peeces, whom they call Cataprales: others were archers, and shot of horseback, against whom there was nothing close, nothing sure enough, who when their backs are turned, and their horses run away, shoot so much the more surely, and even point-blank. And albeit these forces of horse by his report, were sufficient of themselves to defeat all the armies of Europe if they were put together, yet he added besides a mighty number, I wot not how many of footmen: and terrified them with namely a sort of strange nations, that scarcely had been heard of before, to wit, the Dakes, the Medians, the Elymans and Cadulians. But for his forces at sea, there was no bayes, he horrors, nor havens in all Greece able to receive them. The Sydoniens and Tyrians (say they) hold the right side, the Aradians, and the Sides out of Pamphylia keep the left: nations for skill and valour at sea incomparable. As for money and other provision and furniture for the war, it were needless to discourse of, since they themselves know well enough, that the realms of Asia have always flowed with gold, as their proper wealth. So as the Romans now were not to deal with Philip nor with Antiochus, the one a chief person among many others of Cities, and the other limited within the confines, only of the kingdom of Macedony, but with the great Monarch of all Asia, yea, and of some part of Europe. And yet he, as mighty a potentate as he is (notwithstanding he is come to the utmost costs and bounds of the Levant sea, to deliver and enfranchise Greece) demandeth nothing of the Achæans prejudicial to their fealty and allegiance to the Romans their first allies and associates: for he required not them to take arms with him against them, but only not to intermeddle and take part in his seeking is, that (as behooveth good friends and mediators between both parties) they would all well and peace among them, and not interpose themselves in a quarrel of war. Archidamus likewise the Ambassador for the Ætolians, requested in manner the same, that they would hold themselves quiet and in repose (a thing most easy and safe for them) and being but lookers on the war, wait and attend the issue of others mens fortunes, without the hazard of their own; yet he asked not so, but proceeded so far and overthrew himself so much in words, that he brake forth at length in ill language, one while railing against the Romans in general, another while against Quintus in particular: calling them ungratefull and unthankfull persons, reproaching, upbraiding, and highting them in the teeth, how not only they had got the victory of Philip, but also loved themselves by the virtue and valour of the Ætolians: and as for Quintus, he was to thank them and their means, as much as his own life came to & the preservation of his army. For whereas at any time (qd. he) performed his duty and devoir of General in the field? Seen him indeed I have in the time of battell and in the camp, take the flight of birds, kill sacrifices, and make vows very devoutly, like some holy parish-priest or divining Prophet, whiles I myself was fain in his defence to expose and present my body to lances and darts of the enemies. To these challenges Quintus made answer in this wise, saying, that Archidamus had more regard in whole preference he spake, then to whom he directed all his speech: for the Achæans know very well, that all the valour of the Ætolians, standeth in bragging words and not in martiall deeds, as men that love to be heard in Diets and assemblies rather then seen in the field and battell: and therefore no marvel if he made so small reckning to speak unto the Achæans, considering that he knew, how well acquainted they were with the manners and fashions of the Ætolians. But he hath besides vaunted and made great brags before the King Ambassadors, and in their person, before the King himself in absence. And if a man had not known before, what it was, and had so knit and united Antiochus and the Ætolians together, he might perceive it evidently by the speeches of the Ambassadors: for by exchanging lies reciprocally, and by bragging of their forces which they have not, they have inflated and puffed up one another with vain hopes, whiles they tell and would make themselves believe, that Philip by them was vanquished, that the Romans by their valour were protected: and other gay matters, which ere while ye heard building calkes in the air, to the end, that you & other states & nations would side with them and take their parts: the King again (by his Ambassadors) overpredeth all with clouds of horsemen and footmen, and covereth whole seas with fleets

A "and armados. Now in faith this is mine host of Chalcis up and down, a friendly man I assure you, and a good fellow in his house, and one that knoweth how to entertain his guests and bid them welcome. And verily I can liken this manner of dealing to nothing better then to a supper of his: We went upon a time to make merry with him, and I remember well it was not midsummer (when the dyes are longell and the sun at the hottest) where he was so passing good cheer, And as we wondered how at such a season of the year he met with that plenty of venison and such variety withall; the man (nothing to vainglorious as these fellows here) smiled pleasantly upon us and said, we were welcome to a feast of a rarer kind and no better: but well ere a good cook my matters (qd. he) who by his cunning hand, what with seasoning it, and what with serving it up with divers sauces, hath made all this far from of wild beasts, and the game of sundry sorts. This may fitly be applied to the King his aims and forces: of which now to great boast was made. For these divers kinds of arms, these many names of nations, whether heard of before, to wit, the Dakes or Daemons (I wot not what to call them) the Elymans, the Cadulians, the Elymans, they are but Syrians when all is done; who for their bate mien and stature, are much better to make a sort of slaves then a company of good soldiiers. And secondly God (you my matters of Achaia) I could repeat unto you the port and train of this great King, when he ran from Demetrius, one while to Lamia to the council of the Ætolians, & another while to Chalcis: you should see in the Kings camp hardly two pretty legions: & those but lame ones neither and not well accomplished: you should see the King from time to time as begging grain of the Ætolians, to measure out among his hungry soldiiers: otherwise making shift to take up monies at interest to make out their pay: now standing at the gates of Chalcis, and anon shot out from thence and excluded clean: and when he hath done nothing else but to Antiochus and Eurippus, returning fair into Ætolia, Antiochus (you see) hath need to be much better to the Ætolians, and the Ætolians have as little trusted & relied upon the vanity of the King, and therefore the lesse should you be deceived by them, but rather repute yourselves affectedly in the fidelity of the Romans so often tried, so often known and approved. For whereas they say "It is your best course not to be embarked and interceded in this war: I assure you, there is nothing more vain then this, nay, nothing so hurtfull unto your estate. For you shal be apter and preter to the victor, without thank of either part, without any worth and reputation. Quintus was thought by the Achæans to have spoken not impertinently, but to have answered them very fully; and an easie matter it was to approve his speech unto those, that were well enough inclined to have given him gentle hearing: for that it was no question nor doubt at all, but that every man would judge them to be friends or enemies to the Achæan nation, whom the Romans held for the Ætolians. Moreover, according as Quintus thought good, they sent presently an aid of 300 soldiiers to Chalcis, and of as many to Pyrramus. For at Athens there had lik to have been a sedition and mutiny, whiles some drew the multitude (which commonly is bought and sold for money) to take part with Antiochus: upon hope of large rewards and great bounties, untill such time as Quintus was sent for by them that took part with the Romans: in so much as Apollodorus (who gave counsell and periwaded to revolt) was acced by one Leon, and being condemned, was banished. Thus verily the embassage returned from the Achæans to the King with present answer. The Bœotians delivered no certainty: this only was their answer, That when Antiochus himself was come in Boeotia, then they would consider and consult what they were best to do.

Antiochus being advertised, that both the Achæans and King Eumenes also had sent men for the defence of Chalcis, thought good to make haste, that his forces might not only prevent them, but also if it were possible receive them and cut them short as they came. And for this intent, he sent Menippus with three thousand soldiiers or thereabout, and Polyxenidas with his whole fleet. Himself a few daies after marched with fix thousand of his own soldiiers; and of that levy, which on a suddain might be gathered at Lamia, no great number of Ætolians. Those five hundred Achæans afore said, and the small aid that King Eumenes sent under the conduct of Xenochides the Chalcidian, having safely passed Eurippus before that the waies and passages were beted, arrived at Chalcis. The Romans also who were upon five hundred, at what time as Menippus came upped before Salganea, came to Hermum, where is the passage out of Boeotia into the land of Enchaia. In their company was Mithian lent as Ambassador from Chalcis to Quintus, for to crave some succour: who perceiving that the waies were laid and the streights kept by the enemies, leaving his intended journey by the way of Adis, turned to Delium, minding from thence to cut over into Enchaia. This Delium is a temple of Apollo situate upon the sea strand, and five miles distant from Tanagra, from whence there is a short cut (little more then a league) over an arm of the sea unto the next parts of Enchaia. In this Temple and sacred grove about it so religious, so privileged and secured (as are those franchised houses and sanctuaries which the Greeks call Asyla) and at that time, when neither war was proclaimed, or at least wile not so far proceeded, that in the hearing and knowledge of any man there had been sword drawn, or blood shed in any place. In this place, and at this time, I say, whiles the soldiiers wandered at their leisure and pleasure, some gone to see the temple above said and the grove, others walking upon the strand unarmed, and a great sort also of them scattered over the fields (such as were gone for forage and fewell) all on a suddain Menippus finding them loose and disbanded, charged upon them and slew them, and to the number of fifty he took alive: very few escaped, among whom their opinion was touching Philip, to wit, That it was all one, and made no matter, whether the defence were given him to his face, or only intimated to some garriſons of his. And as for the Ætolians, this was their mind, that they had quite already their smity, and abandoned all ſociety, in that when our Embaſſadors ſo oftentimes had redemanded ſmends for wrongs done, they never thought good to make reſtitution or ſatisfaction. Moreover, the Ætolians had themſelves ſent defence fiſt and proclaimed war againſt the Romans, when as by force they ſeized Demetrias a City of our allies, and advanced before Chalcis to aſſail it both by land and ſea; and laſtly, in that they had ſollicit King Antiochus and brought him into Europe, for to levy war againſt the Romans. All things now being ſufficiently provided, M. Acilius the Conſul publiſhed an edict and proclaimed, That all thoſe ſoldiers whom L. Quimius had enrolled, likewiſe all thoſe whom he had levied of the allies of the Latine nation, who were to go with him into his province, likewiſe all the Colonels and Marſhals of the ſecond and third legion, ſhould render themſelves, and be ready altogether at Brundisium upon the * 1^{ſt} Ides of May following. Himſelf upon the * 5th day before the Ides of the ſame month departed forth of the City clad in his rich coat of arms. And at the ſame time the Pretors alſo took their journey into their ſeveral provinces.

* I ſuppoſe that here wanteth the multiplicand number, viz. 100. For it is not ſubſervient to the proportion of the reſt that followeth, nor to the magnificence of ſo great a ſervice, nor of ſome thirty quarters of wheat, who heretofore allowed a hundred times as much, and yet the ſame proportion of barley which now at this preſent is ſet down.

Much about that time there arrived at Rome Embaſſadors from two Kings, to wit, Philip of Macedonia, and Ptolemæus King of Egypt, promiſing their aid of men, money, and corn for that war. And beſides ſixty Ptolemæus there was brought * 1000 pound weight in gold, and the weight of * 2000 pound of ſilver: howbeit nothing was received, but much thanks rendered to both the Kings. And whereas both of them offered to come with all their power into Ætolia, and to be there in perſon, Ptolemæus was diſcharged of that offer of his, but the Embaſſadors of Philip received this answer, That he ſhould highly pleaſe and content the people of Rome, in caſe he would not fail the Conſul M. Acilius. In like manner there came Embaſſadors from the Carthaginians and Masaniſſa, The Carthaginians made promiſe of a thouſand Modii of Wheat, and Masaniſſa, five hundred thouſand for the army, and likewiſe to bring half ſo much to Rome; praying the Romans to accept the ſame at their hands as a free gift and gratuity: adding moreover, that they would in an out a fleet at their own charges, and were ready alſo to make one entire payment of their tribute behind, which they were of duty to pay by ſundry terms of many years. The Embaſſadors of Masaniſſa, promiſed in the behalf of their King, to ſend five hundred thouſand Modii of wheat, 30,000 of barley into Greece to the army, beſides 500 men of arms and twenty Elephants, unto M. Acilius the Conſul. As touching the corn, this answer was returned unto them, that they were content to accept thereof, ſo that they would take money therefore to the worth. As to the fleet aforeſaid, which the Carthaginians made offer of, they acquit them clean, ſave as many ſhips as they were to find and provide according to the tenor of the accord and compoſition between them. Laſt of all, concerning the tribute money, none would they receive before the day.

While the affairs paſſed thus at Rome, Antiochus being at Chalcis, becauſe he would not fit ſtill and do nothing, all a winter time, partly himſelf ſollicit (by ſending Embaſſadors from thence of their own accord: the States, and partly alſo there came unto him Embaſſadors from thence of their own accord: and namely, among others, the Epirots preſented themſelves by the common conſent of their whole nation, and the Eleans alſo came out of Peloponneſus. They of Elys craved aid againſt the Achæans, who (they verily thought) would take arms againſt their City, becauſe war was denounced againſt Antiochus: nothing to their will and good liking. Unto them were ſent 1000 footmen under the leading of Euphanes the Cretan. The embaſſage of the Epirots, plaid with both hands, meaning to deal roundly and ſimply with no ſide, but to go between the bark and the tree. Gladly they would make count to the King and curry favour with him, but ſo, as they flood in good terms ſtill with the Romans, whom they were loth to offend. For their requeſt to him was, that he would not draw them without great and important cauſe into the quarrell, conſidering that they for the defence of all Greece lay open and expoſed to Italy, and were late before others to feel the Romans fingers, and receive their fiſt assaults. But in caſe he were able of himſelf with his forces by land and ſea to defend Epirus, and furniſh it with garriſons ſufficient, they would with heart and good will accept of him and his into their Cities & port-towns: but if ſo he could not effect that, they beſought him not to offer them, naked and unarmed men, to the violence of the Roman wars. Their drift was in that embaſſie (as it appeared) that if the King and his forces came not into Epirus (as they rather thought nay then yes) they might relieve themſelves and all they had, ſafe, entire, and at their own liberty for the Roman armies, and win withal the Kings good grace in that they ſeemed to make an offer to deceive him: or if any came indeed, yet they might conceive good hope to find favours, and have pardon at the Romans hands, in that they had not expected their licours being ſo far off, but rather yielded to the forces of Antiochus being preſent there in perſon. In ſuch fort they carried themſelves in their embaſſage ſo perplexed and intricate, that the King knew not well how to answer them readily: but ſaid, that he would ſend his own Embaſſadors unto them for to parle and treat of all affairs pertaining in common as well to them as to him. Then went he himſelf into Bæotia, which country in colour and ſhape pretended theſe cauſes of anger and ſpight againſt the Romans, that before I have mentioned, to wit, the murder of Bercillus, and the armies by Quimius levied againſt Coronea, occaſioned by a maſacre committed upon Roman ſoldiers: but in very truth this was the reaſon, The ſingular diſcipline and order of that nation in old time, was going downward and ending many

A many years and ages already, and the popular government of many, grown to decay and ruin, he could not poſſibly continue long without ſome change and alteration of State. Well, to Theban: Where in the General Diet and Councell of that Nation (notwithſtanding he had founded the battell, and began the fiſt already by giving the fiſt blow, in that he had forced the Roman garriſon near Delium and Chalcis, which were no ſmall ſigns nor doubtfull overtures of war, yet which his Embaſſadors had followed in the general aſſembly of the Achæans, namely, demanding that they would enter into ſmity with him, without proſeſſing themſelves enemies to the Romans, or pretending hoſtility againſt them. But there was no man there but ſoon found him and ſaw him wel enough: howbeit there paſſed an act and decree in favour of the King againſt him. B Romans, under a vain and flight pretext and colourable ſhew of words. Having gained this nation alſo, he returned to Chalcis, from thence he ſent out his letters before unto the States of the Ætolians, that they ſhould meet him in Demetrias, where he would confer and conſult with them of all their affairs to be managed; and thither came he by leaſt at the day appointed. Aminander alſo was ſent for out of Athamania to this conſultation, yes, and Anniball the Carthaginian (whole counſel was not required a long time) was preſent at this frequent Diet and Aſſembly. Much parle and great opening there was as touching the nation of the Theſſalians; and all there in place were of opinion, that they ſhould be founded how they ſhould aſſeſſed: but about the maine, and ſome circumſtance thereof, they were of divers minds, while ſome advised it to be done and executed out of hand: others thought good to put it off from winter ſeaſon (conſidering now they were in the mids thereof) unto the prime and beginning of ſpring: others again ſaid, that Embaſſadors alſo ſhould be ſent: and ſome hot ſpurs there were, that gave counſell to go againſt them with all their forces, yes, and to fright and terrifie themſelves they made ſlow halt. Now when all the C deliver his mind and ſpeak to the cauſe in queſtion: who turned the King and all that were preſent from other wandring cogitations, and induced them to the entire conſideration of the tall war, and to this effect framed his ſpeech in this wiſe. "It ſince the time that we paſſed over into Greece, my ſap had been to be called to any councell, when as ſome queſtion was touching the ſpeech of Anniball. " Emba, the Achæans and the Ætolians, I had delivered that advice then, which now I purpoſe to utter this day in the queſtion concerning the Theſſalians. Above all things my counſel is, that Philip and the Macedonians may by all means poſſible be wrought to this our allocation in the war. For as touching Emba, the Ætolians and the Theſſalians, who doubteth, but that they (as nations that land upon their own bottoms and are of no force by themſelves) will alwaies flatter them that are preſent in place, and be ready to crave pardon upon the ſame fear that they ever ſhew when they are to take counſel and relieve? who doubteth I ſay but ſo ſoon as they ſhall ſee the Roman army in Greece, they will turn to their accuſtomed obedience, and that it will be imputed to them no fault at all, that when the Romans were ſo far off, they were not willing to try the force of you (a puiſſant Prince in perſon among them) or of your armies? How much rather ought we then, nay, how much better and more important would it be, to joyne Philip unto us then theſe? For if he once enter into the cauſe and be ſeen in action, he can not poſſibly ſtarc from us nor draw his head out of the collar: and moreover, he bringeth E that power with him, which is not to be held for a ſimple licour & addition to mend our forces, but ſuch as lately of it ſelf without the help of others, was able to make head againſt the Roman puiſſance. Let me have this prince on my ſide, and (be it ſpoken without offence of any man here) what need I doubt of the ſequel & iſſue? eſpecially when theſe, whoſe means & aſſiſtance the Romans prevailed againſt Philip, I ſee now ready to enter the field againſt them? The Ætolians (I ſay) who as all the world knoweth vanquiſhed Philip, ſhall now together with Philip, enter into arms and fight againſt them. Over and beſides, Aminander and the whole nation of the Athamians (whole ſervice in the war, next to the Ætolians, ſtood the Romans in beſt ſtead) ſhall be on our ſide, Philip at that time (O King Antiochus) ſuſtained the fight and burden of the whole war, when you ſtill and ſtirred not: now both of you together, two moſt mighty monarchs, F with the puiſſance of all Aſia and Europe, ſhall wage war againſt one City and people, which (to ſpeak nothing of mine own fortune good or bad) certainly in our fathers daies was not able to make their part good with one only King of the Epirots: how hardly daies they will be when they ſhall be matched with you both together. But what moved me to think, yes, and assured me, that Philip may be won unto us to joyne in this action? One thing is this, a common good and benefit even the greateſt bond that is of ſociety: and yet there is anothers beſides it, namely, an inducement proceeding from you that be here of Ætolia: for Thoon your Embaſſador (who is preſent in place) among other matters that he was wont to alledge for to animate & move Antiochus to come into Greece, evermore assured him of this principally, and vowed that Philip G upon him hard conditions of ſervitude and ſlavery. And he verily, I mean Thoon, ſet out the ſell and ger of the King, and with all his words compared it to the wood rage of a wild beaſt bound with chains: or being encloded in ſome cage, would willingly break the gates and bars thereof. Now, if he be diſpoſed thus, and of that courage, let us burſt his bonds aſunder, let us (I ſay) force open his iron cage, that his rage pent up ſo long may now break out upon the common enemies, and ſuppoſe

"suppose that our embassy effect nothing at his hands, yet may we provide and take order, that "if we c. not work and win him to side with our selves, yet that he shall not combine and band "with our enemies. Your son Selencus is now at Ephesus, who shall not so soon with those forces "which he hath about him, begin to invade and wall by the way of Thracia, the confines of Ma- "cedon, but he shall withdraw and turn Philip clean away (from giving succour to the Romans) to "the defence especially of his own. Thus have you heard mine advice as touching Philip: now let "the whole course and managing of the war, what mine opinion was, you have not been ignorant "of from the first beginning. If then, I might have had mine own waies, and my council had been "taken, the Romans should not have received intelligences of the taking of Chalcis in Engla-
 "not of the forcing and winning of a little pile upon Euripus; but they had heard by this, that all "the coast of the Ligurians and of the Cisalpine Gauls was up in arms and on a light fire of war; I
 "and of which would have feared and frightened them most? that Annibal was in Italy. And now "things standing as they do) my advice is, that you fend for all your forces both by land and sea;
 "Let your carriks and bulks with victuals and provision follow after your armada & ships of war.
 "For in this place, like as we are too few to perform any martial exploits, so we are too many,
 "considering our small store of victuals. And when you rallied and united all your force together,
 "divide your navy in two parts: the one you shall keep in the rode of Coreyra, to impeach the Ro"mans, that they shall not passe in safety and security, the other you shall cause to lay unto that "coast of Italy which looketh toward Sardinia and Africk. Your self in proper person, with all "your land army shall march onward into the territory of the Bylliones (whence shall ye have good
 "means for the defence of Greece, as making the Romans believe, that you are upon the point "to pass the seas, yea, and being ready indeed to crosse over if need should require. This gene"rally is my council, mine, I say, who as I will not take upon me a singular skill in all kinds of war,
 "so me thinks I should know how to war with the Romans, as having learned my skill thereby,
 "as well to my cost as advantage, and as much with my good as harm, & look whatsoever desig-
 "ment I have projected unto you, I promise and protest, that I will be faithful and forward in "the execution thereof; and the gods approve and blesse that course, which your self shall think
 "the best. To this effect, in a manner, was the oration of Annibal directed; which all that were "in place and heard it, rather praised for the present, then put in practice and effected afterwards.
 "For no one thing was doct of all that he had said, save only Antiochus lent Polyxenidas for a navy
 "and army out of Asia; yea, there were Embassadors also dispatched to the General Diet of the L
 "Theffalians. And a day was appointed for the Ætolians and Aminander to meet the army at Phe-
 "ra, whither King Antiochus came straight after with his power. And while he staid there, ex"pecting Aminander and the Ætolians, he sent out one Philip a Megapolitan, with two thousand men
 "to gather out the bones and reliques of the Macedonians about Cynosephale, where the war with
 "Philip was determined, and the quartel decided by a famous battell: were it that therein be fol"lowed his own head and took a conceit, thereby to wind himself into grace and favour with the "Macedonian Nation, and to bring the King into obloquie and disgrace, because he left his souldiers
 "unburied: or that, as it is the vein (or vanity rather) engrained in Kings by kind, he set his mind "and busied his spirits in matters, for appearance gay and goodly, but in effect fond & foolish. There "he made a mount (as it were) of a number of bones gathered together into one place, that lay scat"tering and strewed here and there: a thing no doubt that the Macedonians conned him no thank "for, and which Philip (you may be sure) took in foul scorn and malicious disdain. And therefore
 "Philip, who at that time minded to take council of Fortune, and to be directed by her, as the en-
 "cined now, sent to Marcus Bibulus the Vice-Pretor, and advertised him, how Antiochus invaded
 "Theffalia, and if it pleased him to stir out of his winter habour, he would meet him, that they might "confer both together what were best to be done.

While Antiochus lay now encamped before Phera, where Aminander and the Ætolians had
 "joynd with him, there came Embassadors from Larissa, expostulating, Wherein the Theffalians "had so offended either by deed or word, that he would molest and trouble them with war?
 "and which beleeching him to retire & withdraw his forces, and debate the matter (if he had ought a"gainst them) by his Embassadors. At the same time they sent five hundred men in armes, well ap"pointed, under the governance of Hippolechus, to be seized and kept by the Kings forces, returned to "Phera, by reason that all the avenues were kept by a gracious answer, and said,
 "Scouts. As for the Embassadors of the Larissians, the King made them a gracious answer, and said, "That he was entered into Theffaly, not by way of hostility to distress them, but in friendly man"ner to maintain and establish the freedome of the Theffalians. Likewise the Pherians giving him no an"swer again, dispatched unto the King an Embassador of their own, one Panfanias, a principal man "of their City. Who after he had pleaded the semblable remonstrances to those, that had been "in the like case alleged and laid forth in the behalf and name of the Chalcidians, in that Coun-
 "cell holden near the freights of Euripus, and besides, uttered something else with more bold"ness and courage, the King dismissed him, after he had willed them to confider more of the "matter, and be well advised, that they took not that counsell which anon they would repent, "whiles they sought to be too wary, provident, and forsaeking the future time. When this em-
 "bassage was related at Phera, the Citizens took no long time to deliberate, but soon resolved in "the maintenance of their faith and loyalty to the Romans for to undergo whatsoever hazard the

A the fortune of war should present unto them. Whereupon both they addressed themselves to "defend the City with all their might, and also the King began to assault and batter the walls on all "parts at once. And knowing well enough (as in truth there was no doubt) that in the issue of all "the siege of that City which he first enterprised, lay the whole importance and consequence of all, ei"ther to make him despised ever after, or feared and dread of the Theffalians, therefore he terrified
 "the besieged inhabitants, on every side, and by all means possible that he could devise. The "first assault they sustained stoutly and manfully, but afterwards seeing many of the defendants were "either overturned and slain, or grievously hurt and wounded, their hearts began to quake: yet re"flectall exhortations, to persist still in their purpose and resolution, they quit the utmost compas-
 "B of their wall (seeing a what default they were for want of men) and retired themselves more in"ward into the City, into one part thereof, which was strongly fortified with a mure and lefs cir"cuit and compass then the other. At the length, overcome with travell and calamities, and fear"ing that if they were forced and taken by assault, they should find no mercy nor pardon with "the conqueror, they yielded themselves. The King following the train of victory, delayed no "time, but while the night was fresh, sent four thousand armed men presently to Scoutia, where "the townsmen made no stay, but rendered the town and themselves incontinently, having before "series, were compelled to do that at last which they obtrarily refused at the first. Together with "the City itself was surrendered also Hippolechus and the Larissan garrison under his hand. All of
 "C them the King sent away without any hurt or violence offered unto their persons: for he thought "thereby to win the hearts and love of the Larissians. Having accomplished these exploits within "ten daies after his first coming to Phera, he marched towards Crane with all his army, and at his "first coming won it. Then he regained and seized Cyrra and Metropolis, and the boroughs & "forts about them: so as now all those quarters were subdued and put under his subjection, except "Atrax and Gyro. Then he determined to assail Larissa, supposing, that either upon the fearful "terror of the Cities forced, or in regard of his desert in dismissing the garrison so courtcou-
 "ly, or by the present example of so many Cities yielded unto him, they would not long persist "in their obstinacy. And for to terrify them the more, he commanded the elephants to march in "the forefront of the vanguard, and approached himself in a square battell, with four sides, in such
 "D sort as the hearts of many of the Larissians waved in doubtful suspense, between forced fear of "present enemies, and kind regard of absent friends.

In this time Aminander, with the whole youth and manhood of the Arthamans, became mas"ter of Pelinaum, Memphis also with three thousand Ætolian footmen and two hundred horse "went to Perthabia, won Mallas and Cyrris by assault, and waited the territory of Tropolis. Hav"ing performed these exploits with great expedition, and celerity, they returned to Larissa unto
 "the King, and arrived even then when as the King was in consultation what to do with Larissa:
 "for the council was divided into diverse opinions. Some thought it good to proceed forcibly,
 "and not to defer and assail the Cities wals with fabrics and engines of battery on all sides at once:
 "alleging that the town being situated in a plain towards the champaign field side, might be ap-"E proched unto with ease and invetted every way. Others again inferred one while, that there was "no comparison between the strength of this City and of Phera: otherwhile, that it was now winter
 "time, and a season of the year far unfit for warlike executions, and most of all other for the siege and "assault of Cities. As the King thus hung in the equal ballance of hope and despair, the Em-
 "bassadors of Pearsalus arrived, who, as good hap was, being come to surrender up their town, revived "his spirits and mightily comforted his re.

M. Babius in this mean while having parled and conferred with Philip in the Darsareians
 "country, sent Appius Claudius by the common advice of them both, to the succour and defence
 "of Larissa: who passed through Macedony, and by long journeys came to the top of those hills "that command Genni. Now this Genni is a town twenty miles distant from Larissa, seated just
 "F in the very freights of that forest and pass called Tempe; who having taken up a larger circuit
 "of ground to encamp in, then was proportionable to his number, and made more fires in them then "need was for that company, gave semblance unto the enemy (which was the thing he aimed at)
 "that all the Roman forces were there, together with King Philip. King Antiochus therefore "preteending unto his army, that the unseasonable winter that approached, after he had stayed one "only day before Larissa, dilogged, and thence departed, and so returned to Demetrias. The Æ- "tolians likewise and Arthamanians repaired to their own countries.

Appius albeit he saw that the siege was levied (which was the only cause of his coming) yet
 "down he went to Larissa to encourage and confirm the hearts of the allies against the time "to come. And a two-fold joy there was, both because the enemies were gone and had quit their coun"try, and also for that they saw the Roman garrison within their wals. King Antiochus departed
 "G from Demetrias to Chalcis, where he fell in a fey and love with a damell of that City, daughter "of Cleopolemus a Chalcidian. Now after he made means to the maidens father first by intercel-
 "lion of messengers and mediators, and after by importuning him in his own person with earnest "requests by word of mouth (who was very loth and unwilling to entangle & tie himself in match"ing her so high above his own calling) at length so overcame the man, that he obtained his desire:
 "and as if it had been a time of settled and confirmed peace, he proceeded to consummate and cele"brate

brat the marriage. And forgetting clean, how at one time he had undertaken the charge of two affairs so important, to wit, the war with the Romans, and the deliverance of Greece, he passed away the rest of the winter in feasts and banquets, and in those delights and pleasures, which ordinarily (you wot well) follow upon the liberal drinking of wine; yea, and when he had then by rather wearied his body than fulfilled his appetite, he gave himself to sleep, without compass. The like riot and loose life took hold of the rest of the Kings captains, by example in all places, but in Bactria especially, such as commanded the garrisons. Nay, the very soldiers were let loose and given over to take voluptuous waies, and not one of them would put on armor, keep the watch, and stand the guard, or do any thing pertaining to the duty and charge of a soldier. And therefore at the beginning of the spring, when he was come by Phocii and Cheronea, to the Rodanus, where he had appointed from all parts his forces to meet, he soon perceived that the soldiers had spent the winter as licentiously as their leaders, and kept no better order and straighter discipline. Then he commanded Alexander the Acarnanian, and Menippus the Macedonian, to lead the army to Stratus, a town in Aetolia. Himself having done sacrifice at Delphi to the honour of Apollo went forward to Naupactum. And after the Diet holden of all the States of Aetolia, in the way which leadeth to Stratus, along by Chalcis and Lysimachia, he encountered his own forces aforesaid, that came by the gulf of Malea. Where Maeiobus, a Principal Acarnanian, but wrought and bought with many gifts and presents, not only himself won that nation to take part, & to side with the King, but also had drawn to his own mind and affection Cilius their Pretor, who at that time had the sovereign rule there, and might do all in all. His seeing that the Macedonians (who are the chief of all the Acarnanians) could not be easily induced nor brought to revells, for the King sawe wherein they stood of the Roman fleet, which either was with Asinius, or about Cephalonia, went cunningly to work with them. For having delivered his opinion in their generall Council, that the inland parts of Acarnania were to be well guarded and defended; and that as many as were able to bear arms should go forth to Medio and Tyrrenum, for fear those places should be seized by Antiochus and the Aetolians: there were again some who made answer and said, how there was no such need that all should be raised and levied to tumultuously in half; for a garrison of five hundred men was sufficient. And when he had obtained that number of young & able men, he placed three hundred of them in garrison at Medio, and two hundred at Tyrrenum; his reach and drift was to have them put into the Kings hands for hostages. And even at that time arrived the Kings Embassadors at Medio, whose embassage being heard, they laid their heads together and consulted in the publick assembly what answer to return unto the King. Some were of opinion to continue still in the Roman society: others were of advice again, that the Kings offer of amity was not to be rejected. The counsell of Cilius was mean and indifferent between both, and therefore accepted to wit, that they should address the Embassadors to the King, to intreat him that he would permit them to take a day of deliberation upon a matter of such consequence as full Diet of the Acarnanians. In this Embassage Maeiobus, and those of his faction were employed of set purpose: who having dispatched messengers covertly to King, to advertise him to approach the town with his forces, trifled out the time themselves, and made no halt to let forward in their embassie. Whereupon these Embassadors were scarcely gone forth of the City, when Antiochus was entered the borders, and anon shewed himself hard at the gates. And whiles they that with nothing of this treason were affrighted, and in great trouble and tumult, called the youth hastily to arm, he was by Cilius and Maeiobus let into the City. Some willingly of themselves came running about the King: those also that were of the adverse part, for very fear joined with him. Whom he seeing to be afraid and terrified, he entertained with gracious words, and to gently handled them, that in hope of his clemency to much divulged and spoken of abroad, certain States of Acarnania revolted and turned unto him. Then from Medio he went to Tyrrenum, unto which place he had sent Maeiobus; and his Embassadors aforesaid. But the treachery and deceit at Medio being discovered, made the Tyrreans more wary and careful then otherwise fearful, who made him this plain direct answer without any doubt, ambiguity, that they would admit of no new alliance, without the advice and authority of the Roman Generals: to they, that their gates, and disposed armed men upon their walls. Now it fell out very sily and happily for confirming and encouraging the hearts of the Acarnanians, that C. Octavius sent by Quintus, having received a garrison and some few ships of A. Posthumus, who by Asinius the Lieutenant had been appointed Governour of Cephalonia, was come to Lecaea, and much comforted the Allies, and put them in good hope, who also gave them to understand, that M. Acilius the Consul had already passed the seas with his legions, and the Romans were encamped in Thessaly. And for as much as this bruit carried a great likelihood of truth, by reason that the season of the year served now for navigation, the King after he had planted a garrison at Medio and in other towns of Acarnania, departed from Tyrrenum, and passing through the Cities of Aetolia and Phocis, returned to Chalcis.

Much about the time M. Bavius and King Philip, who had communed and devised together before (during the winter) in the Dardaniens country, having sent Appius Claudius into Thessaly, for to raise the siege before Larissa; and because the season then was unmeet and too soon for execution of any exploit, were retired to their wintering harbours, now in the beginning of the Spring joyned all their forces together and came down into Thessaly. (Now at that time was Antiochus in Acarnania.) And at their first coming, Philip began to lay siege unto

Malea

A. Malleus and Babius to Phocium: which when he had forced in maner, at the first assault he won Phocium also with like expedition. From whence having retired himself to Stratus, he took Cyrrhæa, and so consequently surprised Eretrium, and after he had planted garrisons in these towns that he had thus recovered, he joyined with Philip again lying in siege before Malea. Upon the very coming of the Roman army, when the townsmen had yielded themselves either for fear of forces, whereof the Athamans were seized: to wit, Aeginum, Eretrium, Gomphi, Silina, Tricci, Melissa, and Pholonia: After this, they invetted Pellium, where Philip the Megapolitan lay in garrison with five hundred foot, and forty horie: but before they gave the assault, they sent a trumpet to Philip to give him warning, that he should not adventure to try the assault, they sent a trumpet turned this answer again right stoutly unto them, that the would be content to commit himself to the Romans or the Thessalians, he passed not whether, but put his life and estate into the hands of King Philip he never would. Now when it appeared that they were to proceed by force, and for that it seemed that Limnaea also at the same time might be assaulted, it was thought expedient that the King should go to Limnaea, and Babius staid still to batter and force the town of Pellium.

It fortuneed at the same time that M. Acilius the Cos, having passed the seas with a power of 10000 foot, and 2000 horie and fifteen Elephants, commanded certain chosen Colonels of footmen to conduct all the Infantry to Larissa, whiles himself with the Cavalry came to King Philip before Limnaea. At the coming of the Consul the town was yielded incontinently: the Kings garison was delivered, and the Athamanians withall. Then the Consul went from Limnaea to Pellium self. And as he came down from the fort, Philip the King chanced to meet with him, and in scorn mockage came close unto him, and greeting him by the name of brother Philip, scoffing and jeering and put in ward, and not long after bent bound to Rome. All the multitude besides of the Athamans, as also of King Antiochus his soldiers, which were within the garrisons of those towns of 3000, the Consul departed to Larissa, to consult and take advice for the generall course of the their Cities. Philip having courteously and lovingly intreated above all other the prisoners of the Athamanians, that by their means he might win the grace and favour of that nation, and conceited some hope to conquer Athamania, led his army thither, and sent his captives aforeshand into and withall made report of the King his clemency and reputation among their countreimen, fully besides he alsed them: And Aminander verily, whose preience and majesty had kept some of them in allegiance, fearing lest he should be delivered into the hands of Philip (who long time had been his mortall enemy) and unto the Romans, whom he knew to have just cause at that time to be offended with him for his revolt, departed out of his own Realm with his wife and children, and retired himself to Ambracia. Thus all Athamania became subject to King Philip, and at his pleasure.

The Consul sojournd certain daies at Larissa, especially for to refresh his beasts, which first had been sea-sick, and afterwards were tired with long travel; and thus when he had renewed, as it were, and repaired his army with a little rest and repose, he marched to Cræta. At his coming thither, that lay there, were yielded up unto him, And having put unto their choice, either to be delivered unto King Philip; the rest he sent back dismayed to Demetria. Then he regained Proci ward the gulph of Malea: and when he approached the straights upon which the town Thamambus about the woods and passages, and from the higher ground charged upon the Romans in fee if they could scare them from such desperate outrage: but perceiving that they persisted still in such fort, that he got between those armed men and the town, and kept them from entrance; whereby he possessed himself of the City, being void of defendants. They that lay in the forefront of the wood, and fell upon the sword. The Consul then departed from Thamambus, and the second day came as far as the river Sperchius, and so forward unto the territory of the Hypæantii, which he spoiled.

During the time of these occurrences, Antiochus lay at Chalcis, who by this time seeing that he had gotten in Greece, but the pleasure of one wintering, spent so deliciously in Chalcis, and a dishonourable marriage: began to blame the Aetolians for their vain promises, and especially Thous; but Antiochus he had in great admiration, reputing him not only for a sage and prudent man, but also for a true Prophet, who foretold him of all things that then were come to pass: howbeit for feared that his cold slackness might not overthrow that quite, which his rash folly had begun and enterprised. he sent out his couriers into Ætolia, to give them warning to levy all their youth and assemble them together: and himself for his own part had brought thither almost 10000 footmen, who were made up full and furnished by them that after came out of Asia, and 500 horsemen besides. To this place, perceiving that there repaired smaller numbers by many degrees than ever at any time before, and that they were but the Nobles only and some few of their warriors, who protested that they had done their endeavor to levy out of their Cities as many as possibly they could: but neither by authority, nor for love and favour, nor yet with absolute command, were they able to prevail or do any good with them that refused warfare: and seeing himself thus forsaken on all sides, as well of his own subjects who dragged behind in Asia, as of his allies who performed not those matters, in the hope whereof they had called him to assist them, he withdrew himself within the Straights of Thermopila.

This mountain divideth Greece in the very middle, like as Italy is parted in twain by the ridge of the Appennine. On the fore-part of this straight and forest of Thermopila toward the North lyeth Epirus and Perrhebia, Magnesia and Thessaly, also the Phthiotæ of Achaia, and the gulph Malea: but more to the southward is discovered the greatest part of Ætolia and Acarnania, Phocia, Locris, and Boeotia, together with the Island Eubœa joining close thereto: behind it is situate the country of Attica running into the sea like a promontory, and besides it Peloponessus. This mountain taking his beginning at Leucas and the Pontus or Western sea, reacheth through Ætolia to the Levant or Easterly Ocean, and is so full of rocks and rough crags between, that no whole armies, nor so much as single travellers lightly appointed, can find but hardly and with much ado the waies and paths to pass through: the utmost brows and the hills of this mountain bending toward the east, they call Ossa: and the highest pitch and knop thereof, is called Callidromos: at the foot whereof lyeth the valley leading toward the gulph of Malea, wherein the plain is not above three or four paces broad. And this is the only high and port-way to which any army may march, if it be not otherwise impeached. And hereupon it is, that the passage is called "Pylæ": and of some (because there are found therein certain natural hot waters or bays) Thermopila: even that very place which is so famous and renowned for the memorable death of the Lacedæmonians more than for any worthy battell against the Persians. Here lay encamped Antiochus at this present, carrying nothing that mind nor resolution as those Lacedæmonians did: within the gates as it were of the Straights, where he enclosed and stopped the passage besides, with strong defences: And when he had cast a double rampire and trench, yea, and raised a mure and wall where need was (which to do the place afforded him great plenty of stone lying every where) and had made all sure: presuming confidently that the Roman army would never venture nor be able to break through those barriers: that way he sent of those 4000 Ætolians (for so many were met together) some to keep a garrison in Heraclea, situate even before the very gulph and freight: and others to Hypata: for that he made no doubt but the Consul would assail Heraclea, and many posts brought word, that all about Hypata was already walled.

Now the Consul having spoiled the territory of Hypata first, and then of Heraclea (where the Ætolians aids did no good and served to no purpose in the one place or the other) pitched his camp over-against the King, even in the very mouth of the gulph, near the fountains of the hot waters aforesaid: both those regiments above-named of the Ætolians were got within the town Heraclea, and there kept themselves sure. Antiochus, who before he saw his enemies, thought all was fast enough and sufficiently fenced, began then to fear lest the Roman soldiers would find out some privy paths and waies, thereby they might pass and get over those high hills that commanded his camp: for a rumour ran, that the Lacedæmonians in times past were so enclosed by the Persians, and of late daies also King Philip was likewise compassed and environed by these very same Romans. Whereupon he dispatched a messenger to the Ætolians in Heraclea, willing them to do him thus much service yet in these his wars, as to seize the tops of those hills and to keep them that the Romans might have no passage that way. Upon this message received, there arose some dissension among the Ætolians. Some were of mind to obey the King his will and commandment, and to go accordingly; but others thought better to tarry still at Heraclea, to attend upon fortune and see what would happen: to the end, that if the King should chance to be vanquished by the Consul, they might have in readiness their forces fresh and in heart, to succour and aid their own Cities near at hand; or if his luck were to defeat the Consul, then they might follow the Romans in chase, when they were disbanded and scattered asunder. Both parts, thus divided as they were, not only persisted still in their several designs, but also put the same in execution by themselves. For two thousand of them remained at Heraclea; the other two thousand parted themselves three waies, namely, to Callidromos, to Rhodania, and Tichius, (these are the names of three principall high hills;) and each company took and held one. The Consul when he saw that the Ætolians were possessed of these higher places, sent M. Porcius Cato and L. Valerius Flaccus, two of his Lieutenants (who both had been Consuls) with two thousand chosen men against these holds of the Ætolians, to wit, Flaccus against Rhodania and Tichius, and Cato against Callidromos: himself before that he advanced his battell against his enemies, made a brief speech unto his soldiers in this manner: "My soldiers, I see that the most part of you even of every quality and degree, are they that in this very Province sometime served under the conduct, charge, and government of T. Quimius in the Macedonian war. The Straights of

A "of that passage then, near the river Aous, were it more difficult to gain and get over than this is; for here are very gates, yea, and one natural way (as it were) to pass through, as if all else were stopped up between two seas. There were more stronger defence, and conces against them at that time, and those planted in places more convenient and commodious. The army of the Macedonians, the Thracians, and the Illyrians all most fierce and warlike nations: in this are Syrians and Asiatick Greeks, or half Asiatick the vainest kind of people of all others, and born to serve. The King there, namely Philip a most noble warrior excelled and excelled ever from his youth in the neighbour wars of the Thracians and Illyrians. & all the nations bordering upon him: but this Antiochus (to say nothing of all his line besides) is he who being come out of Asia into Europe, for to make war upon the people of Rome hath done all the long winter time nothing more memorable than this. That for to please his wanton lust he hath taken to wife the daughter of a privat person; a man (I say) of low degree and base quality among other Citizens: & this new married man, fat and franked (as I may to say) with dainty suppers & delicate bread-bankets, is come forth (forsooth) to fight a battell, his whole strength and all his hope hath been in the Ætolians, a people of all others most vain, unconstant, and unskillful, as ye have tried heretofore, and Antiochus findeth true at this present. For neither assembled they in great number, nor possible was it to keep them together in the camp: nay, which is more, they mutine among themselves, and having demanded and required the guard of Hypata and Heraclea, they have defended neither the one nor the other. Some of them are fled to the tops of the mountains; others have shut themselves within Heraclea. The King himself hath confessed plainly, that he was never so hardy as to meet in plain field and affront the enemy, nor nor so much as to pitch his camp in open ground; in that abandoning all that country before him which he vanquished and bragged that he had taken from us and Philip, he hath hidden himself among the rocks. He hath not encamped before the entrance of the gulph and Straights (as the same goeth of the Lacedæmonians in times past) but pitched his tents far within. And to bewray his cowardly fear, what difference is there between doing, and houting himself within the walls of some City for to be besieged? But neither shall those narrow Straights save him no more than those steep hills defend the Ætolians, which they have seized. This one thing hath bene our aid and provided for on all sides, that ye shall have nothing to make head against, but your enemies.

D "Now must ye resolve upon this point. That ye fight not only for the liberty of Greece (and yet even this also were a brave and honourable title, to be said for to deliver the same now out of the hands of Antiochus and the Ætolians, which before you freed from King Philip) nor that ye shall have no other reward and recompence for your pains, but that which we shall find now in the Kings camp, but also that the great provision and furniture which daily is expected from Ephesus, shall be your prize and booty, and that ye shall hereafter make a way for the Roman Empire into Asia, Syria, and all those most wealthy and rich Realms, even as far as to the Levant. And what shall let us then, but that from Gades to the red sea we bound and limit our State and Dominion, even with the very Ocean that environeth and compasseth the round globe of the earth? What shall hinder us, I say, but that all the nations of the world shall honour and worship the Roman name next unto the immortal gods? Prepare your hearts therefore and courages answerable to so high rewards, that with the leave and help of the gods we may to-morrow fight a field. After this speech the assembly brake up, and the soldiers being dismissed, made ready their armor and weapons, before they took repast or repose. And in the morning, by dawning of the day, the Consul put out the signal of battell, and let his army in array, seeing the ensigns of his enemies, led forth his forces likewise. Part of his light armours he placed before the rampier and trench in the forefront, then he placed the flower and strength of the Macedonians, whom they call Sarissephori, i.e. Pikemen, for the fury and safeguard of his defences and fortifications. And to flank these on the left side, he put the archers, the flingers of darts, and flingers of stones, hard upon the foot of the hill, that from the higher ground they might all edge and point of the mures and defences, which as they were enclosed and mounded with those places which reach to the sea, and are unpassable by reason of the bogs, muddy marshes, quagmires, and quicksands, he let the Elephants with their ordinary and usual guard. After them his horsemens and men of arms. Then leaving an indifferent space between, he ranged the rest of his forces in the second ward or middle battallion. The Macedonians who were belted before the camp and the trench, the first sustained the Romans easily enough (who assailed on every side to make an entry) for much help they had of them, who from the upper ground weighed bullets out of their slings, as thick as an hail storm, who lanced darts also, and shot arrows besides. But when as afterwards greater numbers of enemies pressed upon them, and charged them with such violence as possibly might not be endured, they gave ground, and retired within their fortifications, keeping yet their array and their ranks whole. And then from the rampier they made (as it were) another palliade with their long pikes that they held out afore them. Now the height of their camp-mure was so reasonable, that as it afforded some rise and vantage of ground for their own men to fight upon it, so by reason of the length of their spears, they might reach the enemy under them, in so much as many of the Romans approaching rashly, and venturing to clamber up, were run clean through: and either they had given over and done nothing, or else more of them had died for it, but that M. Porcius Cato having beaten from the top of Callidromus the Ætoli-ans, and slain a great part of them (for he surprised them suddenly at unawares, and most of them fast asleep) appeared upon the hill that commandeth the camp. Flaccus sped not so well at Tichinus and Rhoduntis, who laboured to get up those cliffs and holds, but to no purpose. The Macedonians and the rest that were in the Kings host and camp, at first, when they perceived aff right nothing but a multitude and number marching, imagined verily, that they were the Ætoli-ans, who having discovered the battell and fight a good way off were coming to aid them. But so soon as they beheld and discerned near at hand the engines and armour of the Romans, they took themselves in their own error and were upon a sudden stricken with such fear, that they all flung their weapons away, and fled. But both their fortifications and defences in the way & also the narrowness of the vale through which they were to be pursued, hindered the Romans in following the chafe. And the Elephants above all which were in the rearward took up the ground so, as that the footmen could hardly pass by them, and the horsemen by no means possible: so affrighted were the horses, and caused more trouble and disorder among themselves, than they did during the battell. Besides the Romans staid sometime behind, whilst they rifled and rancked the camp. However, they had the enemy in chase that day as far as Lylæum, killing and taking in the very way, not only many horses and men, but also slaying the Elephants which they could not take alive; which done, they returned to their own camp, which that day had been assailed by the Ætoli-ans, who were of the garrison of Heraclea; but that enterprise, as it was exceeding bold and audacious, so it took no effect at all. The Consul having at the relief of the third watch the night ensuing, sent before his Cavalry to pursue the enemy, advanced likewise the ensigns of his legions forward by break of day. The King by this time had won some ground, and got a good way before; for he never gave over galloping with bridle in horse neck, until he had recovered Elatia. Where first he gathered together the broken ends of his army thus dispersed in flight, and so having rallied a small and poor troop of footsiders, and the same earned by the halts, he retired to Chalcis. The Roman Cavalry was not able to overtake the King himself at Elatia, but overthrew and cut off a great part of his army, which either for weariness rested themselves dragging behind, or else were scattered one from the other, as missing their way in those unknown quarters, going as they did without their guides: and letting aside five hundred which kept about the King, there was not one that escaped of the whole army. Which was but a small number in proportion L of 10000. (if they were no more) for so many (according to Polybius) we have written that the King conducted over with him for his part into Greece. What were they then to that great power, which (if we believe Valerius Antias) came with the King for he writeth that he had in his host three score thousand, and that forty thousand were slain of them, and above five thousand taken prisoners, with the loss of military ensigns two hundred and thirty. Of Romans there died in all a hundred and fifty.

As the Consul marched with his army through Phocis and Bœotia, the States and Cities which were privy to the revolt and partly culpable, stood without their gates with their infants and veils in token of peace, and craved mercy, fearing they should have been pillaged and rancked as enemies. But his host journeyed every day in a peaceable and friend-country, doing no hurt or wrong to any earthly creature, until they were come into the territory of Corona: where the State or Image of Antiochus erected in the Temple of Minerva kindled their choler. And the footsiders were permitted to spoil the country lying about that Temple. But bethinking themselves that (considering the said Statue was set up with the publique consent of all Bœotia) it was an indignity to deal so hardly with that territory only of Corona, the footsiders were immediately called in and reclaimed, and so they ceased the waiting and spoiling thereof. The Bœotians only had a check and rebuke by words for carrying so unthankfull hearts to the Romans, of whom they had so lately received such high favours and benefits.

At the very time of the battell aforesaid, there rode at anchor ten ships of the Kings, in the gulph of Malea near to Thronium under the charge and conduct of Isidorus. To which place Alexander the Acarnanian, being fled from the conflict, fresh bleeding and full of grievous wounds, brought news of the unfortunate fight. Whereupon the ships in great fear for this late terror, made haste and away to Ceneum in Eubœa, where Alexander died, and was interred. But three other ships which were come out of Asia, and lay in the same road, upon the news of the defeat of the army returned to Ephesus. And Isidorus crossed the seas from Ceneum to Demetrias, if peradventure the King were fled thither. About that very time, A. Attilius the Admiral of the Roman navy intercepted and surprised great store of the Kings provisions, which had passed already the straits near the Island Andros. Some ships he sunk, others he boarded and took: as for those that came hindmost in the rearward, they turned sail and shaped their course into Asia, Attilius being returned to Pyrgæum (from whence he came) with a fleet of ships taken from the enemies, divided great store of corn both among the Athenians and other allies also of that country.

Antiochus somewhat before the Consul his coming, loosed from Chalcis, and first fell with the Island Tenaris, and afterwards sailed to Ephesus. Against the Consul his arrivall at Chalcis the gates were left open for him, and Ariftoles the Captain there for the King, quit the place upon the approachment of the Consul. In like manner other Cities in Eubœa yielded without resistance. And so within few daies (when all troubles were appeased and set in quiet order without the hurt and damage

A damage of any one City) the army was brought back to Thermopylae, and won much more honour and commendation for the modesty used after victory, than for the victory it self.

From thence the Consul dispatched M. Cato to Rome by whose certain and true relation the Senate and people might have full knowledge of all the affairs that had passed. Who taking sea at Cresusa (a port town of Merchandise standing within the immortall gulph of Corinth), arrived at Tutris, a City in Abas, from Patris, he coasted along the rivers of Ætolia and Acarnania, as far as Corinthus, and so cut over to Hydruntum in Italy, from whence he travelled by land, and exceeding great haste within five daies came to Rome. Early in the morning before day light he entered the City, and from the gate rode directly to M. Junius the Prætor, who attended the Senate sometimes by the break of day: and thither, L. Cornelius Scipio (whose some daies before had been dismissed B and sent away from the camp by the Consul) hearing at his first coming that Cato was got before him, and in the Senate repaired, even as he was relating the news. Then these two Licentiates by the commandment of the Senate were presented in the general assembly of the people where they declared the fame which they had done before in the Senate house, as touching the deeds achieved in Ætolia. And ordained it was that a solemn procession for three daies should be holden, and that the Prætor should sacrifice forty head of greater beasts, in the honour of what gods he would himself.

And at the same time M. Fulvius Nobilior, who two years before went as Prætor into the farthest Spain, entered the City in pomp of an Ovation, or petty triumph. He came to be born before him of silver bigs 130000. And besides that, silver in coin and ready money, 12000 pound C weight. Also in gold the weight of 127 pound. Atilius the Consul sent certain messengers from Thermopylae to the Ætoli-ans at Heraclea, to advertise them that before he came they would now at last be wiser, and bethink themselves (after such experience of the King his vanity and infidelity) for to deliver up Heraclea, and crave pardon of the Senate, either for their willful folly, or their blind error. Who used these and such like motives and inducements unto them, namely, That other Cities likewise of Greece (during this war) abandoned the Romans and revolted from them, at whose hands they had received so many benefits: yet because that after the King was fled (upon whose assurance they had disloyally broken their allegiance) they stood not out still, nor permitted obstinately in their fault and folly, were received to mercy and protection. The Ætoli-ans likewise albeit they followed not the King, but sent for him, and were rather conductors and D leaders, than companions and associates in this war, yet if they could take up in time and repent, they might be pardoned and saved. But no answer returned they tending to peace: nay, it appeared, that the matter would come to a trial by arms, and for all the King was vanquished, yet the Ætolian war was behind as wholly and entire as before time. Whereupon the Consul dislodged from Thermopylae, and marched directly against Heraclea: yea, and the very same day he rode on horseback all about the walls to view the situation of the City. This Heraclea is seated at the foot of the mountain Oeta: & though the town it self standeth in a plain, yet a fortress it hath built upon an high ground, which as it overlooketh the City, so it is so steep on every side, that it is altogether inaccessible. After he had diligently beheld all things that were to be marked and known, he determined to assault the town in four places at once. Unto L. Valerius he gave in charge to plant his platforms and to batter that side where the river Asopus runneth, and where the publique place of exercise is built. T. Sempronius Longus had commission to assault the Castle, without the walls indeed, but yet better inhabited and more peopled (as a man would say) then the town it self. On that side which standeth toward the gulph of Mælea, which part yielded the hardest access, he appointed M. Babius. And from another petty river which they call Atis, he set Appius Claudius opposite against the Temple of Diana. Through the great industry and earnest labour of these four gallants, striving who could perform the best service, the work went so well forward, that within few daies the frames and platforms, the Rams and all other engines of battery meet for the assault of Cities were finished. For besides that the territory about Heraclea, being a moory ground and full of tall trees, afforded them plenty enough of timber to frame and percing F all sorts of fabrics: the houses also in the entry of the City without in the Suburbs standing void, by reason that the Ætoli-ans had put themselves within the walls, yielded unto them not only posts, beams, joists, planks, and boards, but brick, and tile, plaster, mortar, and stone of all sizes for divers and sundry uses. So, the Romans assaulted the town rather with fabrics, ordnance, and artillery, than by force of arms: but the Ætoli-ans contrariwise defended themselves by main strength and their weapons. For when as the walls should be shaken with the Rams, they caught not hold of them as the manner is with cords, and by plucking them aside, avoided their force: but armed in great number, they carried fire with they to fling upon the terraces and the fabrics. They had besides divers vaults and arches in the walls at which they could readily and safely fall out: and ever as themselves closed up the breaches of their walls, or made G new for the ruin, they would remember to make more of those vaults still, that in many places at once they might break forth upon their enemies. Thus for the first daies, whilst they were fresh in heart, they issued forth oftentimes and many together, and quit themselves right lustily: but afterwards in fewer numbers, and more feckly every day than other. For being ever more employed about many things at once, nothing so much tamed and wearied them, as watching. For whereas the Romans had a great number of footsiders, and one guarded after another successively by turns; the Ætoli-ans being so few, were constrained without any change, to continue in unceasing stant labour night and day. Thus for the space of twenty four daies they had no rest nor respite but day and night was all one unto them, maintaining fight fill, and labouring without intermission against the enemies that assailed the City in all four quarters at once. When the Consul knew once that the Ætoliens were wearied and overtired (partly by counting the time, and partly by that which he had learned of certain fugitives) he used this policy and stratagem. About midnight he founded the retreat, and having drawn all his soldiers at once from the assault, held them quiet in the camp until the third hour of the day. After that, he began to give a fresh charge, and continued it unto midnight following, and so gave over again until the same hour before noon. The Ætoliens supposing verily that the cause why they surceased the assault, was for very weariness (like as themselves were tired out) so soon as the Romans had the retreat sounded unto them, departed every man from his ward and quarter, as if they also by the same signall were called away, and shewed not themselves in armor upon the walls before the third hour of the next day.

The Consul having at one time given over the battery aforesaid at midnight, began at the fourth watch a fresh assault again with all forcible means in three parts: and at one side, he gave commandment to T. Scampronius to keep his men together, and intently to observe and wait for the signall: assuring himself that in the alarm by night, the enemies would run to those places from whence they heard the noise. The Ætoliens many of them being found asleep, had much to do to rouse themselves, and were loath to rise up from their sweet sleep, their bodies being so weary with toiling mowing, and watching before. Some of them who were yet awake ran in the dark to the place where the assailants made a noise. Their enemies laboured to get into the town, some by mounting over the ruins and breaches of the broken wall, others by scaling and climbing with ladders. And against them the Ætoliens ran from all parts ready to succour and help. One quarter, whereas there stood houses without the City, was neither defended nor assailed: but as there were some ready and waited for the signall to give the assault, so there was not one of the other part for to resist and defend. Now began the day to peep, when as the Consul put forth the signall, and the soldiers began to mount over into the City, and found none to withstand them: some entered at the walls half broken down, others scaled them with ladders where they stood whole and found. And the cry was not so soon heard that the City was taken, but the Ætoliens left their guards on all sides, and fled into the Castle. The soldiers that had won the town were permitted by the Consul to ransack it: which was not done so much upon anger and despite, as in this regard, that the soldiers who had been kept short & fasting thus long (notwithstanding so many towns recovered out of the enemies hands) might once at length in some one place taste the fruit of victory. The Consul, having called from thence about noon, the soldiers unto him, divided them into two parts, whereof he commanded the one to cast about the foot of the hills unto a rock or cliff, which being in height equal to the Castle aforesaid, was notwithstanding divided from it by a valley between, seeming as if it had been sometime a part thereof and cut from it. Now these two points of the hills flew up so near together in the head that from the top of the one a man might lance a dart into the Castle or fortres. The Consul, with the other half of the soldiers staid beneath, expecting a sign and token from them that were to get up the cliff behind, ready thereupon to mount up from the town side into the fort. The Ætoliens that were within the Castle could neither abide at the first the shout of those that had seized the cliff, nor afterwards the assault of the Romans from the City, both for that their hearts failed them and were dained already, and also because they were unprovided of all necessities for to endure any long siege and assault: considering that women and children and all the other impotent multitude unmeet to bear arms, were got thither in so great numbers that the place was hardly able to receive and contain much less to keep and maintain them: and therefore at the first assault they cast down their weapons and yielded. Among other principal personages of the Ætoliens, Damocritus also was delivered: he, who in the beginning of the war when T. Quintus desired to see a copy of the Decree of the Ætoliens for the sending for Antiochus, answered, That he would shew it him in Italy, when the Ætoliens lay there encamped. For this proud speech of his, the Romans now conquerors, were the gladder that they had got him into their hands.

During the time that the Romans assailed Heraclea, Philip also besieged and battered Lania, according as it was before agreed between them for to be near unto Thermopylae, at what time as the Consul returned out of Boeotia, he met with him, of purpose to signify his joy in the behalf of him and the people of Rome for their achieved victory; and also to excuse himself by occasion of sickness that he was not present with him in person in the managing of the wars. From thence they parted asunder, and took divers waies, for to assault these two Cities (as I said) both at once: and distant they were one from the other near seven miles. And so far as Lania was feared upon an hill therefore the town discovered and overlooked all the country about, but especially on that side toward Heraclea, where, by reason that it seemeth a less compass, it representeth a full prospect to the eye. When as the Romans and Macedonians labouring and striving who could do better, were day and night employed either about their fabrics and pioneers work, or else in skirmish and fight: the Macedonians found more difficulty than they, in this respect, that the Romans were busied in platforms, mantles, and works all above ground: but the Macedonians were put to undermine: and oftentimes (as it falleth out in such stony and craggy ground) they met with hard flints and rags not minable, and such as no iron or steel tool was able to touch and pierce. The King seeing little good done by this means, and his enterprise going but slowly forward,

A ward, began to sound the townsmen, and to tempt them to render the City, using the mediation therein of their chief Citizens whom he paried withall: for this is known he made, that if Heraclea were forced before it, they within the City would sooner yield unto the Romans than to him, and so the Consul should win all the thank to himself for leaving the siege. And nothing was he short of his count: for immediately upon the winning of Heraclea, a messenger came unto him from the Consul, willing him to surseale the assault and the siege: alleging, it was more reason, that the Roman soldiers who had fought in ranged battell with the Ætoliens, should have the reward and recompence of the victory. By this means Lania was abandoned, and by therein of Heraclea her neighbour City avoided and escaped the like calamity of her own.

Some few daies before that Heraclea was won, the Ætoliens having assembled a Diet at Hydruntum, addressed Embassadors unto Antiochus, and Thas among the rest even he, who aforesaid had been lent unto him. His commission and charge was, first, To request the King that he might have would rally his forces as well by land as at sea, and in person pass over into Greece: secondly, If any other important affairs hindered him, yet that he would lend unto them both men and money: so it made for the safeguard and security of his own Realm and Royall estate, not to suffer the Romans (after they had once defeated the Ætoliens) to fall over into Asia at their ease and therefore prevailed the more with the King. Whereupon he delivered money presently to the Embassadors, sufficient to defray the charges of the war, and promised certainly to lend unto the King both by land and sea. Thas alone of all the Embassadors he kept still with him, who was not himself unwilling to stay behind, because he might be ever at hand to call upon the King for to perform his word and behest. But the winning of Heraclea killed the hearts clean of the Ætoliens in the end: and within few daies after that they had dispatched their Embassadors into Asia, about the renewing of the war and sending for the King, they laid apart all designs of arms, and addressed their Orators unto the Romans to crave peace. Who, as they began to make some speech, the Consul cut them off, and said, he had other matters of greater importance to think upon and to dispatch: and commanded them to content themselves with a truce for ten daies, and to return to Hydruntum, and with them he sent L. Valerius Flaccus, unto whom they should declare those things that they were about to deliver unto him, and whatsoever else they desired in the lodging of Flaccus, consulting with him what course they were to take in their treaty with the Consul. And when they went in hand to allege the ancient rights of the leagues, and to lay abroad their good demerits, and what they had done for the Romans: Flaccus bad "them lay a straw there, and speak no more of the privilege of those covenants and accords which they themselves had broken: shewing unto them, that they should speed better and gain more by a simple confession of their trespass, and in recourse only to prayer and humble supplication: forasmuch as all the hope they might have of safety, relied not in their own desert and goodness of their cause, but in the meer clemency and mercy of the people of Rome: promising for his part to assist them and second their petitions as well to the Consul as the Senate of Rome, since that thither also they must of necessity send an Embassage. This way seemed to them all, the best simply for their safety, namely, to put themselves to the disposition and devotion of the Romans: for they supplied by this means to drive the Romans for very shame to have regard of them & not to offer hurt or violent outrage to them, coming in the habit of poor suppliants: and yet withall, if any opportunity of better fortune should in the mean time offer itself unto them, to be their own Masters nevertheless and at their choice. When they were come before the Consul, Phanceus the chief of that embassie, made a long Oration, couching and framing his words sundry waies right artificially, to mitigate and assuage the wrath of the conqueror, which he knit up and concluded with this speech, saying, That the Ætoliens committed themselves and all that they had to the mercy and protection of the people of Rome. When the Consul heard those words: See you do so then indeed (qd. he) ye Ætoliens, and take heed I advise you that you deal herein bona fide. Then Phanceus brought forth and shewed a fair instrument of a Decree, wherein the same was enrolled in plain terms. Since that (qd. he again) you mean good earnest of yours, and Menaeus of Epirus, (who being entered into N. Napellum with a garrison, had compelled the City to revolt) also Aminander and all the Nobles of the Athamans, by whose counsell and suggestions ye fell from us and rebelled. Phanceus interrupted the Consul before he had as allies to be protected by you: and I am verily persuaded you know not what you do, to impose those things upon us against all the manner and custome of the Greeks. The Consul replied again: In good faith, I pass not (qd. he) greatly what the Ætoliens deem well or ill done according to the fashions of the Greeks: all the whiles that I, after the custome of the Romans, have that power and command over them, who erewhile by virtue of their own decree yielded unto us. And heretofore by force of our arms have been vanquished and subdued by us. And therefore, be bound hand and foot: and with that he commanded chains and gyves to be brought forth, and the Lictors to come about them for to lay hold upon them. Then the stout courage both of Phœnus and the rest of the Ætolians, was well cooled & abated: and so at length they saw in what poor plight they were. And Phœnus made answer, That both himself and the Ætolians there present in place, knew well, that those things were to be performed which were imposed upon them, but (quoth he) there needs a Council of the Ætolians for to enact a decree thereof, and therefore he requested the Consul to allow a surcease of arms only for ten daies. Then Flaccus began to speak for the Ætolians, and at his request the said abstinence was granted, and so they returned to Hypata. When Phœnus had related in the privy Council of those elect peers of that nation called Apollates, as well the demands that were commanded, as what had like to have fallen upon themselves in person, the peers sighed deeply and groaned again, to see their miserable condition; howbeit they were all of opinion, that the victor must of necessity be obeyed: and a general Parliament assembled of the Ætolian Burgeses out of all their towns and Cities. When all that multitude was gathered together, and heard the same related again, their hearts so fretted within them at the cruelty and indignity of those Lordly commands, that if they had been well settled in peace, yet such a fit of anger had been enough to have put them into arms. And to stir the lume and choler the more, the difficulty of effecting the things demanded, helped well: for how possibly could they compass to deliver Aminander, being as he was an absolute King? But even then there was presented unto them by chance a new hope, For Nicander at that very time, coming from King Antiochus, filled the peoples heads with this vain expectation, namely, that the King made wondrous provision for war, as well by sea as land. This Nicander having accomplished his Embassy, and made return again into Ætolia, within the compass of twelve daies, after he was embarked, arrived at Phaleria in the gulph of Mæotis from whence he had brought the monies which he had, down to Lamia, whiles himself with certain noble men and light appointed, travelled toward Hypata in the evening, between the Roman and Ætolian camp, through paths that he well knew: he chanced to stumble, ere he was aware, upon the corps de guard of the Macedonians, and was brought to the King before supper was done, the table taken up, and the King risen. When Philip was advertised thereof, he shewed no other countenance, than if a friend or guest, and not an enemy was come; he bad him sit down at the board, and eat his meat. Afterwards he kept him there with him still in the room, and voided all the rest, willing him in no case to be afraid. "He blamed greatly the bad counsels and designs of the Ætolians (which evermore lighted upon their own pates) who first had brought the Romans, and then Antiochus into Greece. But for my part (quoth he) since things done and I am past, may sooner be blamed than amended, I am content to forget and put all under my foot, and will never be the man that will seek to insult over them in their distress and adversity. And so should the Ætolians likewise take up in time, and lay aside all their rancor and malice to me: and Nicander especially ought to remember this day, on which by my life was preserved. With that he sent him away with a good convoy, until he was past all danger: and this Nicander, as is before said, came to Hypata, even as the Ætolians were in deep consultation about peace with the Romans.

M. Acilius having either sold outright, or given away to the souldiers the booty of the country about Heraclea, and hearing that the Council at Hypata nothing tended to peace, and that the Ætolians were run together to Naupactum, for to abide in that place the whole violence of the war: he sent App. Claudius alone with 4000 souldiers to seize the tops of the mountains, where as the passages were difficult; and himself ascended up to the hill Ossa, and sacrificed to Heracles in that very place which they call Pyra, by occasion that the mortal body of that god was there consumed with fire: from whence he departed with his whole army & performed the rest of his journey well and marched with ease. Being come to Corax (an exceeding high mountain between Calipolis and Naupactum) he lost there many of his labouring beasts and sumpter hories, which together with their loads and fardels, as they went, tumbled down headlong from the mountain, and his men also were much troubled and encumbered. Whereby it was soon seen, with how lazy and idle an enemy he had to deal, who had not better and kept with a guard that difficult passage, to empeach and shut up the thorough-fare from the enemies. Howbeit, as much toiled and troubled as his army was, he defended to Naupactum. And having erected one Fort against the Castle, he invested all the other parts of the City, and divided his forces according to the situation of the walls. This siege he found as toilsome and painful, as that at Heraclea.

At the same time began the Achaens to lay siege to Messene also in Peloponnesus, for that it refused to be of their Council and association. For these two Cities, Messene and Elis, were exempt from the Achaean Diet and accorded with the Ætolians. Howbeit, the Eliaus, after that Antiochus was chased out of Greece, gave the Embassadors of Achaia a more mild answer, to wit, That when they had discharged and sent away the Kings garrison, they would consider of the matter what to do. But the Messenians having without any answer at all, sent the Embassadors away, had levied war: and fearing much their own estate, seeing their territory overpread with an army, and every where burned, yea, and their enemies encamped near unto their City, addressed unto Chalcis their embassadors to T. Quintius (the very man who before had sent them at liberty) to signify unto him, That the Messenians were ready both to open their gates & also to surrender their City unto the Romans & not to the Achaens. Quintius so soon as he had heard their embassy, sent a messenger inconspicuously to Megalopolis, unto Diophanes, the Prætor there of the Achaens, to command him presently to retire his host from Messene, and to repair unto him. Diophanes obeyed

A. obeyed his commandment and having raised his siege, marched himself lightly appointed for speed before the rest of his army, and about Andania, a small town between Megalopolis and Messene, encountered Quintius. Unto whom after he had shewed the causes of the siege, he received at his hands a gentle rebuke only, for that he had enterprised a matter of so great consequence without stir and trouble the peace, made for the good and benefit of all. The Messenians likewise he charged to call home their banished persons into their City, and to join with the Achaens in their general Diet and Assembly. And if they either had any matters to retuse, or would willingly provide for themselves against the future time, he willed them to make their repair unto him at Corinthus and enjoyed Diophanes immediately to summon the Diet of the Achaens for him, where personally himself would be. Where, after he had complained as touching the Island Zacynthus, that by fraud and treachery they had come by and kept, he required that it should be restored to the Romans. Now this Isle had sometime appertained to Philip the King of the Macedonians, and he gave it unto Aminander, in consideration, that he might conduct his army into the higher parts of Ætolia, through Albanania: in which expeditions and exploits of his, the Ætolians hearts were so abated and quailed, that they were constrained to seek peace. Aminander made first Philip the Megapolitan governour of this Island; but afterwards, in time of that war wherein he banded with Antiochus against the Romans, he called him away from thence to employ him in martial affairs, and sent Heracles the Argentinian to succeed him in his place. This Heracles, after the defeat and flight of Antiochus from Thermopile, and the expulsion of Antiochus out of the Prætor of the Achaens, and for a sum of money agreed upon between them, betrayed the Island to the Achaens. The Romans thought it great reason, that this Island should be theirs, in recompence for the wars which they had maintained; forasmuch as M. Acilius the Consul, and the Roman legions fought not at Thermopile for Diophanes nor yet for the Achaens. Diophanes to these challenges and demands sometime excused himself and the whole nation, otherwhiles flood to it, and avowed the action, and maintained the cause by a plea of right. Somewhere were of the Achaens at this present much blamed the Prætor for his wilful obstinacy. And by their advice and authority an act was let down, that the whole matter should be referred and put to Quintius, to determine what he pleased. Now had Quintius this matter, if a man crossed and thwarted him, he was fierce and fell; if one yielded and gave place, he was gentle again and pliable. And therefore, without heaving any sign of debate, either in language or countenance, thus he spake. "If I thought (quoth he) and were periwaded in my heart, that it were good and commodious for the Achaens to hold and possess this Island in question, I would advise the Senat & people of Rome to let you enjoy it. But like as a Tortoise, so long as she keepeth her self close within her shell (I see) is sure and safe enough, against all blows and offense: whatsoever; but when the once putteth forth any parts, look whatsoever is discovered and naked, the same is weak and subject to injury: even so you Achaens, being enclosed round about with the sea, are able easily to adjoin unto your selves whatsoever lyeth within the precinct of Peloponnesus, and to keep the same also when you have laid it to you: but so soon as for a greedy desire of having more and encroaching further, you go beyond those bonds, you lie open without, and are exposed to all hurt and damage. Thus Zacynthus was delivered to the Romans with the assent of all the Council there assembled, and Diophanes durst not say a word more to the contrary.

At the same time King Philip asked the Consul as he marched to Naupactum, Whether it was his pleasure, that he in the mean while should recover and regain those Cities which were revolted from the association of the Romans? And having a grant and warrant from him, he led his forces against Demetrius, knowing well enough in what terms of troubles that City then stood. For being forlorn and in utter despair, seeing Antiochus had forsaken them and no hope at all remaining in the Ætolians: they looked every day and night either for the coming of Philip their heavy friend; or else even the Romans themselves a worse enemy, like as they had a more just cause of anger and indignation against them. A confused and disordered sort there were of King Antiochus his souldiers, who being but a few at first left there to lie in garrison, grew after to be more and most of them unarmed; such as after the field was lost [at Thermopile] thither changed to flee, and neither had strength nor heart enough to abide a siege. And therefore when Philip sent certain messengers before unto them, to signify, that there was some hope that they might merrily enter at his pleasure. At his first entrance, certain chief men of mark quit the City and departed, and Ensilichus killed himself. The garrison souldiers of Antiochus (for so they had capitulated) were conducted to Gysmachia through Macedonia and Thrace, accompanied with a convoy of Macedonians, for fear that any man should do them harm. There were some few ships also in the rode of Demetrius, under the command of Isidorus, which together with their leader and Captain were dismissed. After this, he regained Dolopia, Aperantis, and certain Cities of Perrhæbia.

During the time that Philip was employed in these affairs, Quintius having recovered the Island Zacynthus, departed from the Diet of the Achaens, and crossed the seas to Naupactum, which had been beleaguered already two months, & was at the point to be forced and lost: which if it might have been won by assault, it was thought that the whole nation and name of the Ætolians there would have perished for ever. And albeit he had good cause to be highly offended and displeased with the Ætolians, in remembrance that they only checked and impeached his glory, at what time as he set Greece free: and that they were nothing stirred and moved with his authority, when he (forewarning them that those things would happen which afterwards fell out just so indeed) would have discomfited and feared them from foolish and furious designs: yet, supposing that it was a special part of his charge and work, that no nation of Greece (now freed by him) should utterly be subverted and destroyed, he began to walk up and down along under the walls, to the end that he might be seen, and soon known of the Ætolians. And anon the very formost guards took notice of him, & noised it was presently throughout all the ranks and companies that Quintius was there, And thereupon they ran from all parts up to the walls, every man stretched forth his hands, and with one accord and consonant voice called by name unto Quintius, beseeching him to help and save them. And albeit he was moved at these their piteous cries with commiseration, yet for that time he signified by the turning away of his head, that he refused and denied them: asking withal, What lay in him to do them any good? But afterwards, being come unto the Consul, "Know you not (quoth he) O M. Atilius whereabouts we are, and what we have in hand? or if you be a man provident enough, esteem you not that it mainly concerneth the common-weal? He let the Consul by these words a longing, and caused him to give more attentive ear what he would say, and withal, Why do you not speak forth (quoth the Consul) and utter your mind what the matter is? Then quoth Quintius: "See you not that after you have vanquished Antiochus, you spend and lose much time here in the siege and assault of two Cities, when as now the year of your government is well near come about? And Philip in the mean time without seeing a battell or the enigns of his enemies displayed, hath gained and joyne'd to himself not Cities only, but so many nations already, namely, Atabamania, Perrhebia, perantia and Dolopia? But it is nothing to good and expedient for us, nor standeth it so much upon, to take down the Ætolians and pare their nails, as to look unto Philip that he wax not too great: and (seeing you and your soldiers have not got yet two Cities in reward and recompence of victory) not to suffer him to go clear away with so many nations of Greece. The Consul accorded hereunto: but he thought it a shame and dishonour for him to give over the siege and effect nothing: but afterwards, all the matter was put unto the disposition of Quintius. Who went again to that side of the wall, whereas a little before the Ætolians called and cried aloud unto him. And when as they intreated him more earnestly and with greater affection to take pity of the Ætolian people, he willed some of them to come forth unto him. And immediately, Phancas himself with other principal persons of the Ætolians, went out unto him; unto whom lying prostrate and groveling at his feet: "Your present fortune (quoth he) and hard estate wherein you are, caused me both to temper my choler and also to stay my tongue. Those things you now see are faine out, which I foretold would come to pass. And now so much as this is left unto you, That the calamities fall upon your heads can be truly said to have light upon them that have not deserved as much. Howbeit, since it hath been allotted unto me as it were by destiny to be a foster-father (as I may so say) to nurse up Greece, I will not cease even to do you good, as thankless and ungrateful persons as you are. Send your Orators to the Consul, to intreat him to grant you a truce for so long, until you may address your Embassadors to Rome, by whom you shall wholly refer and submit your selves to the Senat: and I will not fail to be an intercessor and advocate to the Consul for you and likewise unto the Senat. And, as Quintius counselled them, so did they. Neither rejected the Consul their Embasie, but granted them abstinence of war for such a term as within which they might have an answer of their Embassage to Rome: so he dislodged the siege was raised, and the army sent unto Phocis. The Consul together with Quintius passed over the sea to Ægium, unto the general Council of Achaia. There was much treaty and parly about the Eleans, and the restoring of the Lacedæmonians exiles: but nothing was effected in the one or the other. As for the Lacedæmonians, the Achæans were desirous to reserve that for themselves, and to win thereby a thank, as proceeding from their special grace. And the Eleans, chose rather to come and be united to the Achæans Parliament of themselves, than by the mediation of the Romans. The Embassadors of the Epilots came unto the Consul, who (it was well known) carried not themselves found and upright in the entreating of the Roman amity: howbeit, they had not levied a souldier for Antiochus. Charged they were to have relieved him with money; and deny themselves they could not butt they had sent their Embassadors unto the King. And when they put up a petition, that they might be accepted again into the ancient band of amity: this answer the Consul returned unto them, That he knew not yet whether to range them in the number of enemies, or peaceable friends, and thereof the Senat should be judge; and therefore he referred their whole entire cause to Rome. And to that purpose a truce he granted them of fourscore and ten daies. The Epilots thus sent to Rome, presented themselves before the Senat, and when they stood rather upon these terms in recounting those things wherein they had not shewed any open hostility, than in declaring themselves of those matters that were laid against them: they received (such an answer, as whereby they might be thought rather to have obtained pardon, than to have made good and justified their cause. The Embassadors also of King Philip about that time had audience given them in the Senat, who came to congratulate with the Romans, testifying their own joy, and wishing theirs

A theirs for their victory: and upon their request, that they might sacrifice in the Capitoll, and offer an oblation and present of gold in the Temple of Jup. Opt. Max; the Senat gave the good leave. So they presented and offered a crown of gold weighing one hundred pound, These Embassadors had not only a friendly answer and gracious dispatch: but also Demetrius the son of King Philip, who had lien as an hostage at Rome, was delivered unto them, for to bring home again unwaged against King Antiochus in Greece.

The other Consul P. Cornelius Scipio, who's lot was to govern the Province of Gaul, before that he took his journey to that war which he was to make against the Boians, demanded of the Senat, that money should be assigned unto him, for to perform those plaies and games which he had promised by vow, as Vice-Prætor in Spain, when he was driven to a great extremity in a battell. This seemed to be a strange and unreasonable demand. Whereupon the LL. of the Senat and counsell of the Senat, the same he should exhibit and set forth either with the issue of the spoils got from the enemies, (it haply he had reserved any money raised thereout to that purpose) or else delay the charges out of his own purse. These plaies and games P. Cornelius represented for the space of ten daies. And near about the same time, the Temple of the great goddess Came Cybele (or Idas) was dedicated. This goddess being brought out of Asia in the time that P. Cornelius Scipio (furnamed afterwards Africanus) and P. Licinius were Consuls, was conveyed from the sea-side into the mount Palatine. The Temple was set out to be built at a price (according to an act of the Senat) by M. Livius and C. Claudius the Censors, when M. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. Thirteen years after the bargain was made for the edifying thereof, M. Junius Bruns dedicated it. and for the honour of this dedication were the first five plaies exhibited, (as Valerius Antias mine author saith) called thereupon Megeseis. In like manner C. Lucius Race called Circus Maximus. The same had M. Livius the Consul vowed thirteen years before, even that very day in which he defeated Alexandus and his army. The same Livius in his Consulate were Consuls. And in the honour of dedicating this Temple, the plaies were set forth: and all was done with more devotion, because there was a new war intended against King Antiochus. In the beginning of this year in which these things passed, whiles P. Cornelius the Consul staid still behind at Rome, (for M. Atilius was gone forth already to war:) it is found in records, there, And the soothsayers gave expresse order that they should be burnt quick, and the ashes to be thrown into Iber. Also it was reported, that at Tarracina and Amicinium, it rained stones sundry times. Item, That in Minturnæ the Temple of Jupiter and the shops about the marketplace were blasted and smitten with lightning; and in the very mouth of the river Volturnus, two ships caught fire from heaven, and were consumed. In regard of these fearful prodigies, the Decemvirs by order from the Senat went to the books of Sibylla and perused them: and out of their learning pronounced, that a solemn fast should be now instituted in the honour of Ceres, and the same to be observed and holden every five year: also that a novendial sacrifice for nine daies together could continue; and a supplication for one day: and that they who went in this procession and supplication, should wear garlands and wreaths of flowers upon their heads: lastly, That the Consul P. Cornelius should sacrifice to what gods, and with what beasts, the Decemvirs would appoint and pronounce. When the gods were pacified as well by the accomplishment of the vows accordingly, as by taking order for the expiation of those wondrous signs the Consul took his journey into his province: from whence he commanded Cneus Domitius the Pro-Prætor (after he had called his army) to depart to Rome: and himself entred with his legions into the territory of the Boians.

Within a little of that time the Ligurians (by vertue of a sacred law that they had) levied and assembled an army, and by night assailed the Camp unawares to Quintius Minutius the Pro-Consul. Minutius kept his souldiers in order of battell until day within his hold, having an eye and circumspect regard, that the enemy should not mount over the trench and defenses in any place. And at the day break he sallied forth at two gates at once: neither were the Ligurians repulled (as he hoped they should) at the first charge: for they sustained and held out the skirmish above two hours, with doubtfull event on both sides. At the last, when band after band issued out, and the end (besides other distresses, lost for want of sleep also) turned their backs, the Ligurians in the end (besides other thousand; of Romans and allies under three hundred. Two months after or somewhat less, P. Cornelius the Consul gave battell to the Boians and won the day: slew 28000 enemies. (as Valerius Antias writeth) took 34000 prisoners, gained 124 military ensigs, 12000 horses, chariots 247: and of the winners (as he saith) there died not above 1484. Where (by the way) how little credit soever (as touching the number) we give unto this Writer, (for in that point there is none over-reacheth more than he) yet apparant it is, that a right great victory it was: both for that the camp was won, and the Boians after that battell presently yielded themselves: as for that in regard of this victory a joyfull procession was by order from the Senat holden, and greater beasts slain for sacrifice.

menes who was gone to Elaa toward his fleet, within few daies after, with four and twenty covered ships, and more uncovered, returned to the Romans; whom he found preparing and marshalling themselves (a little short of Phocæa) for a battel at sea. Then set they all forward with a hundred and fifty clove covered ships, and more open and without hatches: and being with side Northern winds, at the first driven to the sea shore, they were forced to sail single in rank one after another. But afterwards, as the violence of the wind began to be allayed, they assailed to cross over to the haven Corycus, which is above Cyffus. Polyxenidas, as soon as he heard that the enemies were at hand, rejoiced that he had occasion presented unto him of a naval battel: and himself stretched forth the left point of his fleet embattled far into the sea, willing the Captains of the ships to display the right wing broad, toward the land: and so with an even front, he advanced forward to the fight. Which the Roman Admiral seeing, struck sail, took down the masts, and laying together all the tackling of the ships in one place, attended their coming that followed after. By which time there were thirty in a rank afront, with which, because he would make them equal to the left wing of the enemy, he set up the trinkets or small sails, meaning to make way into the deep, commanding them that followed still, to make head, and direct their prow against the right wing near the land. Eumenes was the reer-Admiral, and kept the reeward clove together: but so soon as they began to be troubled with taking down their tackling, he set forward with all speed and hait that he could make: and by this time were they in view one of the other. Two Carthaginian ships led before the Roman navy, which were encountered with three of the Kings ships. And considering the odds of the number, two of the Kings came about one. And first they wiped away the oars on both sides, then they threw themselves aloft with their weapons, and boarded her, and after they had either overturned or killed the defendants, they were masters of that ship. The other that was in single fight, and assailed but by one, seeing the other ship taken by the enemies, fled back into the main fleet, before she was environed by the three enemies. Livius chafing hereat, and angry at the heart, advanced forward with the Admiral ship afront the enemy: against her, those other two which had enclosed the Carthaginian ship afore said, hoping to do the like by this, came onward; which Livius perceiving, commanded the rowers to let their oars hang in the water on both sides, for the more stay and headiness of the ships, and likewise to cast their iron hooks fashioned like hands, for to grapple the enemies ships, as they approached and came near unto them: and when they were come to clove fight in manner of land-service, then to remember the valour of the Romans, and not to hold the Kings slaves for men of any worth. And with much more facility and ease, than the two ships before conquered one, this one forth gained two. By this time the main fleet on both sides encountered on all sides, and fought pell-mell. Eumenes who being in the reeward, came last in place, after the conflict was begun, perceiving that Livius had disordered the left wing of the enemies, made head against the right, where he saw them fighting on even hand, not long after the left wing began to flee. For Polyxenidas, so soon as he saw himself without all question overmatched in valour of the souldiers, caused the trinkets and all the cloth he had to be set up, and purposed to flee amain. Those likewise that were toward the land, and fought with Eumenes, within a while did no less. The Romans and Eumenes, so long as the mariners were able to plie their oars, and so long as they were in hope to annoy the tail of the enemies, followed the chase lustily enough: but after that they perceived their own ships (charged and heavily loaden with victuals) follow after to no purpose, and to lag behind, nor like to overtake them which were the swifter, because they were the lighter: staid at length their pursuit, after they had taken 13 ships both with their souldiers and mariners, and sunk ten. Of the Roman Armado there perished but one Carthaginian, which at the first encounter was beset with two ships. Polyxenidas never gave over flight, but made way still, until he had recovered the haven of Ephesus. The Romans abode that day in the place from whence the Kings armado came, purposing on the morrow to make fresh sail after the enemy. And in the mids of their course they met with those 35 Rhodian ships covered, conducted by Pifistratus their Admiral: and taking thole also with them, they followed the enemy even as far as Ephesus, where in the mouth of the haven, they rid in order of battel: by which bravado, having wrung as it were from the enemies a plain confession that they were vanquished, the Rhodians and Eumenes were sent home. The Romans setting their course for Chius, first sailed by Phameus, an haven Town of Erythraea, and having cast anchor that night, the next day they weighed, and arrived within the Island, close to the City it self, where having sojournd some few daies, especially to refresh their rowers, they passed forward to Phocæa. Where leaving four quinqueme Galeaces, the fleet arrived at Cana, and because the Winter approached, the ships were laid up in their docks on drie Land, and for their safety were trenced and paled about. In the years end the General assembly for election of Magistrats was holden at Rome, wherein were created Consuls, L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lelius. For now all men had an eye to the finishing of the war against Antiochus. The next morrow were the Pretors also chosen, namely, M. Tuccius, L. Aurunculeius, Cneus Fulvius, L. Æmilius, P. Junius, and C. Arvinius Labeo.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the seven and thirtieth Book.

B Lucius Cornelius Scipio the Consul, having for his Lieutenant P. Scipio Africanus (according as he had promised; but he would be Lieutenant to his brother, if Greece and Asia were ordained to be his Province, whereas it was thought that C. Lelius, for the great credit that he was in with the Senat, should have had that Province given him) took his voyage for to war against Antiochus, and was the first Roman that ever sailed over into Asia, as Captain and Commander of an army. Æmilius Regillus the son of Africanus taken prisoner by Antiochus, was sent home to his father. M. Acilius Glabrio triumphed over Antiochus, whom he had driven out of Greece, as also over the Rhodians. Afterwards, when Antiochus was vanquished by L. Cornelius Scipio (with the assistance of King Eumenes, the son of Attalus King of Pergamus) he had peace granted unto him, upon condition, that he should quit and forgo all the Provinces on this side the mount Taurus. And Eumenes, by whose help Antiochus was overcome, had his Kingdom enlarged. To the Rhodians also, for their helping hand, certain Cities were given and granted, One Colony was planted, called Bononia. Æmilius Regillus, who vanquished the Captains of Antiochus in a naval battel, obtained also a naval triumph. L. Cornelius Scipio, who finished the war with Antiochus, had the like surname given him as his brother, and was called after Anaticus.

The seven and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

Vhen L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Lelius were Consuls, after order taken for the service of the Gods, there was no matter treated of in the Senate, before the suit of the Ætolians. And as their Embassadors were instant and earnest, because the term of their truce was but short, so T. Quintius, who then was returned out of Greece to Rome, seconded them. The Ætolians, relying more upon the mercy of the Senate, than the justice of their cause, and ballancing their old good turns done to the Romans, to the late harms and trespasses committed, used humble supplication. But so long as they were in presence before the Senators, they were wearied with their interrogatories of all hands, who sought rather to fetch and wring from them confession of a fault, than any other answer; and when they were bidden to void out of the Senat-house, they caused much debate within. For in the handling of their matter it was seen that anger bare more sway than pity, because they were not so much offended with them for being enemies, as they blamed them for an unruly, untamed, and unobedient nation. And after much hard hold for certain daies together, they relolved at length, neither to grant nor deny them peace. Two conditions were tendered and presented unto them, either to refer themselves wholly to the pleasure and disposition of the Senate, or else to deliver a 1000 talents: and withal to hold thole for friends or foes, whomsoever the Romans reputed theirs. And when they were desirous to draw from the Senators thus much, as to know in what points, and how far forth, they should submit themselves to the discretion of the Senat: they could have no certain answer to build upon. And thus without any peace obtained, they were dismissed, with express commandment to void the City that very day, and to begone out of Italy within 15 daies following. Then they felt to consultation in the Senat about the government of the Consular provinces. Both Consuls desired to have the charge of Greece. And Lelius was a great man with the Senat. Now when the house was minded that the Consuls should either cast lots or agree between themselves for their Provinces, he rose up and said, That it was more decent and becoming to put the matter to the judgment of that honorable court, than to the blind hazard of lots. To this Scipio for the present made answer, that he would consider better of it: and after he had conferred secretly with his brother apart (who advised him to be bold and put it to the Senat) he gave Lelius to understand, that he was content to do as he would have him. When this strange course and manner of proceeding (either new and unheard of before, or else after so long disuse of the practice thereof forgotten and taken up again) caused the Senat to arm themselves against a great strife and contention, then P. Scipio Africanus said, That if they would ordain his brother L. Scipio to have the Province of Greece, he would accompany him in that voiage in quality of his Lieutenant. This one word of his (accepted of them all with a general consent) staid all debate: for a great mind Africanus the Conqueror assist the Consul and the Roman legions. And all in a manner assigned Greece to Scipio, and Italy to Lelius. But the Pretors had their Provinces, set out to them by lot: L. Aurunculeius obtained the civil jurisdiction of citizens, and L. Fulvius of forainers: L. Æmilius Regillus was L. Admiral of the armado, P. Iunius governed Tuscan, M. Tuccius Apulia and the Brutii.

Brutii, and L. Atinius Sicius. Moreover that Consul, who was to be employed in Greece, had a commission granted, besides that army which he should receive of M. Acilius (and those were two legions) to furnish himself with a supply of 3000 footmen, and 100 horsemen of Roman citizens: also of 3000 foot, and 200 horse of allies that were Latins: and besides granted it was in the same commission, that when he was arrived into his Province, he should pass over with his army into Asia, if he thought it to expedient for the Common-wealth.

Unto the other Consul was allowed an entire whole army of new souldiers, consisting of two Roman legions, and fifteen thousand foot and six hundred horse of the Latin allies. Q. Minucius had direction (by reason that he wrote how he had performed in his Province all that there was to be done, and that the whole Nation of the Ligurians had yielded subjection) to translate his forces out of Liguria into the Bolians country, and to deliver the same to P. Cornelius the Proconsul. Out of that territory which he had taken away from them after they were vanquished, those City legions were withdrawn, which had been levied and enrolled the year before: and committed they were to the charge of M. Tullius the Pretor, besides 15000 foot, and 6000 horse of Latine allies: and all these forces were to be employed for to defend and keep in obedience, Apulia and the Brutians country: As for A. Cornelius the Pretor of the former year, (who with an army had the government of the Brutii) he was commanded to deliver unto M. Acilius (if the Consul thought it good) the legions transported over into Etolia, if he would remain there still: but if Acilius would rather return to Rome, then A. Cornelius with that army, was to remain in Etolia. Thought good it was, that C. Atinius Labes should receive of M. Acilius, the government of Sicily and his army: and if it pleased him, to take up and enrol out of that very Province 2000 foot and 200 horse, for to supply and fulfill the broken companies. P. Junius Brutus had commandment to levy a new army for the government of Tuscany to wit, one Roman Legion, and 10000 foot of Latine allies, and 400 horse. Also L. Aemilius the Admiral, was to receive of M. Junius the Pretor of the former year, twenty Gallies, and the mariners and oars thereto belonging: and besides, to levy himself 1000 mariners more, and 2000 footmen: and with those ships and souldiers to sail into Asia, and to receive the fleet of C. Livius. As for them that were already in the government of both the Provinces of Spain and of Sardinia, they were to continue there still for one year longer, and to have the same armies at command. This year were two centurions of corn levied of Sicily and Sardinia: and order was given for all the Sicilian corn to be sent into Etolia to the army: but out of Sardinia, that one part should be brought to Rome, and the other transported over into Etolia, even to the same place that the other of Sicily afore said.

Before the Consuls set forward into their Provinces, it was thought meet, that the Pontifices should give order for the expiation of certain prodigies: for at Rome the Temple of Ino Lucina was smitten with lightning: so as both the lantern-yeas, and the leaved dories thereof, were foully disfigured. Likewise at Puteoli, the Town walls in many places, and one gate, was blasted with lightning, and two men besides were stricken dead therewith. At Narfa it was for certain known, that the day being fair and clear, there arose a stormy tempest, wherein also two free men lost their lives. The Tuscans reported, that with them it rained earth. And the men of Reate brought word, that within their territory a female mule foled. These prodigies (I say) were expiated: and the like festive holy-daies were celebrated anew, for that the dole of itself was not given unto the Lauretains, which of duty should have been delivered. Moreover, a solemn supplication was ordained, in regard of all errors and faults escaped in divine service and religious observances. Also out of the books of Sibylla, the Decemvirs declared and shewed, to what Gods, sacrifice should be made: and ten young princely free born, and ten Virgins likewise, whole Fathers and Mothers yet lived, were employed about the ministry of those sacrifices. The Decemvirs also by night sacrificed young sucklings. And P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, before he took his journey, erected an arch in the Capitol (over-against the high street that leadeth thither) with 7 gilded statues and 2 horses: and before that arch, he set up two ceterms or lavers of marble. About this time, 43 principal persons of Etolia, (among whom were Demetrius and his brother) were conveyed to Rome, by two Squadrons or cohorts sent of purpose from M. Acilius: and there were laid up fast in the prison called "The strong quaries": which done, the cohorts afore said were commanded by L. Cornelius the Consul, to make return to the army. From Prolemus and Cleopatra (King and Queen of Egypt): there came Embassadors, testifying their joy which they conceived in the behalf of the Romans, in these terms, That M. Acilius the Consul had chased King Antiochus out of Greece: exhorting also the Romans to transport an army into Asia for that not in Asia only, but likewise in Syria, all men were smitten with fear and amazed. As for the KK. of Egypt, they would be ready to do for their parts, whatsoever the Senat should set down. Thanks were returned to the K. and Q. afore said, and order was taken, that to the Embassadors for a reward should be given 4000 brazen Ases apiece.

L. Cornelius the Consul, having accomplished all things to be done at Rome, published an Edict in a general assembly, That as well those souldiers whom himself had enrolled for supply, as they who were with A. Cornelius in the Brutians country, should all meet at Brundisium upon the Ides of Quintilis. Moreover he nominated three Lieutenants, Sex. Digritus, L. Apustius, and C. Fabius Luscinus, for to gather ships together out of all the Sea-coasts into Brundisium. And when he had prepared and set all things in good order, he departed from the City, clad in his rich

A rich coat of arms. There prelent unto the Consul as he went forth, to the number of 3000 volunteers, Romans and allies together, who had served their full years in the wars under the conduct of P. Africanus, and now were exempt from souldiery, who all offered to go with him and to be enrolled as prest souldiers. Much at the time that the Consul took his journey (during the festival Apollinare games in the honour of Apollo, upon the fifth day before the Ides of July) it changed, that in the day time when the air was clear and fair, there arose a sudden darkness during the Eclipse of the sun, by reason that the body of the moon was directly under the Circle and rundle of the sun. L. Aemilius Regillus also Admiral of the war, at the same time went to Sea. L. Anronius was charged by order from the Senat, to build 30 Gallies with five banks of oars, and 20 Gallies with three banks, because a bruit was blown and blazed abroad, that Antiochus upon the late battail at Sea, was about to prepare a much greater armada.

The Etolians, after their Embassadors were returned from Rome and had made relation, that there was no hope of peace, albeit all their Sea-coasts (except only toward P. Ispontus) were spoiled and wasted by the Achaeans, yet minding more their perill to come, than remembering their loils received, seized the mountain Corax, intending to impeach and stop the passage of the Romans. For they made no question nor doubt, but that the next spring they would return to besiege and assault Nausipatum, Acilius, who witt well what they expected, thought it better to go in hand with an enterprise unlooked for, and namely, to assault Lamia: for thus he thought. That seeing they had been already brought to a great strait and extremity by King Philip: if now they might be taken suddenly and surprised at unawares, because they stood in fear of nothing else. Whereupon, removing from Elatis, he encamped first in the country of his enemies next to the River Sperchius: from whence by night he dilogged, and advanced forth with his ensigns, and by the day break had invetted their walls round about. Great fear and hurly there was, as in an accident unlooked for: yet all that day they defended the City more resolutely, than a man would have believed and thought they could have done in so sudden a danger: whies mentioed at defence upon the walls, women set up ladders in many places, and brought the men weapons and darts of all sorts: yea, and rones up to the walls unto them. Acilius, after he had founded the retreat, brought back his men into the camp about noon: and after they had there refreshed their bodies with meat and rest, he gave them warning (before he dismissed the Pretorium) that ere day-light the next morning they should be ready in arms: for that he would not come back again with them into the camp, before they were masters of the Town. At the same time as the day before, he gave assault in many places: and for as much as the Townsmens strength decayed, their darts and weapons failed, and above all, their hearts faint, within few hours he won the City. After he had made a riddance of the pillage, fold home part, and given away the rest, he fell to take counsel what to do afterwards. There was not one man of opinion to go against Nausipatum, considering that the Etolians held and kept the pass of Corax. Howbeit Acilius, to the end that he would not keep the field in summer without doing some exploit, and that the Etolians might not enjoy that peace by the slackness of the Roman souldiers, which obtain they could not at the Senats hand, he purposed to besiege Amphissa: and so the army was conducted thither in Heraclea, by the mountain Oeta. When he had encamped himself under the Town walls, he began not to invent it round with men as he did Lamia, but with ordnance and engines to batter it. In many places at once he ran with the ram against the walls: and albeit they were shaken, the Townsmen went not about either to make ready, or to devise and invent any means of defence against that instrument or engine. All their hope was in trusty armour and hardy valour. And so often they failed forth, that they disordered and troubled not only the guards of the enemies, but also those that attended about the fabricks and artillery. Howbeit, in many places the wall was battered and breaches made: and even at that very instant news came unto him, that his successor had landed his army at Apollonia, and was coming by the way of Epirus and Thessaly. Now came the Consul with a power of 12000 foot, and five hundred horse. And by this time was he passed as far as to the vale and level of Malea: and having sent certain afore to summon the City Hypata, and received answer again, that they would do nothing but by a publick decree of the Etolians: because the siege of Hypata should not stay him, and Amphissa not yet won, he led his forces against it, and sent his brother Africanus before. Ere they came, the Oppidans had quit the Town, for by this time the wall in many places lay open and naked, and were all fled armed and unarmed into a Castle which they had, impregnable. The Consul pitched his tents six miles from the Town.

Thither arrived the Athenian Embassadors, and first they repaired to P. Scipio, who, as we have said, was gone before the main army, and afterwards to the Consul, intreating for the Etolians. Of the twain they received a gentler answer at the hands of Africanus, who seeking some hope of occasion to leave the Etolian war, set his heart and eye wholly upon Asia and King Antiochus: and to this purpose he willed the Athenians to persuade not only with the Romans but also with the Etolians, to prefer peace before war. And speedily, through the motion and perswasion of the Athenians there was a solemn embassy of the Etolians dispatched from Hypata. Induced they were the rather to hope for peace by the speech of Africanus (for to him they came first) "who discoursed unto them, how that many Nations and Cities in Spain first, afterwards in Africa, had put themselves under his protection, and in them all he had left greater testimonies of his clemency and bounty, than of his warlike valour and martial prowels. Thus they had brought the matter (as they thought) to a good pass, and made it sure: but when they came before the Consul, they had the same answer of him, with which they were sent away from the Senate, and commanded to avoid. The Aetolians wounded therewith anew, seeing they could win nothing neither by the mediation of the Athenian embassy; nor the gracious answer of Africanus: said, they would make report thereof unto their States and country-men. So, they returned from thence to Hypata, where they were to seek what to do, and could not resolve: for neither had they whereof to raise a thousand talents: and again, if they should absolutely put themselves into their hands, they feared to feel the smart thereof in their bodies. Therefore they commanded the same Embassadors to go again to the Consul and to Africanus, and to exhibit a petition, that if they were minded indeed and verily to grant them peace, and not by vain flattery and semblance only to frustrate and delude the hope of poor suppliants, they would either rebate them a quantity of that grand sum of money, or else accept of their absolute surrender, that no free citizen might be touched thereby in his person. But nothing could be gotten at the Consuls hands, for to alter or relent any jot: thus was this embassy also sent away as it came, and nothing done. The Athenians came after them in place, the principal man of whose embassy, Echedemus, seeing the Aetolians wearied with so many repulses, and lamentably to no purpose bewailing the miserie of their country: put them still in some new hope, and gave them counsel to crave truce for six months, that they might address their Embassador to Rome, and receive an answer from thence: shewing unto them, that this delay could not augment their present calamity, which could not worse be; but contrary-wise, time and space coming between might afford many accidents whereby their present misery might be mitigated and allayed. So by the advice of Echedemus, the same men were sent once again, who had communed before with P. Scipio, and by his means obtained of the Consul a truce for that term: which was the thing they craved. The siege being raised before Amphissa, M. Acilius, after he had delivered up his army into the hands of the Consul, resigned his government, and departed out of the Province: and the Consul likewise from Amphissa returned unto Thessaly, intending through Macedony and Thracia to conduct his army into Asia.

Then Africanus entered into speech with his brother, and said: "The journey which you entreat, Scipio, I for my part approve and think well of, but all resteth in the will and pleasure of Philip: who if he be fast and faithful to the fate and Empire of Rome, he will grant us a passage, he will afford us victuals: he will furnish us with all things, which in so long a voyage are necessary to the help and sustenance of our army: but if he fail and forsake us once, you must make account of no safety and security throughout all Thracia: therefore I am of advice that the Kings affection be first sounded, and that will best be done if the messenger who shall be dispatched unto him, may come upon him on a sudden, and take him unprovided and having no time to put any preprepared plot in practise. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a most nimble and active young Gentleman, was at that time chosen for the fittest person to perform this action: who taking fresh post Hories all the way as he rode, with incredible celerity made such speed, that from Amphissa (for thence he had his dispatch) in three dayes pace, he arrived at Pella. The King was at a feast or banquet when he came, and wine he had taken full liberally. And finding him thus disposed to solace and recreate his spirits, he had no reason to suspect that he was minded and inclined to any change or alteration: and so for that time this guest was bidden welcome, and had good cheer made him. The morrow after, he saw the provision of victuals in great store ready for the armies, he beheld the Bridges made over the Rivers, and the high wayes mended and prepared: where passage was difficult. With these intelligences he returned to the Consul, with as great speed as he went and met him at Thaumaci. From whence, the army in much joy, and with greater and more assured hope, entered into Macedony: where all was provided to their hands. The King at their coming received them right lately, and at their departure conducted them on the way as royally. Very willing, ready and courteous he shewed himself: which Africanus much liked and highly commended, being a man as in all other things singular, so in allowing of elegancy and humanity, if it were without superfluity and excess, nothing nice and freight-faced. Thus they held on their journey unto Hellaspontus, passing through Macedony and Thrace, and Philip still accompanied them, and provided all things for their use as of necessity.

After the battail fought at Sea near Corycum, Antiochus having had all the winter time free without anyvemeachment to furnish himself with forces both for Land and Sea, above all things studied and devised how to repair his fleet, for fear he should be quite diseizied and dispossessed of the Sea. And evermore this ran in his mind, that he had an overthrow, and yet the Rhodians fleet was away. For thus he cast with himself, that if they also should be present at the next conflict (and surely the Rhodians thought he, will not for any thing be behind again) he then should have need of a mighty number of ships to match the enemies Armado as well in greatnes as goodnes. And therefore he had both sent Antibal into Syracusa for to take up the ships of the Phenicians, and also commanded Polyxenidas to repair those vessels which he had already, and to make and rig others, with so much more diligence as his fight afore was less fortunate. Himself passed the winter in Phrygia, and seeking for aid out of all places, he sent out as far as into Gallatracia. The people there at that time were great warriors: keeping still the courages of Gauls, for that the race of that nation was not yet extinct and worn out. His son Selenus he had left in Eolia with an army to keep the maritime Cities in obedience, which Eumenes from Pergamus of one side, and the Romans from Phocaea and Erythra on the other side, solicited to rebellion. The Roman fleet, as I said before, wintered at Cenchrea. Thither in the mid almost of winter came Eumenes with two thousand foot, and a hundred horse. Who having given out unto Livius, that great prizes might be raised out of the enemies territory about Tyritus, had so periwaded and wrought with him, that he went with him five thousand foot and soldiers: who being let forth to this rode and expedition, in few dayes drove away a mighty booty. Amid these matters, there hapned a mutiny in Phocaea, by occasion of some that would have withdrawn and turned away the hearts of the multitude unto King Antiochus. The wintering of the fleet was chargeable to that City. The imposition of a tribute was heavy, in regard that they were put to the finding of five hundred side callocks, and as many coats for liveries: the scarcity of corn also was grievous unto them: for which default the ships and the Roman garrison abandoned the place and departed: whereupon that faction which in all their speeches and assemblies drew the common people to side with Antiochus, was rid of all fear. The Senat and the principal citizens of Phocaea were of opinion to continue to the last, in the association of the Romans: but the periwaders and counsellors of a revolt were of more credit with the multitude.

The Rhodians were not so slow the summer past, but they were as forward now in the spring: for before mid March, they sent out the same Pausistratus Admiral of a fleet of six and thirty sail, and by this time Livius looked from Cenchrea, and sailed toward Hellaspontus, with thirty ships, and seven Gallies of four banks of oars, which King Eumenes had brought with him, to the end that he might prepare things necessary for the passage of the army, which he supposed would come by Land. And first he fell with the bay or port which they call, The rode of the Achaeans, from whence he sent up to Ilium, where, after he had sacrificed to Minerva, he gave gracious audience to the embassages of the neighbors bordering, which came from Elenus, Dardanius, and Rhetimus, who committed their Cities unto his protection. From thence he directed his course to the straits of Hellaspontus, and leaving ten ships in the rode over against Abydus, with the rest of the fleet, he passed over into Europe, to assault Sestos. As the armed soldiers approached their walls, the frantic Priests of Cybele called Galls, bereft of their wits, presented themselves first unto him before their gates, in their solem habit and vestments, laying, That they being the servants and ministers of Dame Cybele the mother of the Gods, were come by the instinct and commandment of that goddess to beseech the Roman General to spare the walls and the City. And not one of them had any harm done unto them. Among the whole body of the Senat which the Magistrates came forth to yield the Town, from thence they crossed over to Abydus, where (after many parties, in which they had sounded their minds, and could have no answer tending to peace) they addressed themselves to lay siege to the City, and to assault it.

Whiles these things stood thus about Hellaspontus, Polyxenidas a Rhodian born, but banished his country, and a Captain for King Antiochus, hearing that a Rhodian fleet was gone to Sea, and that Pausistratus their Admiral, had in open audience given out certain proud and disdainful speeches against him, entered into a privat quarrel with him, toiling and devising in his mind night and day nothing else, but how he might by some effectual and worthy deeds, check and confute those brave and glorious words of his. He dispatched therefore unto him as a messenger, a man well known unto him, with credence and instructions to give him to understand, that himself would (if he might) stand both Pausistratus and his country in good stead: and that Pausistratus (if it pleased him) had means to restore him again into his native country. When Pausistratus marvelled hereat, and was very inquisitive to know how this might be effected: and gave him his faithful promise (at his request) either to joyne with him in the action, or else to conceal all and keep counsel: then the messenger declared, that Polyxenidas would make over unto him the Kings navy either entire, or the greater part thereof: and in consideration and recompence of this so great demerit, he desired no more but that he might return into his country. The importance of this matter was so great, that he neither believed his words, nor yet neglected and despised the same. So he went to Panormus, a place in the Land of Samos, and there he abode to view and see the thing that was offered unto him, Couriers there ran between, and never would Pausistratus give credit to the party, until Polyxenidas wrote a letter with his own hand in the presence of his said messenger, that he would perform whatsoever he had promised, yea, and sent the same letters sealed with his own sign Manual. By this sure pledge or oage, Pausistratus made full account that he had the traitor surely bound and obliged unto him. For thus he thought, that Polyxenidas living as a subject under the Kings, would never hazard the danger of such pregnant matter to appear against himself, testified under his own hand-writing: so from that time forward the means of this pretended and counterfeit treason was devised and agreed upon. Polyxenidas gave him to understand, that he would of purpose lay aside and neglect preparation of all furniture, that he would neither have rowers nor other mariners in any number about his fleet: moreover, under a colour of calking and calstraining he would lay up some ships on dry Land: others he would send away into the havens near at hand, and keep some few riding at anchor before Ephesus in the haven, and those (if he were forced to battail) he would set out to fight. The same negligence that Pausistratus heard say Polyxenidas would use in his fleet, the same himself presently shewed in his own. For some of his ships he sent to Halicarnassus for victuals, and other to Samos the City, to the end that he might be in readines when the traitor gave the signal of assault.

Poly-

Polyxenidas still by false semblance increased the errors and vain imaginations of Paussanatus; for he some ships indeed he drew aloft and hid up dry, and as if he meant to hale up more, he repaired and amended the docks. Ormen and mariners he sent not forth out of their winter harbors to go to Ephesus, but secretly assembled them to Magnesia. Now it fortuned that a certain souldier serving under King Antiochus, who was come to Samos about some private affairs of his own, was apprehended there for a spy, and brought to Paussanatus before the Admiral Paussanatus. Who, being demanded what they did at Ephesus? I know not whether for fear, or upon small loyalty that he bare to his Prince and country, discovered all: namely, that the fleet hid in the haven rigged, decked and trimmed in readinesse. Items, that all the towers and mariners were sent to Sipylus in Magnesia: Items, that some vessels, and thoe very few, were drawn up to land, and the docks and harbors were shut up close: and lastly, that never at any time before, the navy was so carefully I harbored, nor Sea-affairs so well managed. But the mind of Paussanatus was so possessed before, with foolish conceits and vain hopes, that he would not believe these informations and intelligences for true. Polyxenidas having set all things forward and in good readinesse, by night sent for the towers and mariners from Magnesia: and having in great haile shot to Sea, and let afloat thoe vessels which lay at one side upon the land, after he had spent the whole day, not to much in making provision, as trifling out the time on set purpose, because he would not have the fleet to be seen when it set forth, weighed anchor and loosed after the sun was gone down: and with 70 sail of covered ships, because he had a contrary wind, entered the Bay of Pygada before day, where resting all the livelong day for the same purpose as before, the next night he sailed to the neereit coasts of Samos. From whence he gave commandment to one Nicanor an Archpirat, to let sail K for Palinurus, with five close covered ships, there to land: and from thence to march with his armed souldiers over the fields the neereit way to Pavimnus, and to come upon the back of the enemies: himself in the mean while divided his fleet into two parts, and made way to Pavimnus, there to keep the entry and mouth of the haven on both sides. Paussanatus at first was troubled for a while at this unexpected current: but afterwards, as one that was an old bearded souldier, he quickly took heart again, and calling his wits together, supposed that he might more easily repulse the enemies by Land than by Sea: and led his souldiers in two Squadrons unto the promontories which bearing out into the Sea like two horns, to force the haven: from which two capes or heads he supposed that he might easily set back and put by the enemies with shooting darts from both sides. But Nicanor who was sent by Land, impeached this design of his, so that he was L forced suddenly to change his mind and alter that counsell, and therefore commanded all his men to go a shipboard and away. Hereupon exceeding fear there was both among the souldiers and also the mariners, as if they were to take their flight by Sea and not to fight, seeing themselves environed at once both by Land and Sea. Paussanatus supposing the only way to escape and save themselves, was to make way through the mouth of the haven, and so to recover the sea-room: after he had seen all his men embarked, commanded the rest to follow, and himself first plying and labouring hard with oars, scudded again with his ship to the entrance of the haven. Now when she was once past the freight and come into the open Sea, Polyxenidas was there to welcome him with three Galeaces of five banks of oars, and so to beat him. The poor ship was wounded with the iron pikes bearing out in the beak heads of the Galeaces, and so bogged and sunk withal. M The defendants upon the hatches were overwhelmed with shot of darts, and among the rest, Paussanatus himself manfully fighting lost his life. The rest of the ships were boarded and taken, some before the haven, others within: and some there that by Nicanor were seized as they laboured to loofe from the land, and to launch forth. Five ships only of Rhodes, and two of Cous, escaped cleer and fled, which made themselves way even among the thickest of their enemies, by the means of a fearful burning flame of fire that they had with them. For they set me two long perches or poles bearing forward at the prow, like two spit-hails, in every ship, carrying iron pots and pans after them full of light fire. The Gallies of Erythraea, meeting the Rhodian ships not far from Samos as they fled, which were coming to help them, turned their course backward into Hellepontus, unto the Romans. About the same time Selenus gained the City of Phecia by treason, entering N at a gate which the warders set open of purpose for him: And for fear, Cyma and other Towns of that Coast revolted unto him.

Whiles these things thus passed in Eolia, and that Abydus had endured the siege for certain days by the defence of the Kings garrison that manned the walls: now that all were overtired and wearied, the Magistrates of the City (by the permission of Philotas Captain of the garrison) enticed with Livius upon conditions to render the Town. The only point whereupon they stood, and which they feared the conclusion, was this, for that they could not agree whether the Kings souldiers should be sent away armed or disarmed. And whiles they debated hereabout, news came of the Rhodians defeat, and so the opportunity of gaining the Town slipped out of their hands. For Livius fearing, lest Polyxenidas puffed up with the success of so great an exploit, would surprize the fleet that rid at Cana, leaving presently the siege before Abydus, and the guarding of Hellepontus, put to sea afresh thoe ships that lay dry at Cana. And Eumenes came to Elen: But Livius went to Phecia with all his fleet, to which he had adjoynd two triveme gallies of Mitylena. But when he heard say it was kept with a strong garrison of the Kings, and that Selenus was encamped not far off: after he had pill'd the sea-coast, and charged hastily his ships with a good booty, & thoe were prizes of men especially, he stayed no longer there than until Eumenes might overtake him with his fleet, but

A but directed his course straight to Samos. The Rhodians upon the first news of this their overthrow, feared much, and withal mightily sorrowed: for besides the loss of their Sea-souldiers and ships, they lost also the very front and strength of their youth: for almost as many young Gentlemen of their nobility, accompanied Paussanatus among other motives, in regard of his authority, which was right great and for good desert among his country-men. But afterwards considering how treacherously they were over-wrought, and namely, by one of their own citizens, born among them, their melancholy turned into choler, and their sorrow into anger. Whereupon they sent forth ten ships immediately, and few days after other ten, under the conduct of Eudamus the Admiral over them all: who albeit he was not for other fears of arms and martial skill equal to Paussanatus, yet they supposed verily he would be a leader so much the more way and cir- B spect, as he was the leishardy and courageous. The Romans and King Eumenes first fell with the land Erythraea, where they stayed one night, and the morrow after gained the point of Corymbus, a promontory of the Teians, from whence when they purposed to cross over to the neereit parts of Samos, not waiting for the sun-rising, by which the Pilots might observe the disposition of the weather, they hoisted up sails against a very doubtful and dangerous tempest: for the wind turned from North-east to full North, as they were in the mids of their course, whereby they began to be mightily tossed among the surging billows of the rough and angry Sea. Polyxenidas supposing that the enemies would take their course directly to Samos, there to joyne with the Rhodian fleet, departed from Ephesus, and first anchored at Myonaeus: from thence he sailed to an land called Macris, to the end that as the enemies fleet sailed by, he might take advantage to let upon C either some ships singled and severed from the body of the fleet, or play upon the tail and reargard thereof. After that he perceived the whole fleet to be dispersed by force of the tempest, he thought first to take that occasion to fall upon them: but the wind rising still more and more, and raising greater waves, because he saw he could not possibly come neer to board them, he cut over to the land Ethalia, minding the next day to assail the ships in the main Sea as they passed to Samos. Some small number of the Roman ships in the beginning of the night put into the haven of Samia, which they found void and empty: the rest of the fleet after they had been tossed and tormented all the night long in the deep, at length light upon the same harbor. Where being advertised by the peasants of the country, that the enemies ships lay in the rode of Athalas, they fell to confulk, whether presently to bid battail and put it to the hazard, or expect the arrival of the Rhodian fleet. Desiring therefore that enterprise (for so upon advertisement they were agreed) D they travelled to Corymbus, from whence they came, Polyxenidas likewise, having laid at anchor in vain, returned to Ephesus: and then the Roman ships, while the Seas were thus cleer of enemies, sailed over to Samos. Thither also arrived the Rhodian fleet few days after: and that it might appear how long looked for it was, they all presently let sail for Ephesus, with purpose either to try an issue by a battel at Sea, or else if the enemy refused the tryal, to expels and wring from him a plain confession of cowardice: which was a material point and of great importance to move the minds of the other neighbour-cities. Being arrived to the very haven mouth, they embattailed their ships and stood directly affront opposed unto it. And when they saw none make sail nor for out against them, the one part thereof rode afloat at anchor still in the very haven mouth: the other discharged the souldiers and let them a land, upon whom (as they were driving a mighty booty which they had raised by foraging all the country over) Andronicus a Macedonian, who lay E in garrison at Ephesus, sallied forth, even as they approached the walls of the City: and having eased them of a great part of their prey afore said, he chased them to the Sea unto their ships. The morrow after, the Romans having bestowed an ambush about the mid-way between, marched in order of battail against the City, to see if peradventure they could train forth the Macedonian again without the walls: but perceiving that no man durst come abroad for suspicion and fear of an await, they returned to their ships again: and when they saw their enemies would not abide them neither at Sea nor on Land, in the end the fleet sailed again to Samos from whence it came. Thence the Pretor made out two Gallies of Italian confederates, and as many Rhodians under the F conduct of Epicrates the Rhodian Admiral, to defend and keep the freights of Cephalenia, which Hidrilas the Lacedaemonian together with the youth of the Cephalens, infested with his roving and robbing in so much as there could no ships pass by Sea to and fro with victuals between Italy and that coast. At Pyraeum Epicrates met with L. Aemilius Regillus coming to succeed in the Admiralty: who hearing of the defeat of the Rhodians, and having himself but two Quinquere me Galliees, brought Epicrates back with him into Apa with four ships. There accompanied them also the open ships of the Athenians. And he passed over by the Sea Agema. Thither also arrived Timarchus the Rhodian in the dead of the night with two Quadrime gallies from Samos. Who being brought unto Aemilius, declared how he was sent to quiet and defend that Sea-coast, which the Kings roving ships and men of war by their often excursions from Hellepontus and Aegaeus, had made too hot for the Huls and other ships of burden which used to pass that way. As Eumilius sailed from Chios to Samos, two Rhodian Quadrime Gallies were sent by Livius to meet him and King Eumenes also with two Quinquere me galliees presented himself unto him. Being all arrived at Samos, Aemilius after he had received the navy of Livius, and sacrificed orderly as the manner was, called a council. At which C. Livius (for his opinion was asked first) spake and said, "That no man giveth more found and faithful counsell than he, who periwadeth another man to that which himself would do in the same case. As for me, my intent and purpose was, to “go against Ephesus with the whole armada, and thither to bring with me the vessels of burden charged with heavy ballast of gravel and sand, and so sink them in the very haven mouth, for to choke it up. And to make this bar against the haven, it was a matter (said he) of less difficulty, for that the mouth and gullet of the haven, was in manner of a tyne long, narrow, and full of shells and shallows. By which mean I should have cut off the benefit of the Sea from the enemy, and make him lose the use altogether of his navy. But no man there besides himself thought yell of this device. King Eumenes demanded, what they would do then after this choking up and stoppage of the haven passage, by sinking the ships? whether they would depart from thence with their own navy at liberty, to help their allies and terrify and affright their enemies; or never the later (ill), keep the haven (as it were) in siege with the whole fleet? For if they departed, who could make doubt but that the enemy would pluck up shells and barks that there lay, and drown; yea, and with less ado and trouble, open the haven again, than it was stopped? And if they meant to tarry there nevertheless, to what purpose then was he have shut up? But contrary-wise, they within Ephesus (quoth he) being in fury for any danger from their haven, and having a most rich and wealthy City of their own, furnished with all things out of Asia, would pass the summer season in rest and repose: whilst the Romans floating in the open wide Sea, exposed to the violence of waves and lying at the mercy of tempests, should be driven to keep a continual guard, disunited of all things, and rather tied up and debarr’d themselves, lest being able to effect those things that were needful to be done, than in case to approach and shut up their enemies. Then Eudemus the Admiral of the Rhodian fleet, opined for his part, and spake to the question, saying, That he rather disliked of that course, than knew himself a better, or could advise what was to be done. Epicrates the Rhodian was of mind, to leave Ephesus for the present, and to send part of his ships into Lycia, for to associate unto them Patara, the capital City of that nation: shewing two things of great consequence, that hereby would accrue. For both the Rhodians assured of peace, and secured from all danger of those quarters that lie about their Island, might thereby attend wholly, and employ all their forces upon the regard of this only war against Antiochus: and also the Armado which was prepared in Lycia might be stopped and unexpected, for ever joining with Polyxenides. This opinion impoised, and prevailed most. Howbeit, he thought good it was and agreed upon, that Regillus should present himself before Ephesus, with the whole fleet, to strike a terror into the enemies. And C. Livius was sent with four Rhodian quadremes Gallies, and two Smyrnean open ships to join, with direction to take Rhodes in the way, and with them to communicate all his counsels. The Cities which he passed by, namely, * Melane, * Myndus, * Halicarnassus, * Cnidus and Cos, performed willingly whatsoever was enjoined and impoised upon them. Being arrived at Rhodes, he declared unto the Rhodians the effect of his commission, and withal required their advice. They all approved the design, and when he had taken of them to the fleet that he had of his own three quadremes gallies more, he failed to Patara. At the first he had a merry gale of wind, that set them forward directly toward the City, and good hope they had with their suddain terror to do some good with the inhabitants: but afterwards, the wind being come about, the Sea rose, and the surging waves began to make it troublesome and dangerous: howbeit they laboured so with oars that they gat to the shore side. But neither was there about the City any lay bay to ride in, neither were they able to keep the Sea with anchor without the haven mouth of the enemies City, the Sea was so rough, and the night so near. So passing along by the wall side of the City, they failed to the port of Phnicus, less than two miles distant from thence, which was a safe rode for their ships from all danger of Sea, but high cliffs and rocks there were over their heads which commanded them, and those the Townsmen quickly seized, with the assistance of the Kings souldiers whom they had in garrison. Against whom Livius sent out the aid-souldiers of the Lycians, and the nimblest and most agile young men of the Smyrneans, notwithstanding the landing places were very difficult and unworward. These obtained the fight at first, so long as they shot darts, and made petty excursions and profers rather of skirmishes, than a direct batall, as being but few in number. But after that they ran out of the City in great numbers, and that the whole multitude was lifted forth, Livius feared not only those auxiliars should be environed and enclosed, but also the ships distressed and endangered from the land: so he brought forth to fight, not the souldiers only, but all the rabble of the mariners also and the rowers, armed and furnished with whatsoever weapons they could find. And even then also there was a doubtful and dangerous conflict, wherein besides certain souldiers L. Apollonius died in the conflict of this suddain and tumultuary skirmish. Yet in the end, the Lycians were discomfited, put to flight, and chased into their City. The Romans likewise retired to their ships, carrying away with them no bloudless victory for their part. From thence they thaped their course to the gulf or narrow strait of Telmessus (which of one side toucheth Caria, and Lycia on the other) laying aside all hope to assail Patara any more: and so the Rhodians were discharged and sent home. Livius after he had coasted along Asia crossed over into Greece, to the end, that having communed and conferred with the Scipios (who then abode about Thessaly) he might sail directly into Italy.

Emylus when he had intelligence, that the designment intended in Lycia was given over, and that Livius was departed into Italy, being himself also returned to Samos (for that he was by violence of tempest repul’d from Ephesus, without effect of his enterprise) thought it was a shame and dishonour, that the adventure was given upon Patara in vain, and therefore determined in proper

A proper person to make a voyage thither with his whole fleet, and to assault the City with all the force he could possible. And having passed along Miletus, and all that coast of the afflicts, they departed from the gulf or creek of Bargilla, and came a land near Iassus. The City was held by a garrison of the Kings: and the Romans waited by way of hostility, the territory about it. Then Emylus sent certain to parley with the chief citizens and the Magistrats, to found them how they were disposed, and also to sollicit them to revolt: but being answered again that it lay not in their own power to do as they would, he marched forward to give an assault to the City. Now there were certain Iassians, banished persons, in company with the Romans, who in great number belought and importuned the Rhodians, not to infer a City, so near a neighbour and linked in blood unto them, for to perish and come to ruin, especially having no way offended: alleging, B that the only cause of their banishment was their loyalty unto the Romans, and by the same violence of the Kings garrison souldiers, were they all held in awe who remained in the City, by which themselves had been expelled. For all the Iassians in general were of one mind, most willing and desirous to avoid and shake off the servitude under the King. The Rhodians were moved in compassion with their prayers, and joining unto them King Eumenes also, partly by shewing the conglanquinity and kindred between them, and partly by pitying and lamenting the distressed state of the City (besieged, as it were, already by the Kings garrison) they prevailed to much that they forbore to assail it. So they departed from thence, and because all other parts were peaceable, they failed along the coast of Asia, until they arrived at * Laryssa, a port of haven town even against Rhodes. There in the Principia began first a secret whispering among the Colonels (which afterwards came to the ears of Emylus himself) namely, That the navy was led away far enough off from Ephesus, where by right and of duty he was to war: to the end, that the enemy being left at liberty behind their backs, might attempt to do what he list without controulment, against to many Cities and States of the Roman allies, near unto him. Emylus was moved herewith, and calling unto him the Rhodians, demanded of them, Whether the whole armada might ride conveniently within the haven of Patara? And when they answered No, he took that occasion to pass no further, but to give over the voyage, and so brought back his ships to Samos.

In this same time Seleucus the son of Antiochus, after he had kept his army all winter time in Asia, employing it partly in succouring his afflicts, and partly in lacking and pilling those whom he could not draw into association, intended to invade the confines of King Eumenes his realm, whilst he (together with the Romans) was busied far from home, in assailing the maritime parts of Lycia. And first he approached Elea in countenance of an enemy, with banner displayed: but afterwards, leaving to besiege the City, after spoil made in hostile manner of the territory, he marched forward to besiege and assault the head City and capital strength of his Kingdom * Pergamus. At the beginning seemed rather to brave and provoke him unto fight with his strong guards that he had placed without the City, and excursions with his horsemen and light armoured, than to stand upon his guard and defence, and to receive the forces of his enemy: but at length, chafing by these light skirmishes that he was in no respect able to match Seleucus, he retired himself within his walls, and so the City began to be besieged. And much about the time time, Antiochus also being departed from Apamea, first lay encamped at Sardis, and afterwards, not far

E from the camp of Seleucus, near to the head or source of the river * Caycus, with a mighty army composed of diverse and sundry nations. The greatest threat of terror in this army was a redboubled Regiment of Gauls, to the number of four thousand, hired for wages, whom with some few other among them, he sent out to wait and destroy all parts of the territory about Pergamus. When news hereof came to Samos, Eumenes at the first, being called away by this war, (begun at home, even at his very dores) made halt with his fleet to Elea: where finding in readines certain horsemen and footmen both lightly appointed, by their sure convoy and safe conduct, he came to Pergamus before the enemies had knowledge thereof, or enterprised anything. Where once again they began to make light skirmishes by way of excursions, for in truth Eumenes lay off, and was not willing to hazard the main chance upon a throw. Few days after, both the Roman and Rhodian fleet came from Samos and were arrived at Elea for to aid the King Eumenes. When Antiochus was advertised that they had landed their forces at Elea, and that so many armados were met together in that one haven, and hearing withal about the same time, that the Consul was already with power in Macedonia making reparation of all things for his passage over Hellaspont: he appoised now it was high time (before that he were pressed at once both by Land and Sea) to treat for peace, and therefore he seized a certain hill over against Elea, to fortify and encamp in. Where, leaving his whole power of Infantry, he defended into the plain, under the very walls of Elea, with all his Cavalry, to the number of six thousand Horse. And sending an herald to Emylus, he gave him to understand, that he was desirous to have a treaty of peace, Emylus sent for Eumenes from Pergamus, and they both, together with the Rhodians, debated G in council what to do. The Rhodians refused not the offer. But Eumenes laid it was neither honourable to parley of peace at that time, nor yet possible to conclude thereof, if they went about it. For being as we are (quoth he) pinned up within our walls and besieged, how can we receive from another, conditions of peace, saving our credit and honour? and who will hold that for a firm and assured peace, which we shall contract without the presence of the Consul, without the authority of the Senat, and without the grant of the people of Rome? For I demand of you, when ye have made a peace, whether you will return presently into Italy or no? whether you will

* withdraw

"withdraw your fleet and army? or rather wait and expect to know the Consul's mind and advice, the Senate's pleasure and ordinance, and the general assent of the people in that behalf. It remaineth then after that is done, that you stay till in Asia, and that your forces being brought back again into their wintering harbors, (after they have done with warfare) fall to continue and eat out our allies, by charging them with provision of victuals; and afterwards, if it shall so please the higher powers, and those that are in authority, to so ordain, we must begin that war anew, which now we are able (if we slack not the time, nor stop the forward course where we are) before winter come, with the favor and power of the Gods, to finish and bring to a final end. This advice took place; and answer was returned unto Antiochus, that there could be no treaty of peace before the Consul's coming. Antiochus having thus in vain sought for peace, when he had first foraged and wasted the territory of Elaea, and afterwards of Pergamus, took his son Seleucus there, and went himself in person to Adramyttium, pillaging and spoiling all the way as he journeyed, in all kind of hostility. Now this territory is a rich country, called, The champaign plains of Thebe: much renowned by the Poet Homer in his poem; and in no one place besides of all Asia got the Kings soldiers a greater booty and more pillage. Thither arrived also the Adramyttium both Amyntus and Eumenes (having first a compals by sea) for the defence of the said City. During this time, they sent for a thousand foot, and a hundred horse out of Aschod to come unto Elaea: all which forces were commanded by Captain Diophanes, so soon as they were disembarked and landed, there were ready to receive them certain men sent from Attalus by his people to meet them, who by night conducted them to Pergamus. They were all old soldiers, and well experienced in feats of war: and their leader Diophanes had been brought up and trained under Philip the great warrior in those days of all the Greeks, who took but two days to retake his horse and men, and to take view of the enemies guards, namely, in what places and at what time they used customably either to come forward, or to retire. The Kings soldiers were approached almost to the very foot of the hill, where the City is situate. By means whereof they might forage behind at their will, and there was not one issued out of the City so much as to glance a dart also against the corps de guard of the enemies. After they were once so near driven forward, that they were fain to keep themselves close within the walls, the Kings soldiers without began first to contemn, and afterwards to neglect them. Many of them had shot their horses so much as fadded and bridled, and some few were left in arms and in ordinance of battle: the rest were gone aside and spread over all parts of the champaign: some went to play and took themselves to youthful sports and wanton riot: others fell to feeding pampering their bellies, and making good cheer under covert shade and many were laid along asleep. Diophanes beheld all this manner hereof aloft from an high turret of the City Pergamus, and presently gave commandment to his soldiers to take arms and to be ready at the gate. Himself went to Attalus and told him, that he purposed to assail the enemies corps de guard. Attalus (although he were very loth) gave him leave: for he saw full well, that he was to fight with one hundred horse against three hundred: and one thousand foot against four thousand. Being out of the gate, he set him down upon the enemies corps de guard, waiting when some good opportunity and occasion would offer itself. Both they within Pergamus of one side, deemed this to be folly rather than hardiness; and also the enemies on the other side making towards them for a while, and perceiving them not to stir, altered nothing of their usual negligence, and that which more was, made a mockery and scorn of their small number. Diophanes kept his men still a good time, as if he had brought them forth only for a show, to see and to be seen: but after he perceived once the enemies could be disbanded out of their ranks and ranges, he commanded the footmen to make all the hast they could after, whilst himself leading the way first among his horsemen, ran with his whole troop upon the spurs as hard as ever he could, and setting up a shout and cry aloud on all hands, as well with foot as horse, charged suddenly upon the enemies guards, ere they were aware of them. Man and horse both were greatly scared; and the horses especially having broken their collars and halters wherewith they stood tied, made foul work and much trouble among their own party. Some few of the horses kept their standing till unaffrighted, and then as the Achæans, and with much more than so small a number could be thought to make. And as for the footmen in order arranged and well provided they fell upon those that were negligently dispersed abroad, ere they looked for them, and in manner half asleep. Great execution and butchery was committed upon them all the fields over, and they fled again. Diophanes, having followed the chase as they ran away in scattering wise, so far as he might well with safety of himself, returned to the guard and defence of the City, having won great honor to the nation of the Achæans by this exploit: for not only the men, but women also beheld this service, and looked on him from the walls of Pergamus. The next day after, the Kings Corps de guard were better ordered and kept closer together, yea, and retired half a mile farther from the City, where they encamped themselves. The Achæans likewise much about the same time advanced to the very same place. Many hours together they looked one upon another who would begin first, expecting every minute when the charge should be given. But after the sun was near going down, and that it was time to return into the camp, they of the Kings part began to ruffle their ensigns and guidons together, and set forward with their bands, ordered in manner of a march for the way, more like than marshalled for to fight a battail, Diophanes sat still so long as they were within sight: but then he charged upon their rearward,

A ward, with as great violence and fury, as the day before, and put them again into so great affright and trouble, that they gave them leave to wound them on their backs, and not one would stay to make head and resist, but trembling for fear, and hardly keeping the order of a march, they were beaten into their camp. This boldness of the Achæans forced Seleucus to dislodge and remove out of the territory of Pergamus.

Antiochus after he heard say that the Romans and Eumenes were come to the defence of Adramyttium, medled no more with the town itself, but after he had laid the fields waste, departed from thence, and forced Persea, a Colony of the Mitylenæans. As for Cotton and Corymbus, Aphrodisias and Pyrene, they were won at the first assault, and so he returned to Sardis by Thyana, &c. The Roman fleet together with Eumenes and the Rhodians sailed first to Mitylene, &c. The Rhodians from thence, returned to Elaea from whence they came. So they held on their course to Phocæa, and with an Island called Bacchus, situate above the City of the Phocæans: and after they had pillaged and rifed by way of hostility the Temples, which heretofore they had forborn, and taken away the Images (for the Island was magnificently adorned and beautified therewith) they crossed over to the City itself, which they assaulted in divers quarters, according as they had divided their forces into three parts: but seeing that it might not be won with bare scaling and strength of arms, without planting engines of battery and other fabricks; and besides, that three thousand armed men sent from Antiochus for defence, were entered into the City presently they gave over the siege, and the fleet retired to the Islands, having done no other exploit, but only pillaged the territory about the City.

This done, it was thought good that Eumenes should have licence to depart into his own kingdom, that he might provide for the Consul and the army all necessities toward the passage over Hellespontus: also that the Roman and Rhodian fleets should return to Samos, and there remain in guard, and have an eye unto Polyxenidas, lest he removed from Ephesus and made some attempt that way. So, the King returned to Elaea, the Romans and Rhodians to Samos, where At. Amyntus the Prætor his brother departed this life. The Rhodians, after his funeral obsequies performed, sailed to Rhodes with thirteen ships of their own, one quinquerem galeace of Cons, and the other of Gnidos, there to lie in rode, ready to make head against the fleet, which as the bruit blazed, was aloft and coming out of Syria. Two days before that Eudamius loosed from Samos with the Armado, thirteen ships sent from Rhodes under the conduct of Admirall Pamphilus to encounter the said Syriack fleet, taking with them four other ships, which were for the guard of Caria, delivered from siege Dada, and other petty forts which the Kings soldiers assailed. Then it was advised that Eudamius should incontinently set forward on his voyage. And to that fleet which he had under his charge, he adjoined also four open ships. Being departed, he made full in all haste that he possibly could, and arrived at the port called Megiste, where he overtook those that were gone before; from whence they came in one band and train jointly together unto Phælis, and then they judged it the best way, in that place to attend the coming of the enemy. This Phælis standeth upon the confines between Lycia and Pamphylia. It lieth far within the sea, & is the first land that sheweth itself to them that sail from Chios to Rhodes; and from thence a man may ken and discover ships under full sail off: for which cause especially, this was chosen for a fit and convenient place, wherein they might encounter the enemies fleet. But by reason the air was unwholsome, and the season of the year unhealthful (for it was midsummer) and the smells and stinking favours such as they had not been acquainted with; many contagious diseases and maladies which they forelaw now began to spread commonly abroad, and especially among the mariners: for fear of which plague and mortality, they departed from thence, and passed beyond the gulph of Pamphylus: and being arrived in the river Enymedon, they received advertisement from the Apicendians, that the enemies were already before Sida. Those of the Kings side had failed but slowly in regard of the adverse season of the winds named Sida, those which kept their set and certain time, like as those do which they call * Favonii, now of the Rhodians there were 32 quadrimere Gallies, and 4 other trimere besides. The Kings fleet consisted of 37, and those of greater burden and bulk: among which were three mighty Gallies of * 7 banks of oars on a side, and four of * 6, besides 10 ordinary trimere gallies. There were others also that knew by a sentinel or watch-tower standing on a certain high place, how the enemies were at hand. The next morning by break of day both these fleets set forth of the haven, as it they would have fought that very day. And after that the Rhodians had passed the cape which from Sida hitherto was debried by them. The left wing of the Kings fleet, flanked with the main sea, was commanded by Annibal: and Apollonius one of his gallants and courtiers led the right: so as now they had ranging their battell into files. In the vanguard the Admirall ship of Eudamius was foremost: Caryllus governed the rereguard; and Pamphilus had the conduct of the middle ward. Eudamius seeing the enemies battell arranged and ready for conflict, put forth into the open sea, commanding those that followed after in order to keep their array, and so directly to affront the enemy: which at the first caused some trouble, for he was not so far advanced into the deep, that all the ships could be set in array along the land side: and besides, himself making too much haste, with five ships only encountered Annibal, for the rest followed not after him, because they were bidden red ships to the fleet that lay about Pattara.

Antiochus gathered together not only the garrisons and aids of all the Cities that were about him, but also addressed his Embassadors with letters to Prusias the King of Bithynia, wherein he gave out hard words of the Romans for their passage into Asia: namely, "That their coming only was for this, to demolish put down, and overthrow all kind of domes; and to let the only Roman Empire that none else might stand in the whole world. That Philadelphus and Mithridates already subdued and depopled and now himself was to make the third, against whom they were come. Neither would they make an end there but go on still, like a continual fire that burneth forward, and ther would they make an end there and ever as they vanquished one, proceed to another that is next. And to take all afore them, and as they vanquished one, proceed to another that is next. And to no doubt, they would make a bridge of him to pass onward into Bithynia, now that Eumenes hath gently taken upon his neck the yoke of voluntary servitude, Prusias was somewhat touched with these letters, but when there came others written from Scipio the Consul, and his brother Africanus especially he was wholly averted from entertaining any such insinuation. For Africanus besides the continual custom that the people of Rome had, to advance and amplify the Majesty of Rome, their allies and confederates of all kind of honour; alleged for his part, the domestic examples of their own honte and family: inducing Prusias thereby to enter into a desire to win his love and friendship. For he discomfited and said, "That those Princes and petty Kings in Spain, whom he had received into his protection, he left behind him when he went away mighty monarchs; although, that he not only had placed & established Masaniass in his fathers realm & throne, but

A "but fetled him in the kingdom also of Syphax, who before had chafed & expelled him: so as now
"he was not only the richest potentate and most wealthy K, of all Africa, but also formally &
"pulsant foras a paragon equal to any other K, in the whole world. As for Philip and N. Euc- "emies they were and vanquished by T. Quimius, howbeit they remained KK, afterwards with "their own Realms. And Philip verily the year that is past, had his tribute forgiven him and his "son an hostage delivered unto him: yea, and some Cities without the dominion of Macedony,
"have received them as their K, and the Roman Generals have winked therat and been conten"ted. And surely Nabis had been likewise graced and honoured, but for his own peevish toll-
"firt, & the treacherous illflood afterwards of the Aetolians, which was his own peevish toll-"overthrow. But the chief thing of all that most confirmed the mind of K. Prusias, was the com"ing of Livius unto him in embassage from Rome, he, who aforetime in quality of Prator, had been "Admiral of the navy. Who shewed and declared unto him, how the hope of victory was much "more assured to the Romans than to K. Antiochus; and withall how the Romans would be the "father and surer friend of the twin-yeare, and make more conscience of keeping amity, "Antiochus beinge our besides all hope, and Antiochus being put besides all hope of the affociation with Prusias, departed to Ephesus from Sardis, to viuit and fee the fleet, which for certain monthes had been rigged and in readines: and this he did the rather, because he saw that he could not hold out with the Roman Army: and two Septuagint commanders thereof, than that his sea-service in it self at any time before ioped well, or could assure him now of great and certain success. Yet I sometime dram he had of good hope for the present, in that his intelligence was, that a great part of the Rhodian fleet was about Cos. Besides this, in some measure his spirit was puffed up with the remembrance, how the Rhodian Armado had been defeated at Samus by a cautelous plot and practice contrived beforehand: Having aid these consi-derations a ground, he sent Polyxenidas away with his navy, to hazard the fortune of a battel in some fort or towne (it made no matter how:) whiles himself in person led his whole army to Nativum (a towne of the Colophonians, seated upon the sea, and distant about twenty miles from the ancient City Colophon.) The City it self he had a good mind to conquer and bring in subjection unto him: for, being so near unto Ephesus as it was, there could not any thing be done either by sea or land, but it was within the eye of the Colophonians, and by their means notified (straightwaies to the Romans.) Now he made full account that they would remove take his time and good opportunity to affociate City of theirs, and so Polyxenidas might thereby hand to plant fabrics against Colophon, and execute some notable exploit. Whereupon he went in fides alike, even to the very sea he approached with mantlets and rampiers, and cast trenches on both sides alike, close unto the walls, and under the roof-works, plaid upon them with the push & force of the ram, The Colophonians much troubled and affrighted with these dangers and distresses, sent their Orators to Samus unto L. Amylius, to crave in humble manner the aid and succour of him: he made so long abode at Samus, that Amylius was much discontented and offended in his heart, that Polyxenidas, whom twice before he used to employ, should now performe no service, Nothing less thought he than that in the deep sea far off, they made all the sail they could, and fled. Yare of sterage they were and H good of sail, by reason that their vessels were more light, and made of purpoe to rid way, and besides nearer they were to land. And therefore they had recovered Myonesus, before the fleet could come any thing near unto them. The Prator thinking verily to force them out of the haven, made after, without direction of a skillfull pilot, and knowledge of the place. Now this Myonesus is a promontory or cape between Teios and Samos, a very mountain made in fashion of a steep, broad enough at the foot, but rising narrower hill, and runneth up to the top sharp pointed. On the main or land side it hath one passage by a straight and narrow path, from the sea it is founded up on rocks, beaten and eaten with the continual surging waves of the sea, in some places the cliffs that hang over, bear more into the sea than the vessels that lie under the harbor, take up of the sea. The Prator with his ships durst not approach near unto those crags, for fear of being within the shot of the pirates, who were perched upon the top of those steep rocks, and so they spent that day and lay off. At the last a little before night they gave over that vain enterprise without effect, and the morrow after arrived at Teios; and having lodged their ships within the harbor, which themselves call Gerastrum, (and it lieth out at the back side of the City) the Prator let ashore, and sent out his souldiers to forage the territory about the City. The Teians seeing how their lands were spoiled even under their very noses, addressed certain Orators to the Roman Admiral, arraigned all in white, after the manner of humble suppliants. And as they would have seemed to excuse their City, for having done or said any thing against the Romans tending to hostility, he charged them directly, that they had relieved the fleet of the enemies with victuals, and if they K could be content to do the like by the Roman fleet, he would recall his souldiers from pillage, and also told them what quantity of wine moreover they had promised to Polyxenidas. But and if they could be content to do the like by the Roman fleet, he would recall his souldiers from pillage, and otherwise he would repute them for his enemies. The Embassadors aforesaid made relation of this heavy answer. Whereupon the Magistrates of the City assembled the people together, for to consult and conclude about this matter what they were best to do. Thither as it hapned, when he heard Polyxenidas arrived with the Kings Armado; who having looted from Crotophon, when he heard that the Romans were departed from Samos, that they had chased the Pirates as far as Myonesus, and were now waiting and harrying the lands of the Teians, also that their ships anchored in the rode Gerastrum, himself also caft anchor over against Myonesus, hard by an Island which the sail-ers and mariners call Macris, in a secret bay hard by, escounting and epying from this near harbor, what the enemies did and intended. And at the first in good hope he was to discomfit and L defeat the Roman fleet, like as he had beforetime the Rhodian Armado near unto Samos, by seizing the mouth of the haven, and encompassing their issue forth. For this bay was in all respects like unto the other lying just between two Capes, which meet so near, and in manner enclose the mouth thereof, that hardly two ships at once can go forth together. And to this purpose Polyxenidas intended in the night season to take possession, and make himself sure of the said straits, there to place ten galleys under either Cape, which standing there at a vantage, should from both points flank the broad sides of his enemies ships in their going forth; and withall out of his other vessels to disbarke and land armed souldiers, like as he had done at Panormus, and so at once to assail them both by sea and land, and make an end of them for all. Which designment of his no doubt had taken effect, but that the Romans, after that the Teians had promised them to do whatsoever they should command, thought it more commodious for the receiving of their provision of victuals, to pass with their ships unto the other harbor which was before the City, to the open sea. Some say that Endamur the Rhodian, shewed the inconvenience and discomfortity of the other harbor, by occasion that two galleys forlorned in that strait to be so intangled, that they brake one anothers oars with jussling together. And among other motives the Prator was induced to change the harbor, because from the land side there he should lye within danger, considering that Antiochus himself was encamped not far off. Thus the fleet being brought about close to the City side, the souldiers and mariners (without the knowledge of any commanders) J were disbarked for to dispose & dispense the victuals and wine especially to every ship. But about noon-tide a certain pealant of the country chanced to be brought before the Prator, who gave N intelligence, that there was a fleet of ships which two daies already rode at anchor under the Island Macris; and that but a while ago, certain vessels of them were seen to weigh anchor, as if they would hoist up sail and be gone. The Prator moved at this sudden occurrent, commanded the trumpets to sound the alarm, and to give knowledge and warning, that in case any were frag-gling abroad in the fields, they should retire. The Colonels he sent into the City to gather the fouldicks together and the mariners, that they might repair to ship-board. This alarm caused as great a trouble and confusion, as usually is seen in a sudden scarefire, or when a City is surprised by the enemies. Here was ludding into the City to recall their fellows; there was running out of the City to recover their ships; not knowing who was at length they ran all toward the ships, but in such a confusion and disorder that they scarcely knew their own vessels; if they did they could hardly be so for the crowd and press, get thither and embark themselves. Neither had this affright passed clear without danger both by sea and land, but that Emylus gave direction to every one what to do, and put out of the haven first himself with the Admiral ship into the open sea, & there received every vessel as they followed one after another in their order. And so ranged them all affront:

 and if Emylus also with the Rhodian fleet had not staid at the shore to see good order, that the

A souldiers might be set aboard without hurrying in fearfull haste, and every ship go forth as it was fitted and made, ready. By this means both the foremost of the vanguard were arranged in the sight of the Prator, and the Rhodians also kept their order in the rereguard in such sort, as they put themselves into the open sea in as good array, as if they had seen the Kings fleet under sail. But they were between the two promontories, Myonesus and Corycus, before they decried the enemy.
 The Kings Armado came forward in long files, two and two in a rank, who dilpaied and spread themselves also affront towards the wing in such wiselike that they might be able to compass and enclose the right wing of the enemy. Which Endamur the rere-admiral perceiving, and seeing with-all that the Romans could not possibly make head alike and extend themselves as broad as the enemy, and were at the point already at the right wing to be environed, made haste with his own vessels for the Rhodian barks were of all other in the whole fleet (wisest by far) and after he had fronted equally and matched wing for wing, he made head with his own ship against the very admiral of the enemies, wherein Polyxenidas himself was aboard. By this time the battell began between both the main fleets, all at once for every part. Of the Romans side there fought fourscore in all, whereof two and twenty were Rhodians. The enemies armado consisted of six-score and nine, all ships of greatest bulk and making, and had among them three galleaces of four banks of oars on a side, and two of seven. For goodnel and strength of ships, as also for valour of souldiers, the Romans far surpassed the Rhodians. But for agility and nimbleness of their vessels, for skillfull knowledge of Pilots, and expert cunning and readines of mariners, the Rhodians were as much beyond them. And those above all that first carried fire before them in their noises C troubled and scared the enemies most; and that stratagem and device which had been their only help and means of safety, when they were surprised and beleit at Panormus, was now the thing that stood them in best stead to win the victory. For the Kings ships fearing the fire that threat-ned their very faces, turned aside, because they could not run afront with their prow: so as they neither could themselves smite and hurt the enemies with their brazen pikes in the beak head, nor yet avoid them, but expose their own broad sides open to receive all pusses and violence from them. If any one fortune to encounter and run upon them, the was sure to be paid and sped with fire that was flung and cast into her: and more running there was to quench the flame, than otherwise to fight. Howbeit, the resolute valour of the Roman souldiers (which ever in war prevaileth most) was it that did the deed. For after the Romans by mere force had broken and clo-ven the main battailon of the enemy in the very midle, they turned about again and presented themselves behind, and plaid upon the backs of the Kings ships whiles they fought afront and made head against the Rhodians: and thus at one instant the battailon in the midle, and the ships in the left wing that served King Antiochus, were befet round about, and sunk to the bottom of the sea. The right wing as yet entire and found, was more terrified at the loss and overthrow of their fellows, than for any proper danger of their own. Howbeit, after they saw the other invetted, and the Admirall her self with Polyxenidas in her, to abandon her companions and to hoist up sails, they likewise in haste set up all their cloth and small triquet sails (for a good forewind they had for Ephesus) and fled as fast away as they could. Two and forty ships they lost in this fight: of which thirteen were boarded and taken for the use of the Romans, the rest were either E consumed with fire, or devoured of the sea. Two Roman ships were shattered and broken in pieces, and some other hurt, bruised and cracked. One Rhodian chanced to be taken by a notable and memorable adventure. For having with her piked beak head stricken a Sidonian ship, with the violence of the blow she shook out her own anchor, which by one of the flouks took fast hold as if it had been a grappling hook by the prow of the other ship. The Rhodians much troubled herewith, gave over rowing straight, as willing and desirous to be loose and parted from the enemy: and whiles they were busie thereabout, the cable which the anchor drew with it caught among the oars of her own ship, and swept them clean away, and so left one side of it naked, whereby the ship being much weakened and enfeebled, was taken by the other that was smitten and tied fast unto her. Much after this manner was the battell fought at sea near Myonesus. Where-F upon Antiochus was fore affrighted: for being thus dispossessed of the sea, he dishearted himself that he should not be able to hold and defend the places farther off: and therefore commanded the garrison to retire from Lysimachia, for fear it should be surprised there by the Romans. But this was but a bad piece of counsell as the sequell and issue proved afterwards. For it had been an easie matter not only to defend Lysimachia against the first assaile of the Romans, but also to hold out the siege all winter: yea, and by drawing out the time on length, to bring the very assailants themselves lying in leiguer, to extreme necessity and want of all things: during which space they might have taken some occasion and opportunity, to find a mean and make way for peace. Neither did he only Lysimachia and leave it for the enemies after this unfortunate battell, but also raised his siege before Colophon and dislodged yea, and retired himself to Sardis: from whence G he sent into Cappadocia to Ariarates for aid, and to all other places where he could, to gather more forces: and now was he set upon no design else, but to give battell, and to hazard all upon the fortune of the field.

After this Navall victory, Regillus Emylus laid directly to Ephesus, where he embattelled his ships in array even before the haven, and when by this bravado he had alitt wrung again from the enemies a plain and evident confession that they had abandoned the sea unto him, he set sail for Chius, unto which he had intended to shape his course from Samos before the

obtain peace, the Romans made a pith at it, and lightly regarded: for they judged it but meet and fit reason, that the King should discharge all the expenses they had been at in this war, considering that through his default it first arose: also that he ought to withdraw his garrisons not only out of Ionia and Æolia; but also like as all Greece had been made free and delivered, to the Greek Cities likewise in Asia ought to be enfranchised and set at liberty: which possibly might not begethles Antiochus were diseized of the possession of all Asia on this side the mountain Taurus. The Embassador perceiving well, that there was no reason to be had in the assembly, advised privately to sound and to win the heart and good will of Scipio, according as he had in charge from the King. And first this way he went to work and laid, That the King was minded to send him his son again freely without ransom: then (ignorant as he was both of Scipio his nature and the manner of the Romans) he promised him a mighty mass of gold, yet, and to be made equal companion in the government of the whole kingdom (the Kings name and royal style only reserved) in case he would be an instrument and means to effectuate peace. To these motives and offers Scipio returned this answer, "That you neither know the Romans all in general, nor my self in particular unto whom you were sent, I els marvel, seeing you are altogether ignorant of the state of him who hath sent you hither. For if ye had meant to have sought for peace at our hands, as of men who were in care for the doubtful event and issue of the war, ye should have held and kept Lycimachus still, for to have impeached our entrance into Chersonesus, or else ye should have made head against us in Hellepontus, and staid our passage into Asia: but now seeing ye have granted passage into Asia, and suffered your selves not only to be bridled and cubed, but also to be yoked, and like beasts to bear and draw too; since I say there is no remedy but ye must endure to be under our subjection, what equal and indifferent means of treaty is there left for you? Now, as concerning my son, I will accept it as a great present, and beseeching the munificence and liberality of a King, in case he send him to me again. As for the other matters, I pray God I be never driven in regard of mine estate, to have that need: for surely, I carry a mind that will never find the misgiving and want thereof. And for these great offers that the King maketh unto me, he shall find me thankfull unto him, if it please him for any private benefit unto me to do so, to require at my hands a private favour and pleasure again: but as touching the State and publick weal, he shall pardon me: I will neither receive ought from him, nor bestow any thing upon him. And all that I can do for him at this present, is to give him good and faithful counsel. Go your waies therefore and tell him from me, that his best course is to abstain from war, and not to refuse any condition of peace whatsoever. But all this nothing moved the King, who made reckoning that any hazard and fortune of war would be good and fit for him, since that there were laws imposed upon him already, as if he had been quite vanquished and overcome. Whereupon, without any more part of peace for this time, he bent his whole mind and employed his study about provision and preparation for war.

The Consul having given order for the execution of all his plots and designs, dislodged from thence, and marched hith to Dardannum, and after to Rhætium: the inhabitants of both which Cities came forth to meet him upon the way in great multitudes. From thence he went forward to Himn, and encamped in a plain under the very walls: then he entered into the town, and ascended up into the Castle, where he offered sacrifice unto Minerva, the patroness of that City. The Illyrians entertained them with all shew of honour, as well in deed as in word, acknowledging that the place mans were defended from them, and the Romans again were as joyous and glad to see the place of their first original and beginning. From thence they removed, and the sixth day after arrived at the head or spring of the river Cicnus. Thither also Eumenes the King (who at first assailed to bring his fleet back from Hellepontus, to winter before Elas; and afterwards, when he could not for certain daies double the point of Lebed, by reason of the contrary winds, went a land) because he would not fail but be present at the beginning of these great affairs, made haste the next way with a small power to the camp of the Romans. From the camp he was sent back to Pergamus, to give order for purveyance and provision of victuals; and after he had delivered out corn to those whom the Consul had appointed to receive it, he returned again to the same leaguer. The Consul his purpose and intent was to be provided aforehand of victuals sufficient for many daies, and together in one train to go against the enemy, before the winter surprised them.

Now the Kings camp lay about Thyatira where Antiochus hearing that P. Scipio was carried sick to Elas, sent certain Embassadors of purpose, to present and deliver his son again unto him. At which present of his, he took not only great contentment in his spirit, as a father might do for receiving his dear son, but much easement also and comfort to his sick body. After he had satisfied himself at length with much embracing of his son, "Ye shall (saith he) recommend me unto the King your Master, and tell him from me, that I thank him most heartily, and that I have no good thing at this time to send to him again, but only this, That I advise him to take heed that he enter not into the field to give battell, before he hath heard for certain, that I myself am returned to the leaguer. Upon relation hereof, Antiochus albeit he was in camp seventy thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse, and above strong (which puissant power otherwise animated, and as it were moved with the hope of good issue of battell) yet moved with the authority of so great a personage as Scipio was in whom he reposed his whole refuge against all doubtful events of the fortune in war: he retired back, and passed over the river Phrygius, and pitched his camp about Magnesia near unto Syphium. And fearing, lest (if he should be minded to make long stay and abide there)

A there) the Romans would assaye to force his defences, he cast a trench, fix cubits in depth, and twelve in breadth; and this trench he environed with a double bank and counse of strong stakes and pales; and upon the inward circuit and enclosure he opposed a mure with main towers; for the more easie encompassment of the enemy, when he should pass over the trench, The Consul supposing the King to be about Thyatira, marched continually, and upon the fifth day came down into the plains of Hircania. And when he understood, that the King was dislodged and departed thence, he followed him by the tracks, and on this side the river Phrygius encamped four miles from the enemy. Where about a thousand horsemen shewed themselves (for the most part ^{* People of Galatia, now called Gelim} Callogracians, some Dacians, with certain archers on horseback of other nations intermingled among them) who in great haste having passed over the river, charged upon the corps de guard of the Romans. At the first they put the Romans to some trouble, finding them out of order and array: but as the skirmish grew hotter and continued longer, and the number of the Romans little increased, (by reason their camp was so near to yield them succours) they of the Kings side being now wearied and not able to make their part good against so many of them, began to retire: and certain of them before they could take the river, were overtaken by those that followed the chace, and killed outright. For two daies after they stirred of no hand, for neither the one nor the other went over the river. The third day after the Romans all at once passed over, and encamped about a mile and a half from the enemies. But as they were pitching their tents, and buied about fortifications and defences, three thousand chosen horsemen and foot together from the Kings Camp, came upon them with a great trouble and affray. The number of them that were in guard, was less a good deal; howbeit, of themselves alone, without calling to help and aid the souldiers from their work about the fortification and defence of the camp, they not only at first received the charge with equal valour, but also afterwards, as the fight increased, put the enemies to flight, when they had killed some hundred of them, and taken prisoners almost as many. For the space of four daies next ensuing, both armies stood embattelled on either side before their Camp. And upon the fifth day the Romans advanced forth into the middle of the plain, Antiochus came not forward with his ensigns, inasmuch, as the hindmost were not an hundred foot from the trench, The Consul perceiving that he fell off and would no battell, called a council the next day, to be advised and resolved what he were best to do, in case Antiochus would not be fought withall. For considering that the winter approached, the souldiers were either to lie in the field under their tents, or else if they minded for the winter season to retire unto their garrison towns, the war must be put off until the next summer. Now the Romans were made to small reckoning of any enemies as of him. Whereupon, throughout the whole assembly they called upon the Consul with one voice to lead forth to battell out of hand, and take the souldiers whiles they were in this heart, ready if the enemies would not come out into the field, to pass over ditch and rampier, and break into the camp amongst them; making account, that they were not to fight with so many thousands of enemies, but rather to make a slaughter and butchery of so many beasts. Whereupon Cn. Domitius was sent to discover the way, and to view the place where was best entering upon the trench and rampier of the enemies. After he had brought certain relation of all things, it was thought good the next morning to approach near unto their camp: and on the third day the ensigns were displayed forth into the midst of the plain, and they began to range the army in battell array. Antiochus likewise supposed it was not expedient to lie off and stay any longer, for fear lest in refusing still to fight, he should either abate the courage of his own men, or increase the hope of his enemies, and therefore came abroad with all his forces, and advanced to far forward from his camp, that it appeared well he meant to fight. The Roman army stood embattelled in one manner of form, as well for men, as munition and armor: for of Romans there were two legions, and of Latine associates as many, and every legion consisted of five thousand four hundred. The Romans put themselves in the main battell, and the Latines kept both the points. The Hastati were placed with their ensigns foremost in the vanguard, after them the Principes in the midst, and the Triarii in the rearguard. Without this compleat battell, thus marshalled, the Consul set to the right point the auxiliary souldiers of Eumenes, mingled together with the targeteers of the Achæans, to the number almost of three thousand, whom he ranged equally a front, and beyond them more outward he opposed about three thousand men of arms: whereof eight hundred were sent from Eumenes, the rest were the Cavalry of the Romans. Without all these in the outmost place, he put the Trallians and Candidi, who in all made up the number of five hundred. As for the left wing, it seemed to need no such succours, by reason it was flanked with the river and high steep banks, howbeit, in that side there were planted four troops of horsemen. Thus you see all the forces that the Romans had besides two thousand Thracians and Macedonians mingled and blended together, who followed as volunteers, and were left for the guard of the Camp, and sixteen Elephants, which they bestowed in the rearguard for the defence of the Triarii. For, over and besides that they were not like to hold out against the Kings Elephants, which were in number fifty and four, you must consider that those of Affrick are not able to match them of India, say they were in number equal: either because in bigness the Indians exceed the other (as in truth they are much greater by odds) or foras much they encourage and stomach. But the Kings army was composed of divers nations, different as well in armis as in souldiers. He had of Macedonians sixteen thousand footmen, heavily armed after their manner, called Phalangia: these made the main battell, and in the front stood divided in ten squadrons.

out longer in the defence of the hold. The Romans being thus laid in the gates, and kept out of the bannier which they thought verily to have forced and won at their first assault, when they were once at length broken through and got in, made the more bloody slaughter amongst them, for very anger and delight that they had kept them forth so long. It is said, that there were slain that day about fifty thousand footmen and 4000 horsemen. 1400 taken prisoners, together with fifteen elephants with their governors. A number of the Romans were hurt and wounded, but there died not in the field above 300 footmen, and 24 horsemen: and of the regiment of King Eumenes not past five and twenty. And for that day verily, the conquerors after they had ransacked only the tents and pavilions of their enemies, returned to their own camp with great plenty of pillage: but the next morning they fell to spoiling the bodies of the dead and gathered their prisoners together. And upon this victory, there came Embassadors from Thyrris and Magnesia unto Scipio, for to surrender and deliver up their Cities.

Antiochus, who fled accompanied with some few; having gathered unto him many more in the way, who rallied themselves unto him, arrived at Sardis about midnight with a small power of armed men; and hearing that his son Selenus had some other of his friends were gone before to Apamea, himself also at the fourth watch departed thence with his wife and daughter toward Apamea; after he had committed the charge of guarding the City Sardis unto Zeno, and appointed Timon governor of Lydia. But the inhabitants of the said City and the garrison soldiers within the Castle, despised their governors, and by general consent addressed Embassadors unto the Consul.

Much about the same time also, there arrived Embassadors from Tralles and Magnesia (which standeth upon the river Meander) and likewise from Ephesus, to yield up their Cities. For Polyxenidas (advertised of the issue of this battle) had abandoned Ephesus; and having sailed with the fleet as far as Patara in Lyca, for fear of the Rhodian ships which did in guard within the harbour of Mejisse, disembarked and put himself a shore, and with a small company marched by land into Syria. The Cities of Asia were surrendered into the hands and protection of the Consul, and submitted to the people of Rome. By this time now was the Consul possessed of Sardis, and thither repaired unto him Scipio from Elae, so soon as ever he could endure the travail of journey.

At the same time there came an herald from Antiochus unto the Consul, who by the mediation of Scipio, made request and obtained thus much, That the King might send his Orators and Embassadors unto him, And after few daies Zenips (who had been governor of Lydia) together with Antipater (Antiochus his nephew, or brothers son) arrived. Who first dealt with King Eumenes and communed with him, whom (by reason of old jars and quarrels) they supposed verily to be the greatest enemy unto peace, and that he would never abide to hear thereof: but him they found more reasonable and inclining to peaceable terms, than either the King their Masters or themselves hoped and looked for. So by the means of Scipio and him together, they had access unto the Consul; who at their earnest petition granted them a day of audience in a frequent assembly, there to declare their Commission and what they had in charge. "Then (quoth Zenips) we are not so much to speak and deliver ought of our own selves, as to ask and be advised of you (Romans) what course to take, and by what means of satisfaction we might expiate and satisfy the trespass of the King our Master and withall obtain grace and pardon at your hands who are the victors? Your manner alwaies hath been of a magnanimous and haughty spirit, to forgive Kings and nations by you vanquished: How much more then is it decent and becoming you to do the like; yea, and with a greater mind and more generous and bountifull heart, in this victory and conquest, which hath made you LL. of the whole world? For now it becometh you to lay down all debate and quarrel with mortal men here upon earth, and rather like the immortal gods in heaven, to provide for the good and safety of mankind, and them to pardon and forgive. Now was it agreed upon before the coming of the Embassadors, what answer to make by report in this wise: "We Romans, of all those things which are in the power of the immortal gods, have that measure which they vouchsafed to give us: as for heart and courage which dependeth upon our own will and mind, we have born (and ever will) the same without change and alteration in all fortunes: neither hath prosperity raised and lifted it up aloft, nor adversity debased and put it down. For proof hereof, I might produce your friend Antiochus as witness, to say nothing of others, but that I can report me to your own selves. For after we had passed over Hellepont, even before we saw the Kings camp and army, when the hazard of war was indifferent, when the issue doubtful and uncertain, look what conditions of peace we then offered on even hand, and whiles we were equal one unto the other, and stood upon terms of advantage the same and no other we present unto you at this time, now that we are conquerors. Forbear to meddle within Europe: depart wholly out of Asia, so much as is on this side Taurus. Moreover, in regard of the expences defraied in this war, ye shall pay fifteen thousand Talents of silver, according to the computation of Eubana: five hundred in hand, two thousand and five hundred at the assurance and making of the peace, by the Senat and people of Rome; and a thousand talents yearly for twelve years next ensuing. Also ye shall make payment unto Eumenes of four hundred talents, and the remnant behind of the corn and grain which was due unto his father. And when we have contracted and concluded these covenants, to the end that we may rest assured that ye will perform the same, we demand for a gage and sufficient pawn "that A "that ye deliver into our hands twenty hostages, such as we shall like well of and chuse. And for as much as we can never be persuaded that the people of Rome shall enjoy long peace, there, where Antiochus is, we demand above all things to have him in our custody. Also you shall deliver into our hands Thas the Ætolian, the principal author and friend of that war with the Ætolians, who caused you to take arms against us, upon assurance that he gave you of them: and likewise armed them upon the trull they had in you. Item, together with him you shall deliver Maasimachus the Acarnanian, together with Philo and Eubulides the Chalcidians. The K. shall now contract peace in worse estate then he was, by reason he maketh it later then he might have done. But to ease he hold off still and delay, know he well thus much, that the royal majesty and port of Kings is with more difficulty abased & taken down from the highest pitch and degree unto the mud; then from that mean estate, cast down headlong to the lowest. Now these Embassadors were sent from the King with this charge, to accept of my articles of peace whatsoever. And therefore it was decreed that Embassadors should directly ient to Rome. The Consul divided his army into garrisons for to winter, some in Magnesia upon the river Maander, others in Tralles and Ephesus. After few daies the hostages above said, were brought to Rome at the same time that King's Embassadors: and there followed embassies moreover of all the States of Asia.

Whiles the office of Asia passed thus in these terms, there were two pro-consuls returned out of their several provinces, both in manner at once, upon hope to obtain triumph, to wit, Q. Minucius out of Liguria and M. Acilius out of Ætolia. When the exploits were heard, as well of the one as the other Minucius was flately denied triumph, but Acilius had it granted with great content of all men: who rode into the City triumphant over King Antiochus and the Ætolians. In which triumph there were carried before him 230 ensigns, 3000 pound weight of massie silver in bullion; of coin in Attick Tetradrachms 130000 in Cistophors 248000. In plate many vessels engraved and chased of great weight. He carried also in pomp the implements of the KK. house all of silver, with rich and sumptuous apparel. Also crowns of gold 45 presented unto him by Cities: besides all sorts of rich spoils; and moreover he led divers noble men prisoners, and left of all 30 captains, as well Ætolians as those who served under the King. As for Democrisus, a great commander of the Ætolians, who some few daies before had broken prison and escaped by night, he was by his keepers that made fresh trait after him, overthrown upon the bank of Tybris: but before he could be attached by them, he fell upon his own sword, and ran himself through. Only there wanted those that should have followed after his chariot; otherwise the triumph had been magnificent and rarely, both for the pompous shew and also of the honor and renown of exploits achieved. But the joy of this triumph was blighted with heavy tidings out of Spain, of a loss and overthrow received of the Portugall, in the countrey of Valcetan, near the town Lyes, under the conduct of L. Æmilius: where 6000 of the Roman army were left dead in the place, and the rest discomfited and beaten back into the camp; which they had much ado to defend and hold, and were forced to retire in manner of flight, and by long journeys recovered the peaceable quarters of their friends. And this was the news out of Spain.

From out of France the Embassadors of the Placentins and Cremonians, were brought by the Pretor L. Aemilius unto the Senat: where they made much moan and complaint for default and want of inhabitants, whereof some were devoured by the edge of the sword in wars, others consumed by m. l. sicknes, yea, and certain of them departed out of their colonies for weariness they had of the Gauls their near neighbours. Whereupon the Senat ordained C. Laelius the Consul to enroll, if he thought to good, six thousand families, for to be distributed among those Colonies aforesaid: & L. Aemilius the Pretor to create three Commissioners called Triumvirs, for the conducting of the coloners and inhabitants aforesaid. And created there were M. Attilius Serranus, L. Valerius Flaccus the son of Publius, and L. Valerius Tappus the son of Caius.

Not long after, against the time of the Consuls election which approached near, C. Laelius the Consul returned out of France to Rome, and he not only by virtue of the act of the Senat made in his absence, enrolled certain Coloners to supply the want in Placentia and Cremona, but also proposed a bill, and according to it the LL. of the Senat ordained, that two new Colonies should be conducted into the land that appertaineth to the Boians. And at the very same time were letters brought from L. Æmilius the Pretor, as touching the battell at Lia fought near to Magnesia: which letters also gave intelligence, that L. Scipio the Consul had transported his army into Asia. For joy of the said navall victory, there was ordained a solemn procession for one day, and in regard that the Roman army was then first on foot in Asiatick, the said procession continued another day with supplication to the gods, that this voyage might turn to the prosperity and joy of the Commonwealth. And the Consul was enjoyed at each procession and supplication, to satisfaction: twenty head of greater beasts. After this ensued the solemn assembly for the chusing of Consuls, which was holden with great strife and contention. For M. Æmilius Lepidus stood to be Consul, a man grown into an ill name, and hardly spoken of among the people, in that he had left his government and charge in Sicily for this occasion and business only, without making full unto the Senat and craving leave so to do. Together with him were competitors in election, M. Fulvius Nobilior, Cn. M. Minus Volse, and M. Valerius M. Julia. But Fulvius was chosen alone, because he had felt not sufficient voices of the Centuries, and he the morrow after nominated Cn. Manlius dy, as for that it was meet and decent ye should so do. Many faults there be, and those colour-ably just and lawful) to enter into wars: one pretended this another that some in right of lands and territories, other of villages & some lay claim to towns and Cities, others challenge the possession of ports and havens, and one track or other of the sea-coasts, As for you, before you enjoyed these things, you desired them not: since then you have now compassed the whole earth, and are LL. of the world, you cannot possibly cover the same any more. Warred you have and fought for honour and glory, in the fight of all the nations of the earth, who now this long time behold and regard your name and empire, no less than they do the gods immortal. And I woe not well, whether those things which we hardly come by, be not with more difficulty holden & kept afterwards, than they were purchased. You undertook to deliver & rid out of the servitude and oppression of Kings, and to maintain liberty, a most ancient and noble state, renewed by for their worthy and famous acts, and right commendable all this nation in your safeguard ledge in all sciences. For your honour it is, having once received all this nation in your safeguard and protection, to defend and preserve the same for ever. And think not, that those Cities only are more Greek which are built and seated upon the ancient soil of Greece, then their colonies which have been drawn from them, & in times past went from thence into Asia: for the change of air and place hath wrought no alteration, either in the nature or complexion, or the manners & fashions of the people. As for us, endeavoured we have do better and better, and each City hath entered into in honest contention and religious emulation to out-go and surmount their forefathers and first-founders in all good arts and commendable virtues. There be many of you who have been in Greece, many have visited the Cities of Asia, and letting aside this only, That K we have been in Greece, many have visited the Cities of Asia, and letting aside this only, That K we are farther distant and remote from you, there is no difference and odds between us & them. The Mæsilians, whom (if possible it had been, that so immoderate temperate might be altered and overcome with the strength and nature, as it were in the soil) in many wild, barberous, and untamed nations, environing them round about, would have made cruel and savage long before this day; we hear say and understand to be in that request and estimation (by good right, and their desert) among you, as if they dwelt in the very midst and heart of Greece, for not only they retain still the very natural language of their own, they keep them to their old fashion of apparel and attire, and carry the same part in their gesture and countenance, but also above all things they have kept and observed their customs their manners, their laws and natural disposition pure and entire, notwithstanding the frequent commerce with those, in the midst of whom they converse and inhabit. Well, the mountain Taurus at this day is the limit of your empire and signory one way: and therefore whatsoever lieth between you and that bound, ye must not think it remote, but look how far your arms have reached, so far let your laws and jurisdiction extend. Let Barbarians, who know no other laws than lords belis, have their Kings, since they take such pleasure in them, and much good may they do their hearts: as for the Greeks, they must do as they may, and are not (we confess) in so good case as you, howbeit they carry with them as brave a mind as your selves: and the day hath been, when they were Monarchs, when they were content with that empire where it now is, nay, they wish it when they had it. Now they are content with that empire where it is settled at this present. They shall be may remain and continue there for evermore, where it is settled at this present. They shall be well apaid, and think they are well, to maintain their liberty by your force of arms, since they have no means of their own to defend the same. But (will some man say) there be certain Cities that beld a side and banded with Pyrrhus, as for example, the Tarcentins: and to with Philip, to there were that combined with Antiochus, as for example, the Carthagini-fly nothing of other States, which I could name and rehearse, even Carthage it self enjoyed freedom and is governed by her own laws. Consider then my LL. what a precedent therein ye have set down to your own selves, and how ye ought to confirm and uphold so good an example. You multivole to deny that unto the covetous desire of Eunneus, which you would not grant to your ownie against the Carthaginians, which they had most justly deferred, and as for us Rhodians, with what valour and fidelity we have served and aided you, as well in this war, as in all others which ye have had in those parts and quarters, we report us to our own selves, and leave it to your judgment. And now in time of peace, we here present unto you that council, which if you will accept and approve, all the world will beleeye and say, That ye have born your selves more honorably in the wage, then in the achievement of your victory.

This Oration (seemed it well the greatness and majesty of the Romans. When the Rhodians had done, the Embassadors of Antiochus were called in. Who after the usual and stale manner of those that crave pardon, confessed the King was in fault, and humbly besought the LL. of the Senat to have more regard of their own accustomed gracious clemency, then remember the Kings treachery, who had paid sufficiently for it already: and finally that they would ratifie and confirm by their authority, the peace granted by L. Scipio the Lord General, according to those conditions, which by him were capitulated and set down. So both the Senat thought good to admit of that peace, and also within few daies after the people gave their assent, and established the same. And this accord was solemnly confirmed in the Capitol, with the Kings Procureur or agent, to wit, Antipater, the chief of the embassy, who also was Antiochus his brothers son. This done, the other embassages of Asia had audience, and were all dispatched with an empty one away, that the Senat would send ten deputies or commissioners, according to the ancient

A client customs of their ancestors, to hear, decide, and compose all their affairs of Asia. But the final conclusion of all should be this, That whatsoever pertaining to the dominion of Antiochus on this side the mountain Taurus, should be assigned to King Eumenes, excepting the countries of Lycia and Caria, so far as the river Maander, all which must lie to the glory of the Rhodians. As touching the other Cities of Asia, which had been tributaries to the King of the Rhodians, pay tribute to Eumenes; but such as were sometimes homagers to Attalus, thole also were to enfranchised and remain free. The ten commissioners whom they appointed were this, to wit, Mintinus Rufus, L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Minutius Thermus, App. Claudius Nero, Cn. Cornelius Murela, M. Iunius Brutus, L. Anturculeius, L. Comptus Paulus, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Elius Tiberio. These men had plenary power and full commission to take order and determine as they thought good, in all the occurrences that were presented in these flairs. But they Phrygia both the more and the lesse, that Mysia, which the Kings chaile and forreils, that the Cities of Lydia and Jonas, except thole that were free at the day of the battell fought with Antiochus, and expressly by name Magnesia near Sipylus, together with Caria, which is called Hydrelia, and all the territories of Hydrelia lying toward Phrygia; moreover Telmessus and the forts of the Telmeliens, reserving only that territory which belonged to Protemeus, the Telmeliens: that all these That the Rhodian should be enfeoffed in Lycia, without the foresaid Telmessus the forts and territory, appertaining sometime to Protemeus Telmessus: which parcels, I say, were relaved as well from Eumenes, as the Rhodians, Ism, to the Rhodi was granted that part of Caria, which lieth beyond the river Maander, neer to the ille Rhoas, together with the towns, villages, fortresses and lands bounding upon Pisidia: except thole towns which were free the day before the battell with King Antiochus in Asia. The Rhodians, when they had given thanks to the Senat for their grauties, were in hand with them for the City Soli in Cilicia: they alleged, that they likewise as well as themselves, were delenced from Argos: by occasion of which continuety and near alliance, they loved together as brethren by nature: in regard whereof, they made petition that over and besides other donations, they would do them this extraordinary favour, as to exempt that City also from the servitude and subjection of K. Antiochus. Then were the Embassadors of King Antiochus called for, and treated withall about this matter, but to no effect. For Antipater stood stoutly upon this point, pleaded hard, that the accord was pall already, and might not be revoked or altered: and that against the tenour of the articles and covenants therein compulld, it was not the City Soli, but also Cilicia that the Rhodians demanded: and never would they rest till they were gotten over the mountain Taurus. Then were the Rhodians called back again into the Senat, unto whom the L. of the Senat, after they had made tellen how earnest the Kings Embassadors deemed in very deed that the matter concerned the honour of their City and State, the Senat would work all possible means to cause the Kings Embassadors to relent, how stiff and obstinate soever they stood. For this cause, the Rhodians thanked them much more heartily then for all the rest before, and said withall, that they would yield and give place to the Argos spirit of Antiochus, rather then seem to give any cause or occasion of troubling the peace. And so touching the City Soli, there was no alteration made.

While these matters were thus debated and passed, the Embassadors of the Massilians brought intelligence, that L. Rabirius the Pretor, being in his journey towards his province of Spain, was entrapped and enclosed by the Ligurians, and many of his train killed outright in the place, was himself mortally wounded fled without his horses and sergeants into Massilia, and within three dayes left this life. The Senat upon the advertisement ordered P. Iunius Bruttus the Pro-pretor first to leave Heimiria and the army there to one of the Lieutenants whom he pleased to make choice of. This decree of the Senat, together with letters from Spurius Postumius the Pretor of the City was sent into Heimiria: and so P. Iunius departed as Pro-pretor into Spain. In which province L. Amylius Paulus (who afterwards was a right glorious victory of King Perseus) having the former year fought unfortunately, now a little before the arrival of his successor, gave battell to the Luitanians with an army rallied and assembled in half: in which the enemies were put to the worke and driven to flee. One thousand eight hundred of them well armed were left dead in the field, 3300 taken prisoners, and their camp forced and ransacked. The bruit that went of this victory left all matters in Spain in greater quietnes.

The same year upon the third day before the Calends of January, L. Valerius Flaccus, M. Atilius Varianus, and L. Valerius Tappo, the three Triumvirs, by order from the Senat, planted a Latine Colony at Bolonia; and three thousand people were thither sent to dwell. Every gentleman by calling that served on horseback had 70 acres of ground set out unto him, and the rest of the colonists fifty apiece. The land divided thus among them had been conquered from the Boians in Gaul: and those Gauls first had dispossessed the Tuicins of the same.

This year there were many men of mark and name that Iued to be Censors: and this competition as it had not been of sufficient importance it self to move matter of debate, was the occasion of a contention and variance much greater. The competitors werethese, M. Quintus Flaminius, P. Cornel. Scipio, the son of Cnecus: L. Valerius Flaccus, M. Porcius Cato, M. C. C.

During the time of the wars in Asia, the Ætoliæ also in Æolia were in small rest and quietness: which troubles arose first from the Atthamians, who after that Aminander was dispossessed of his Kingdom, were held in obedience by garriſons under the captainship of King Philip; and they bare themselves so proud, insolent, and outrageous in their government, that the Atthamians found a great misse of Aminander, and were desirous of him again. Now remained he at that time as a banished person in Æolia; and upon letters received from his own nation (concerning the state wherein Atthamians then stood) he conceived some hope to recover his crown again; whereupon he sent the messengers back to Argiſtea (the chief City of Atthamania) unto the principall men of the country, with this crechee, That if he might be assured of the affection and love of the people, he would procure the aid of the Atthamians and come into Atthamania, accompanied with the elect personages (and those are the council of that nation) and Nander the Pretor. When he understood and perceived that they were prest and ready to do him service, he advertised them oftentimes upon what day he would enter with his army into Atthamania. At the first there were but few persons that conspired against the Macedonian garriſon; and these took every one fix more unto them for to be assistant in the execution of their complot. But afterwards trusting but little in this small number of their adherents and complices (who indeed were fitter to keep councill and conceal a matter secretly, than to perform any action valiantly) they adjoynd unto them the like number unto the other: so as now they were two and fifty in all; and they divided themselves into four companies. One crew of them went to Heraclea, another to Terraphylla, where the Kings treasure was usually kept; a third took their way to Thendoria; and the fourth to Argiſtea. But they all agreed upon this course, to hold themselves quiet and peaceable at their first coming, and to converse in the market place of these Cities, as if they were come about some particular negotiation of their own; and upon a certain day appointed to set to it at once, and to raise the whole multitude for to expell the Macedonian garriſons out of their fortresses. Now when the day was come, and Aminander ready upon the frontiers with his forces of a thousand Ætoliæ, the garriſons of the Macedonians were at one instant chased out of those four Cities aforesaid, like as it was complotted before hand; and letters were dispatched from all parts into other Cities, advising them to deliver and free themselves from the tyranny of Philip, and restore Aminander into his lawfull kingdom and throne of his father. Thus the Macedonians were expelled in every quarter; only the town Theſſion made resistance and held out some few daies against the siege, by occasion that Zeno (captain of the garriſon there) had intercepted the letters, and they that sided with Philip were possessed of the citelle. But in the end surrendered it was likewise unto Aminander, and all Atthamania reduced unto his obedience excepting only the fort of Athenæum, situate upon the marches of Macedony.

Philip advertised of the revolt of Atthamania, accompanied with a power of six thousand fighting men, put himself in his journey, and with exceeding expedition, marched as far as Gomphi. Where he left the greater part of his forces, (for they had not been able to endure so long a journey) and with two thousand came to Athenæum, the only place held by his garriſon to his use. And from thence, after he had founded the next neighbours, and soon found that there was nothing but hostility among them, he retired to Gomphi, and joined withall his forces together returned into Atthamania. Then he sent Zeno before with a thousand footmen, and gave him in charge to seize upon Æthiopia, a place that directly for his purpose commandeth Argiſtea; and seeing that his men were possessed thereof, himself left him down, and pitched his tents about a certain temple dedicated to the name of Jupiter. There he was forced by reason of the foul and stormy weather to stay one whole day, and the morrow after he went forward with his army to Argiſtea. As they marched, behold they discovered the Atthamians, running from divers parts to the hill tops, which stood over the way along. They had no sooner espied them, but the foremost engines made way, and all that regiment of the vanguard was surprised with fear and fright. Every man began for his part to cast many doubts, and think with himself what should become of them, in case their companies were entred once into the vallies, so checked by those rocks above said. This tumult and trouble caused the King perforce to call back those in the vanguard, and to retire the same way that he came, notwithstanding he was very desirous (if they would have seconded him) to have made quick speed, and gotten through those streights. The Atthamians at first followed after them aloof quietly enough; but when they had once joined with the Ætoliæ, leaving them behind to come upon the tail of the enemy, they spread themselves all about and flanked them on the sides: some of them also got afore their head by the next waies which they were acquainted with, and beset the passages; insomuch, as the Macedonians were so greatly troubled, that forced they were (more like men that fled in dismay, than marched in good order) to leave much of their armor, and many of their men behind, to pass over the river; and there the chase ended. From thence the Macedonians returned safely to Gomphi, and so forth into Macedony.

The Atthamians and the Ætoliæ assembled from all parts to Æthiopia for to surprise and defeat Zeno and that regiment of a thousand Macedonians which was with him. But the Macedonians relying on great trust in that place, retired from Æthiopia, to an hill much higher and

A Reeper on all sides, and therefore lesse acceptable. The Atthamians having found out diverse passages unto it, enforced them to forgo that hold, and when they were dispersed among the blind rocks, and unto them unknown, and could not readily find the way out of some of them were taken prisoners, & others slain. Many for fear tumbled down headlong from the pitch of the cliffs, and brake their necks, and very few escaped with Zeno to the King. The next day after they obtained truce, until they had committed their dead to earth.

Aminander having thus repossessed his realm, sent Embassadors to Rome unto the Senat likewise unto the Scipios in Asia (who after the great battell with Antiochus, returned to Ephesus) He craved peace and pardon, he excused himself in that he had recovered his fathers Kingdom by the means and help of the Ætoliæ, and withall laid great fault and blame upon King Philip.

As for the Ætoliæ, they departed out of Atthamania, and made an expedition against the Amphilochians, and by consent of the greater part (reduced the whole nation under their puissance and jurisdiction. Having thus regained Amphilochia (for in times past it appertained to their feignery) upon the same hope they passed over in Aperantia, which yielded also for a great part thereof, and came under their obedience. As for the Dolopians, they never belonged to the Ætoliæ, but unto Philip. And at the first they assembled together in arms, but understanding one, that the Amphilochians took part with the Ætoliæ, that Philip was fled out of Atthamania and that his garriſon was put to the sword, they revolted likewise from Philip, and turned to the Ætoliæ. Who making now full account that they were safe enough on all sides from the Macedonians, by reason of so many nations which environed them, they took less lodge in the common breath of the dread of Antiochus by the Romans in Asia, and not to suffer after their own: his advisors returned to Rome without hope of peace, relating withall that Fulvius the Consul had passed the seas already with an army. Upon these newes, they were much troubled and afraid; and in this perplexity, they induced and procured first the Rhodians and then the Antiochian allies, to the end that by the credit and countenance of these two States, their pleaders might be able to have more ready access to the Senat; and with them they sent to Rome once again the principal personages of their nation, to try their last hope of obtaining peace; and never to call to prevent war, before the enemy was come nearer within their sight. Now had M. Fulvius transported his forces to Apollonia, and devised with the princes and states of the Epixots, where to begin war.

The Epixots advised him to assail Ambracia, which as then was united to the Ætoliæ. And saying either the Ætoliæ should come to the defence of the place, they had a goodly large and open plain all about to bid them battell, or if they refused the field, and would not fight, they should find no great difficulty to assault and force the town. For not only there was at hand store enough of ships, and other matter to raise mounts, manlets, and other tackle; but Arctia a river navigable, very commodious to transport all necessities unto them, with much advantage under the walls of the City; and besides, the summer was a fit season for war service. With these reasons they persuaded the Consul to conduct his army through Epixoti. But when the Consul was come before Ambracia, he found it was no easie piece of work to besiege; and assault the town. This Ambracia is situate under the stony and craggy hill, which the inhabitants call Perantia. The City it self looketh unto the West, what way as the wall reacheth toward the fields and the river; the fort and citelle thereof standeth upon the hill, and regardeth the East. The river Arctia running out of Scarmania, dischargeth itself into an arme of the sea, which beareth the name of the City near adjoining, and is called Ambracia. This town, besides that it is well guarded with the river of one side, and defended with hills on the other, is fortified also with a strong wall, in circuit somewhat more than three miles about. Fulvius encamped strongly on the fields side, in two holds of a pretty distance asunder, and raised one sconce upon an high ground, opposite against the entrance of the town. All these places he determined to enclose within the compass of a trench and rampier, to the end that they who were shut up within the town, might have no egrets, and that from without there should be no ingress, for any kind and manner whatsoever. The Ætoliæ were assembled already at Stratus, by an edict from the Pretor Nimander, incontinently upon the rumour that the Five siege of Ambracia, intending fully at first to march from thence withall their forces. But afterwards, when they perceived that a greater part of the City was strongly beleaguered already, and enclosed with trench and rampier; and withall that the Epixots were encamped upon a plain on the other side of the river, they were of advice to divide their forces into two parts. Eupolmus accompanied with a regiment of a thousand men lightly armed, passed through the fortifications of the enemies, before they were joined and united together, and assailed Ambracia.

Nimander with the rest of the forces pursued at the first by night to assault the camp of the Epixots, considering that the Romans could not easily succour them by reason of the river running so near. But afterwards upon notice given, supposing this to be a dangerous enterprise for fear, the Romans should discover their march, and intercept them that they might not retire again in safety, he altered his march, and came to the pursuing and waiting of Scarmania. Now when the Consul had made an end of his marches, devised for to assault and enclose the City, and nothing his engines where with he meant to shake the wall, he approached near and gave assault in five places at once. Three batteries he planted in equidistance asunder, and where the easiest passage and access was from the plain, full upon that place of the City which they call Perantia, one over against the temple of Alektapides; and another opposite to the Citelle. With rams he hooked the walls, with long poles and hooks he fetched off and pucked down the whereupon they returned unto them, without doing any thing at all, to know the advice once again of the Prator and the principal States, what to resolve upon in every respect, whilſt all flood whole and upright. But they were welcomed with outcries, and well ſent to their labour, in that they had not diſpatched and made an end, and ſo were ſent away, and commanded to bring back with them one peace or other. As they went again toward Ambracia, they were foreſeized and ſurprized in an ambuſh laid for them near the high way ſide by the Acarnanians (with whom at that time they warred) and were had to Tyrrhenus and there imprifoned, And by this occaſion the peace was delayed.

Whilſt the Embaſſadors of Aſiens and Rhodes (who were come already to intreat for them) remained with the Conſul, Aminander alſo (the King of the Athamians) preſented himſelf under ſafe conduct in the Roman camp, and took more care for the City of Ambracia (where he had ſojourned the greateſt part of his exile) than in the behalf of the Ætolians. By them, the Conſul was certiſied of the hard hap of the Ætolian Embaſſadors; and then he gave commandment that they ſhould be brought from Tyrrhenus. When they were come, they began to treat of peace, Aminander in the mean while laboured what he could in that enterpriſe which he eſpecially had undertaken, namely, to induce the Ambracians to ſubmit unto the Romans; but when he ſaw he did but ſmall good, for all his parling with the principal perſons of the City from their walls at length by the Conſul's permiſſion he entered into the town; where, partly by good counſel, and partly by prayer and entreaty, he perſwaded them in the end, to put themſelves into the Romans hands. Now as touching the Ætolians, they found much favour by the means of C. Valerius the ſon of that Laevinus, who firſt contracted amity with that nation; and was beſides half brother unto the Conſul, by the ſame mother. And the Ambracians after capitulation made, that the Ætolians who came to aid them might go forth without harm, ſet open their gates. Then attended it was with the Ætolians: Imprimis, To pay 500 Euboic talents of ſilver; two hundred preſently and the other 300 at fix payments yearly by even portions. Item, To render all Roman captives and fugitive traitors and runagates that they had into the hands of the Romans. Item, To challenge juſtification over no City, whilſt ſince the time that T. Quintus paſſed over into Greece, was either forced by the Romans or entered voluntarily into amity and ſociety with them: provided alwaies, that the ſite Cephalonia be not comprized within this capitulation. Theſe articles albeith they were ſomewhat eaſier than they looked for, yet the Ætolians requeſted, that they might acquaint their Council withall; and permitted they were ſo to do. Some ſmall variance and debate diſtracted and held them awhile as touching thoſe Cities, which having been in times paſt within their feignory and juſtification, they hardly could abide to be diſmembred (as it were) from their body. But in the end there was not one but agreed to accept of the peace. The Ambracians gave unto the Conſul, for a preſent a coronet of beaten gold, weighing 150 pound. Their ſtatues of braſs and marble, their painted tables (wherewith Ambracia was better ſtored and adorned, than all the other Cities of that region, becauſe it was the royall ſeat of King Pyrrius where he kept his court and reſidence) were all taken down and carried away: nought elle was touched, nor any hurt done beſides.

The Conſul diſlodged them, and removed from Ambracia into the higher and more inland parts of Ætolia, and encamped before the City called Argos Amphilocheum, two and twenty miles diſtant from Ambracia; and thither at length repaired the Ætolian Embaſſadors unto him, who marvelled much at them, why they ſtaid ſo long. When he underſtood by them that the general council of the Ætolians had approved of peace, he willed them to go directly to Rome unto the Senat; and permitted alſo the Athenians and *Rhodian*s (their mediators and advocates) to go with them and as orators to ſpeak in their behalf; moreover he granted, that his half brother C. Valerius ſhould accompany them: which order when he had taken, himſelf croſſed over the water to Cephalonia.

When they were arrived at Rome, they found both the ears and hearts of the chief Senators wholly poſſeſſed beforehand, with many complaints and imputations that Philip had enforced againſt them: for he by means of his Embaſſador and letters (complaining that the Ætolians had unjuſtly taken from him the Dolopians, the Amphilocheians, and Athamanians; and that his garrifons, yea, and laſt of all his ſon Perſeus, were driven out of Amphilocheia) had wholly averſed the Senat from giving any ear at all to their requeſts and prayers; howbeit the *Rhodian*s and Athenians had audience given them with patience and ſilence. The Athenian Embaſſador Leon (by report) moved and perſwaded the Senat with his eloquent tongue; and by a familiar parable and ſimilitude, he compared the people of Ætolia to the nature of the ſea: For like as it, being of it ſelf calm is troubled and made rough by the winds; even ſo (ſaith he) the people of that nation, altho' the while they entertained friendſhip with the Romans, and performed their faithful promiſe unto them ſo long were in their right kind, and continued peaceable and quiet; but after that Thoon and Dicaearchus began to blow from out of Aſia, as after that, Mentus and Democritus bliftred and puſhed from the parts of Europe, then aroſe a ſtorm and tempeſt, with the guſts whereof driven they were to Antiochus, and caſt (as a man would ſay) upon a rock, Well he ſaid, Ætolians after they had been much toſſed a long time from poſt to pillar, in fine eſſeſſed, that theſe articles of peace enſuing, were freely agreed upon. Imprimis, The nation of Ætolia ſhall maintain faithfully and truly the Empire and Seignory of the people of Rome. Item, They ſhall ſuffer to paſs through their country and confines no army, that ſhall be conducted againſt their allies and friends; nor aſſiſt them with any aid or maintenance whatſoever. Item, They ſhall repute the enemies,

A allies of the Romans for their enemies, and wage war againſt them. Item, They ſhall deliver unto the Romans and their confederates, all runagates, all fugitives, and prifoners that are among them, excepting ſuch as having been once taken and returned home, ſhould be caught again the ſecond time: or thoſe, who being Roman enemies, were taken priſoners by them. At what time as the Ætolians ſerved in garrifon under the Romans, As for the reſt, as many as are forth-coming and may be found, ſhall be delivered (without fraud or covin) within 100 daies next enſuing, to the Magiſtrate of Corinra: but thoſe that appear not within that time, ſhall be likewiſe rendered whenſoever their fortune is to be met withall. Item, They ſhall yield forty hostages, ſuch as the Roman Conſul in his diſcretion will approve and like well of: provided, that none of theſe pledges be under twelve years of age, nor above forty. Neither ſhall there be taken for hoſtage any Prator or Captain of horſemen, nor publick Notary or Secretary to the State, nor yet any one that hath lain in hoſtage before time. Provided alſo, that Cephalonia ſhall be exempt from the articles of this accord. Item, As touching the ſum of money which they are to pay, and the manner and terms of the payment, there ſhall be nothing hogged of that which hath been concluded with the Conſul; yet, if they had rather pay the ſame ſum in gold than in ſilver, they may ſo do; provided then, that they keep true rate and proportion of one for ten to wit, that one golden peece of coin go for ten times ſo much in weight of ſilver, and no more. Item, What Cities, what lands and territories, what perſons (except which having at any time heretofore held tenor of the Ætolians, were by the Conſuls L. Quinctius and Cn. Domitius, or any time ſince their Conſulſhip, either ſubdued and conquered by force of arms, or otherwiſe C of themſelves came under the obedience of the people of Rome, the Ætolians ſhall make no claim nor challenge unto them. Finally, the Æniades with their City and territory ſhall appertain to the Acarnanians. Under theſe conditions aboveſaid, the accord was concluded with the Ætolians.

Not only in the ſame ſummer, but alſo much about thoſe very daies wherein theſe affairs were managed by M. Fulvius in Ætolia, Cn. Manlius the other Conſul maintained war in Gallia, whereof at this preſent I will begin to write. This Conſul in the beginning of the ſpring came to Ephelus; where after he had received the army of L. Scipio and taken a review and ſurvey thereof he made an Oration to his ſouldiers; wherein, firſt he praiſed their valour and vertue, in that with one battell they had finiſhed the war againſt Antiochus: then he exhorted them to enter into a new war with the Gauls who had ſuccoured King Antiochus with aid; and were beſide of nature untamed, that unleſs their puniſhment were abated and their courage taken down, to little or no purpoſe it was that Antiochus was removed beyond the mountains of Taurus. Laſt of all, ſome diſcourſe he made of his own perſon, which was nothing prolix and long, implying neither vain untruths nor exceſſive reports. The ſouldiers gave audience to the Conſul with great joy and a general applauſe, making this account, that ſince King Antiochus was vanquiſhed, the Gauls alone (who were one part of his forces) would be of no uſe unto the Conſul, who had at Rome (who knew the countries, was acquainted with the nature of the people, and whom it imported and concerned very much, that the power of the Gauls ſhould be enfeebled and abated. E And therefore he ſent for Attalus his brother, from Pergamus, and exhorted him to enter into action with him and take arms. And when Attalus had made promiſe to aid him both in his perſon and with all the power that he could make, he ſent him into his country to levy ſouldiers. After ſome few daies, when the Conſul was departed from Ephelus, Attalus accompanied with a regiment of a thouſand foot and two hundred horſe met him at Meneſias and had given order to his brother Athenaeus, to follow after with the reſt of the forces; having committed the guard and government of Pergamus and the kingdom to thoſe, whom he knew to be faithfull and faithful to his brother and himſelf. The Conſul, after he had praiſed and commended the young gentlemen marched forward with his whole power as far as Mander, and there encamped, becauſe it was not poſſible to paſs the river at any foord, and therefore boats and barges were to be got together for to ferry and tranſport the army. When they were ſet over the river, they went to Hieris Come, where there was a magnificent and ſtately Temple of Apollon, and an Oracle in it. And by report the Priests and Prophets there, deliver the reſponds and answers of the Oracle in verſes, and thoſe not rudely compoſed without rhythm & meter. From hence they removed, and at two daies end arrived at the river Harpaſus; thither were embaſſadors come from the Alabandians requeſting the Conſul, either by vertue of his authority, or by force of arms to compel one of their ſortleſſes which lately had revolted from them and rebelled, to return again to their former obedience. And his brother Athenaeus alſo, brother to Eumenes and Attalus, was come together with Leſius the Candiot, and Corragus the Macedonian, bringing with them 1000 foot and 300 horſe of divers nations mingled together. The Conſul ſent one of his martial Tribunes or Colonels with a mean company, to ſummon the Cattle or ſortleſſes aboveſaid, and after it was forced and recovered, he delivered it into the hands of the Alabandians. Himſelf kept on his direct way, and turned on no ſide until he came unto Antiochus upon the river Mander, where he encamped. This river Mander ariſeth from Celaſa, where the firſt head and ſource thereof is to be ſeen. Now this Celaſa had been in times paſt the capital City of all Phrygia. But in proceſs of time this old Celaſa was abandoned by the Inhabitants, and not far from it they peopled a new City called Apamea bearing the name of Apamea the ſiſter of Selenus. The river Mander likewiſe ſpringing not far from the foresaid sources of Mander, dischargeth it self thereinco. And as the common fame goeth, at this Celena it was, where Marcius the Musiciangave dance to Apollo, and challenged him to play upon the flute. This Mander above named, issuing out of an high hill at Celena, runneth through the middle of the City and first keeling by the coast along the country of the Carians, and afterwards of the Ionians, jalleth at the last into an arm of the sea, between Priene and Miletus.

Whiles the Col, lay encamped about Antiochia, Seleucus the son of Antiochus, presented himself unto him with corn for his army, according to the covenant contracted with Scipio. Some small variance and difference there was as touching the aid demanded of Antiochus: for Seleucus pleaded that Antiochus had capitulated only to find corn for the Roman souldiers. But this debate was soon at an end by reason of the stiff resolution of the Col, who sent a Colonel to warn and charge the souldiers to accept no corn before the aid-souldiers of Antiochus were received. From thence he marched to Gordius (a City so called) & to forward the third day to Tala. This City is seated upon the frontiers of the Pindians, in that coast which boundeth upon the Pamphylian sea. This quarter was able to yield lufy men for war, when it had not been any way endamaged, but remained entire and whole. For proof whereof even then also there issued out of the City a cornet of horimen, who charged upon the Romans as they marched, and at the first onset troubled them not a little. But afterward, seeing themselves neither for number, nor yet for prowess comparable unto them, they were driven back into the town, & craved pardon for their trespass, ready to surrender their City into the Col's hands. The Col, imposed upon them a paiment of 25 talents of silver, and 10000 medimms of wheat, and upon that composition their surrender was accepted. Three daies after the Romans came to Chama the river & from thence to the City Eriza, which at the first assault they won. After this the army marched as far as to a Castle called Thalun standing over the river Indus, so called of certain Indian, whom an Elephant threw and cast into it. Now they were not far from Cilicia, & yet no embassage appeared from the tyrant of that country and state, Mongestes a disloyal and treacherous man in all his dealings, and besides, extreme hard and unreasonable. Whereupon the Col, sent out before C. Helvius with 4000 foot and 500 horse, to sound his disposition and mind. As these companies entered into his frontiers, there encountered them his Embassadors, giving them to understand that the tyrant their Master was ready to do whatsoever they would command: only his request was unto Helvius to pass peaceably through his country, and to restrain his souldiers from waisting & spoiling the territories, & 15 talents they brought with them for to make a cr-wn of gold. Helvius promised to save his lands for being spoiled and waited, but he willed the embassadors to go to the Col. Now when they had related the same unto him, he made them answer in these terms. We cannot gather by any sign (qd, he) that the tyrant beareth good will and affection to us Romans: & again, if he be such an one as the world taketh him for, we are to think rather of his chastilement, than of admitting him into our amity. The embassadors fore troubled at this word, requested him for that present no more, but to take the crown of gold, and to permit that the tyrant himself might have access into his presence for to parl with him and clear himself. The morrow after, by permission of the Col, came the tyrant into the camp, bearing no port of a Prince. For a privat person and mean man of small wealth would have gone in better apparel, and carried a greater train about him than he: neither went he so meanelly, but he spake as lowly, hacking and hewing his words, as if he had not been able to speak them out. He complained of his own bareness and want & likewise of the poverty of the Cities under his leignory (for besides Cybara, he held in possession Sylum & that which is called Alime). Yet he promised to see what he could do, if haply by undoing himself & spoiling his subjects he might make up five and twenty talents. Mary he mistrusted greatly that he should never effect so much. Are you thereabout? (qd, the Col). Now verily I can no longer endure this mockery. Was it not enough that in your abience you bashed not to delude and disappoint us by your Embassadors, but you must persist still in the same impudency now that you be here your self in person? And would you make us believe indeed, that the disbursing of 25 talents will begger you and your whole kingdom? Come on sir, I say: Bring me hither within these three daies, and lay me down in ready money 500 talents, or look for no other favour, but your territory to be waisted, and your City besieged. Greatly affrighted was he at these minatory words, howbeit he continued still obstinately, counterreiting & pretending his neediness and poverty, and after much bafe hucking, and rising by little and little, one while haisting and wrangling, another while praying and entreating, (and that with whining and putting finger in the eye) he was fetcht over at length, and came off to pay 100 talents of silver, and to deliver 10000 medimms of corn besides. And all this was exacted of him to be performed in six daies. From Cilicia the Col, conducted the army through the country of the Sindenians, and after he had passed over the river Calauris, he there pitched down his tents. The morrow after they marched by the lake or near Coralitis, and let them down and rested upon the river Maander. As they advanced from thence toward Lagon the next City the inhabitants fled for fear: wherupon the town void of people, but replenished with abundance of all things was ransacked and rifled. This done, they arrived at the head or spring of the river Lycus, and the next day marched toward the river Cobadatus. The Termilians at the same time having forced and won the City of the Lyrians, were now upon the point to assault the Castle. They who were within besieged, seeing no other hope of succour sent their Embassadors to the Consul, beseeching his help, and making pitifull moan, how they with their wives and children were shut up within the fortress, and looked every hour for death, either by famine or by sword.

* The time that Gordius came of Juliae.

* Hinn, Nigro, Dind, Locusts,

A sword. This fell out as the Col, wished, namely, to have so good an occasion presented unto him of turning his way into Pamphylia. At his first coming he delivered the Lyrians from the siege. To Termessus he granted peace upon composition that he should receive him 30 talents. In like sort he dealt by the Apdians and other States of Pamphylia. In his return from thence the first day he encamped first by a river called Taurus, and the next day following, near a town which they call Xylus-Come. From whence he marched and held on his journey continually, until he came to the city Cornaga. The next City unto it was Dafus, which he found abandoned by the inhabitants for the fear, howbeit, full of all kind of goods. As he marched still along the marshes there met him Embassadors from Lysinus, who came to render their City into his hands. After this he entered into the territory of Sagalassus, a fertile & plementous quarter, for all sorts of corn & fruits. The Pindians inhabited those parts who are the best warriors in all that country. In regard whereof, as also for that their territory is fruitful and well peopled, and their City strongly situate (as few like unto it) they were grown to be hardy and courageous. The Col, seeing no embassage presented unto him in the entrance of the frontiers, sent out foragers to fetch in booties. When they perceived on one of their goods harried and carried away before their faces, their stomaks came down, and then they sent their embassadors and upon composition to pay 50 talents, 20000 medimms of wheat, and as many of barley, they obtained peace. From thence he passed to the mountains of Orontus, until he came to a village which they name Apriodis-Come, and there he encamped. Thither repaired the next day Seleucus from Apamia. And the same day, after he had sent away unto Apamia his sick folk and other baggage and pelt that he had (good for nothing) he took guides of Sclunus to the

C. way, and entered into the plains of Metropolis, and the next morrow marched as far as Duma in Phrygia. After this he entered into Synada, where he found all the towns about abandoned for fear, and left deserr. With the booty and pillage whereof his army was to heavily charged, that hardly he could march five miles a day: and he came at length to Bendos, named. The old, from thence he passed to Anabura and the next day to the source of Andrus. And the third day pitched down his tents near Abisur. There he lay encamped many daies together, because he was now arrived into the country of the Tolitobogians.

The Gauls in times past being a mighty people in number were induced to take a voyage, either for want of land to inhabit, or for hope of booty and prizes: and supposing withall, that they could not pass through any nation whatsoever, comparable to themselves in feats of arms entered upon the conduct of Brennus into the country of the Dardanians. Where, they began to mutine among themselves: by occasion whereof it hapned, that to the number of twenty thousand of them, following two of their Princes Lomarius and Lotarius, departed from Brennus, and took their way into Thracia: where partly by warring with them that made resistance, and partly by imposing tribute upon them that craved peace, they came at length as far as to Byzantium: and after they had held tributary a good time the coast of Propontis, they possessed themselves also of the good towns and Cities of that quarter. After this they had a mind and desire to invade Asia: for they heard lay, being so near, how fertile and plementous the soil of that country was. And after they had surprized and won Lysimachia by a wile, and by force of arms conquered all Chersonesus, they descended to Hellepont, Where seeing how they were divided from Asia, but only by the

E. Straights and that it was but a small cut thither, their desire was much more inflamed to pass over. And for this purpose they dispatched certain curriers to Antipater the governor of that coast, to demand passage. But by reason that they effected not this so soon as they hoped, there arose another new sedition between the Princes themselves. Whereupon L. Marcus accompanied with the greater part retired to Byzantium from whence he came. But Lotarius took from the Macedonians (who under colour of an embassage were sent from Antipater in cippi) two covered ships, transporting them one after another day and night continually. Not long after Loquarius also passed over into Asia from Byzantium, by the aid of Nicomedes Kings of Bithynia. After this, the Gauls joined again together in one, and incoured Nicomedes in his wars against Zela, who held

F. a part of Bithynia, and by their help and assistance especially, Zela was vanquished, and all Bithynia became subject to Nicomedes. Then they departed out of Bithynia into Asia. Now of twenty thousand there were not above ten thousand armed. Yet to great a terror they brought unto all nations on this side the mountain Taurus, that both they to whom they approached, and not near, and also they whom they came unto, as well the farthest as the nearest, submitted themselves and ranged under their obedience. In the end, being three nations of them to wit, the Tolitobogians, the Troimians, and the Teftolages, they divided Asia likewise into three parts and parted them so equally among themselves, that each nation of them possessed several tract which paid them tribute. The coast of Hell-spontus was given to the Troimians: the Tolitobogians had for their share Æolis and Ionis: and unto the Teftolages were allotted the inland part of the main continent of Asia. And in one word they demanded tribute of all Asia on this side Taurus. But they planned and feared themselves about the river Halys. The fruit of their name was to be fearful and terrible, and especially after their issue was multiplied and increased in great number, that the Kings of Syria in the end refused not to be their homages, and paid them tribute. The first of all the inhabitants in Asia that denied them homage, was King Antiochus the father of Eumenes, and fortune beyond the expectation of all men, favoured his hardy and contrarious enterprise: for he vanquished them in battell. Howbeit, he danced not their hearts so much, but still they upheld

* Mar di Marmara,

And notwithstanding the very altitude and height of the places defended them, yet over and besides they call a trench, and made other defences round about the tops of the mountains which they held. Also for provision of darts and other shot, it was the least of all their care, supposing that the rough places would furnish them with sufficient store of stones to sling. The Consul calling in his mind that he should not deal with their enemies close at hand-fight, but at a far off when he was to assail their holds, had made provision aforehand of great store of darts, light variety javelins, arrows, bullets of lead, and small stones that might be levelled and sent out of slings. Thus being well appointed and furnished with such kind of shot, he led his army toward the mountain Olympus, and about five miles off he encamped. The next day he together with Attalus advanced forward with 500 men of arms to view the nature and standing of the mountain, together with the situation of the Gauls camp. But the enemies horsemen being double in number to them, infused out of their camp, and put them to flight, slew a few of them in the rout, and hurt many. The third day he set forward with all his forces to discover the places, and by reason that there came not one of them out of their defences and fortifications, he rode round about the mountain in safety at his pleasure, and the same rising up with an easie ascent to a certain place; all of clean earth without stones, and the same rising up with an easie ascent to a certain place; but to the North were high rocks and the same in manner steep upright. And whereas all the rest were inaccessible three only waies and avenues he found, the one directly toward the midst of the mountain (where those little mounts of earth stood) the other two were difficult the one lying South-east, and the other North-west. After he had considered and viewed these places that day he pitched his camp at the very root and foot of the hill. The morning after he sacrificed, and finding by the first beaits which he killed that the gods were pacified and favourable unto him, he divided his army into three battalions, and so advanced against the enemy, and himself in person with the greatest part of his forces, mounted up the hill, whereas it yielded the easiest ascent. He commanded his brother L. Manlius from the South-west to get up the hill, as the place would permit with safety, giving him in charge that he met with any dangerous places steep and hard of ascent, that he should not wrestle with the difficulties of the ground, nor strive against those things, which to force and overcome were impossible; but rather to traverse the ground, and retire toward him and so to join with his battallion. As for C. Helvius, he willed him with a third part of the forces to wheel about by little and little, and fetch a compass at the hill foot and then from the North-west to mount up. Likewise the aids of Attalus he divided into three equal parts. L. and took order that the young Prince himself in person should keep with him. The Cavalry and the Elephants he left in the next downs beneath the hills, and charged the Captains thereof to have a carefull eye and good regard to mark what was done in every place, yea and to make haste to relieve and succour wheresoever need should be. The Gauls making full reckoning that on two sides they were sure enough, and the place that way to be inaccessible; because they would stop the other avenue by force of arms on the South side, sent forth about four thousand armed men to seize upon a certain hill within a mile of their camp, which hill commanded the way. Supposing there, as from a sconce and tortrels to debar them of passage. Which when the Romans perceived they put themselves in readiness to fight. A pretty space before the ensignes, marched the skirmishers, together with the Candiot archers and slingers from Attalus likewise the Triballians of Thrace. The ensignes of the footmen followed softly after (as well as they might) against the hill, bearing their targets before them so, as they seemed to cover themselves only to avoid the shot, and meant not to enter into any fight hand to hand. The fight at first was equally performed with shot a good distance off: for as the Gauls got the advantage of the ground, so the Romans had the odds for variety and store of darts. But as the skirmish continued and increased, there was no more equality seen. For the fields of the Gauls being made long, and not broad enough for their bodies, and withall flat and plain without, hardly covered and defended them: and by this time all their shot was spent: & weapon had they none but their very swords, whereof there was no use at all, considering the enemy came not to close fight. The only help they had was with stones, and those too big for their handling, and not easie to wield by reason they were not provided before, but such as in that haste came next to their hand without any choice. Moreover, being not used and exercised to slinging, they had neither the artificiall sleight, nor yet sufficient strength to help themselves withall: but contrariwise, from all parts were pelted with bullets of lead and galled with arrows & darts together their wits & understandings were blinded, they wist not what to do, seeing themselves surprised and overtaken in a kind of fight whereunto they were least of all fitted. For as in close conflict hand to hand, where blows are dealt, where rapers are given and taken, enterchangeably choler kindleth outrage even so, when men are wounded aloof with light darts, & from whence they know not they wot not upon whom to run & at whom to make in that blind kind of theirs, but they run upon their own fellows without all reason at a venture like wild beasts galled with arrows sticking in their sides. Now they receive not a wound but it is seen by reason that they fight naked, and their bodies are fair like and white, as being never bare but in battell: by which means greater store of blood gush out of the wounds in their fleshy bodies. The gashes appear greater, and their white skin much more stained with black blood. But they pain not so much for broad & wide slashes (for otherwhiles when the skin is cut away & the wound rather broad than deep, they take more pride therein, & think they fight with greater honor.) Many it happen

A happen at any time, that an arrow head or a bullet sticking within the flesh all hidden, put them to pain and torment, notwithstanding the hurt be small in appearance, yet when they seek to pick out an arrow, and the head will not follow, then they take on and are stark mad for shame that so small a prick should plague them so, and be ready to kill them, inasmuch as they call themselves on the ground, and lie wallowing along every where. Others there be of them that run full upon to hand, where by the skirmishers killed and cut in pieces with their swords. These soldiers use to cover themselves with a shield of three foot long carrying in their right hand certain spears to use aloof, and wear by their side a Spanish sword. Now in case they come to hand fight, they shift their spear out of their right hand into the left, and take them to their swords. By this time there were but few of the Gauls left alive; who perceiving that the light armed skirmishers of the enemies were too good for them & seeing withall the ensignes of the legions to approach near unto them, took them to their heels on all hands, and began to flee again toward the camp: which now was full of fear and trouble, as where women and children and a multitude of feeble folk (not fit to bear arms) were crowded and thronged together. The Romans following the train of their victory, seized the hills abandoned by the enemies that were fled. About the same time L. Manlius and C. Helvius, having mounted so far as they could find way, traversing the sides of the hill, when they were come to an end, where they could see neither way nor path, they turned to that quarter of the hill which only afforded a way and both of them began to follow the Consul's trail, a pretty distance asunder, as if they had agreed beforehand to do so: and that which at first had been simply the best thing to be done, they were of necessity forced at last to put in execution. For in such difficulties and places of disadvantage, succour behind in a rearward have oftentimes served in right good stead: that if those in the vanguard should chance to be beaten back, they in the second place might receive and protect them, and also begin freshly a new fight. After that the foremost ensignes of the legions were come to those hills: which the light armed before had seized, the Consul commanded the soldiers to retire thither: which the light armed before shewed them withall where the bodies of the Gauls lay dead along all over the mountains. And if (quod he) the light armed skirmishers have made such a riddance of them, what is to be looked for at the hands of the legionary soldiers, armed all over in compleat harness? What will they do that carry the hearts of most noble warriors? Surely they must needs win the camp, into which the enemy is chased and driven by the light armed soldiers. Howbeit he commanded the light armed to go afore, who all the while that the legions retted themselves spent not the time in vain, but employed it in gathering together the darts and javelins that lay about the hills, to the end that they might have sufficient shot. Now the Romans marched forward and approached the camp, the Gauls likewise for their part, leaving left their defences would not be able to defend them, stood armed before their trench and rampier. But afterwards being overcharged with all sorts of darts, they were driven in the turning of an hand within their hold, (for the more they guards about the gates and entrance into the camp. Moreover, among the multitude which was driven into the hold, there was discharged at random a mighty number of darts: and that many of them were hurt thereby, appeared by their cry mingled with the shrieks of women and children. Now against them that warded the gates, and took up the avenues with the shields of women and children, soldiers in the forefront let fly their javelins. And albeit there were not wounded in their bodies, yet by reason that their shields & bucklers were pierced through, they were most of them enraged, some one within another, and stuck fast. Long they could not abide the violence of the Romans, inasmuch as before that the victors could enter into the camp, the Gauls fled forth at all the gates way, as those that were passable. No rocks so steep with downs, no cliffs so rough with crags, could stand in their way: and nothing feared they affront: their enemies only at their heels affrighted them. And therefore most of them either fell headlong down a mighty height and brake their necks, or else for very feebleness lost their breath, were windles, and ready to die. The Consul after he had taken their camp, would not suffer it to be ransacked, but commanded the soldiers every one to follow the chase hard: and whilst the enemies were thus affraid, to affright them to enter the camp, but sent them forth with L. Manlius, but the Consul would not suffer them to follow, when he had delivered the charge of keeping the prisoners, unto the military Tribunes of the army: for this reason and resolution he made, that the war was at a small end if in this tumultuous fight of theirs he might either kill or take prisoners a number of them. The hold his soldiers from the pillage of the camp, inasmuch as the booty and prizes were most unjustly dealt among them who were at no end of the skirmish. The Cavalry stood all this while so cloying the Gauls dispersed about the root of the mountains, made after them as well as their horses would mount against the hills: some they slew and others they took prisoners. The just number of those that were slain cannot easily be counted, because they fled far and near among the cranks and windings of the mountains, where they were killed in blind corners. Many of them besides, having engaged themselves to the crags and rocks that had no way forward, ward, tumbled down into the vallies of a monstrous depth underneath. Yea, and some hapned to be killed in the woods amidst the thickets & bushes. Clandius, who writeth of two battels fought upon the mount Olympus, reporteth that there died there forty thousand enemies. But Valerius Antias, who otherwise is wont to overreach and exceed in number hath recorded not above ten thousand. But without all question the prisoners amounted to forty thousand full, because they went with a train of all sorts and ages, more like men dislodging and removing out of one country unto another, than going to war. The Consul, after he had burned all the armour of his enemies in one heap, commanded his souldiers to bring forth the rest of the pillage and spoil into one place, and either sold and made money of that which was to come into the publick treasury of the City, or else parted it amongst the souldiers indifferently, with great regard, that every one should have a jull and even portion. Moreover, he commanded them all in open audience, and rewarded every one besides with gifts according to their several deserts. But above the rest, and with the general accord of all, he both praised, and also recompensed Attalus. For surely that young gentleman shewed not only singular valour and forwardness in all travels and dangers, but also a speciall modesty and rare sobriety.

There remained yet entire and whole the war with the Tectosages, against whom the Consul made an expedition, & upon the third day arrived at Ancyra, a noble City in those parts, from whence the enemies were little more than ten miles distant. During the time that he lay there encamped, there hapned a memorable act, performed by a captive Lady. Among many more prisoners, there fortun'd to be kept in ward, the wife of Ortiagon, a woman of surpassing beauty. The Centurion who had her person in safe custody, was lecherous and covetous withall, as many of these souldiers are. Her he solicited and tempted first to commit folly; but seeing her altogether unwilling, and that she abhorred to prostitute her self unto him, he did violence upon that body of hers, which fortune had made bond and thrall unto him. But afterwards to mollifie and assuage the indignity of this villany, he put the woman in good hope, and promised that she should return home again to her friends: may, he would not do all for pure love alone, and freely without ransom, for he bargained to have a certain ium of gold besides. And to the end forsooth that no person belonging to him might take knowledge thereof, he permitted her to send one of the prisoners whom he would her self as messenger to her friends and kinsfolk, and appointed a place near unto a river, whither the next night following should repair two and no more (of the said captive Ladies friends, with the gold above said) for to receive her at his hands. It fell out to L that among the rest of the captives committed to his guard, there was a bond slave of her own: this messenger at the shutting in of the evening the Centurion conducted without the corpi de guard. The morrow night after came accordingly to the place appointed, both the two friends above said of the gentlewoman, and also the Centurion himself with his prisoner, where they shewed the gold, amounting to the full ium of one Attick talent (according as it was agreed between them) and with that the woman spake unto them in her language and commanded them to draw their swords, and kill outright the Centurion as he was weighing the gold. Which done, she caused his head to be stricken off, and wrapped it her self within her garments, and so carried it home to her husband Ortiagon, who from Olympus had fled and escaped to his own house. But before that the clipped and embraced her husband, she threw down the Centurion his head at his feet. And when he wondered what mans head it was, and what act this might be for a woman's deed, she confessed to her husband the injury that her body had suffered, and likewise the revenge for the abuse of her chastity by force and violence: and (as it is reported) she maintained the honour of this matronlike act ever after even to her dying day, in all sanctimony of life and modest carriage of her self like a chaste dame.

Whiles the camp lay at Ancyra, the Orators of the Tectosages shewed themselves unto the Consul, requesting him not to dislodge and remove from thence before he had paried with their Lords and Princes: saying withall, that they would accept any conditions of peace whatsoever, rather than war. The time was let down, even then next morrow, and a place likewise appointed, as just in the mid way (as it could be guessed) between the camp and Ancyra. The Cos, thither came at the hour assigned, accompanied with a guard of five hundred horse; but perceiving no Gaul at all there, he returned into the camp. And thither repaired the same Orators unto him the second time, excusing the default, and saying that their Princes could not come in person by occasion of some scruple of conscience that arole the while: howbeit, the chief personages besides of the whole nation should appear by whom all matters might be composed as well as with themselves. The Consul made answer, that he likewise would send Attalus in his stead. So they came to this empowering from both parts. Attalus had three hundred men of arms about him for his guard; and certain conditions of peace were drawn and propounded: but so far much as they might not grow to any final conclusion in the absence of their chief Commanders, accorded it was that the day following the Consul and their Princes above said should meet in that place together. Now the drift of the Gauls in making these delays and trifling off the time, was this, that first they might gain some convenient space to transport over the river Hysall all that ever they had (which they would not hazard with their own persons, together with their wives and children) and afterwards to lay a train of an ambush for the Consul himself, who took small regard and was not provided for to prevent their villany intended under the colour of that conference. For that purpose, they chose a thousand horsemen out of all their cavalry, of especial valour and approved hardiness, for the execution of this treacherous design. And surely their fraud had taken effect, if fortune had not defended and maintained the law of nations, which to break and violate they had to those very quarters whereas the Gauls went out to purvey forage and fowles, were directed furer place for them, because they were to have the Consul guard also opposed for their defence against the enemy: howbeit, they let another corpi de guard of their own, consisting of 600 horsemen nearer to the camp. Now by reason that Attalus assured the Consul to certainly, that their Princes would come, and that the matter might be soon knit up and dispatched, he departed out of the camp with the same guard of horsemen as before, and when he had marched almost five miles forward, and was not far short of the place appointed, he discovered all of a sudden the Gauls riding in full gallop against them in most furious manner as enemies; whereupon he laid the fight. The first charge and shock he received right valiantly, and stepped not back one foot: but afterwards as the multitude pressed still upon him, he began to give ground and retreat, but to as he brake not the ranks of his troops. But in the end, when they found more danger in longer stay, than commodity and help in keeping their arrayes, they all at once turned their horie heads and great part of them had died for it, but that the forragers guard of 600 horie afore said came in to their aid, and being fresh & in heart, entered upon the fight that was given over by their wearied and discomfited companions: whereupon fortune quickly changed, and the fear turned from the forragers and souldiers came running out of the fields, and from all parts made head and affronted their brethren, who followed them in chase, and they themselves were already tired: few therefore lofs of their lives for violating of this their partly under the colour of truth and fidelity. The Roman passion of all their forces. But the Cos, employed two whole daies himself in viewing and recovering the situation and nature of the hill, because he would not be ignorant of anything rewards killed a sacrifice, he led forth his army divided into 4 battallions. Two of them were to mount up the midle of the hill, and the other two he let in the sides to flank the wings of the Gauls, strength of the enemies, made their main battel in the midle, consisting of 5000 men; and because there was no life of horse among those rough & uneven rocks, the cavalry alight on foot to the number of 10000, and those they put in the right wing. The Cappadocians with Arrianus, & the before in the mount Olympus marshalled his light armed for skirmish in the forefront of the vanguard, & gave order to have ready at hand as great store of darts & other sort of all sorts as he had before. When they approached one another, all things answered both of the one side & the other, like as in the former conflict: having that the courage of the victors increased in regard of their former success & the hearts of the enemies were much abated and dimed. For albeit themselves had own. And therefore as the beginning of the battell was unable, so the issue was likewise. For the Gauls battell was overpread & covered again as it were with a cloud of light shot. And not one of them durst run forth out of his range, for fear he should discover his whole body & lay it open to take all that came: and keeping still together as they did, the thicker they stood the safer mark were already of themselves troubled, and supposing that if he let forward & presented unto them the ensigns of the legions, they would immediately all of them flee, received the light armed loolegions. The Gauls affrighted with the fresh remembrance of the late defeat and overthrow of the Tolistobogians, carrying also about themselves the darts sticking in their bodies, weary besides with long standing afoot, and overcharged likewise with many a wound, could not abide so much ward their camp, but few of them recovered it, and got within the rampier and other defences. The greater number fled here and there on both hands, and all the way charged upon their backs and there was not one that followed one foot after. The Gauls in the wings stood to it longer, and flor of the Roman darts. The Consul, who could not possibly pluck those out of the camp that were in the wings to follow the enemies in chase still forward. These pursued them a certain space: howbeit in this fight (for in truth it was no fight at all) there were not above eight thousand word, warning them both to put up their swords, and lay arms aside, until they had sent their Embassadors to the Senate of Rome. So there were embassages addressed both from the one and the other to Rome. In likewise the banished Lacedæmonians joined their cause and embassy with the Achæans, Diophanes and Lycortas, both Megapolitans, were the chief in the embassy of the Achæans, who as they jarred and disagreed in the managing of State-affairs, so they accorded not but varied in the speeches that they delivered, Diophanes relied the decision of all matters unto the Senat, as who were best able to compose all controversies between the Achæans and Lacedæmonians. But Lycortas, instructed by Philopamen, required that the Achæans might do and execute whatsoever they had ordained, according to the covenant, and the conditions therein comprised; and that they would maintain their full liberty without abridging and empaing the same, according as they had received it at their hands. The nation of the Achæans in those daies was in great credit and reputation at Rome, howbeit the Senate thought it not good to make any change and alteration in the State of the Lacedæmonians. In conclusion, they returned such an intricate and doubtful answer, that both the Achæans might construe it as if they had permission and free liberty to do what they would with Lacedæmon, and the Lacedæmonians again took it, as though they had not so large a scope and absolute power allowed them, as to do their pleasure in every thing. But this authority and liberty whatsoever it was, more or less, the Achæans stretched beyond all measure and compais, and used it too proudly and insolently. Philopamen continued still in place of sovereign government, and levied a power to be ready in the beginning of the spring, and so encamped upon the frontiers of the Lacedæmonians. This done, he sent his Embassadors to demand the delivery of them into his hands, who were the authors of the revolt: promising withal, that if they would do so, their City should remain in peace without any molestation and they suffer and sustain no harm, before they had answered for themselves in open audience. All the rest for fear kept silence and said not a word, only they whom he had challenged by name, made offer of themselves to go, under safe conduct received from the Embassadors, and faithful promise that no violence should be done upon their persons, until they had pleaded their answer. Accompanied they were with divers noble personages of great mark and name, both as advocats unto them in their particular quarrels, and also in regard of the Common-weal, as far as their private cause any way touched and concerned it. Never had the Achæans before time brought the Lacedæmonian exiles with them into the confines of Lacedæmon, because they supposed that nothing might so much alienate and estrange the hearts of the whole City as that. But then the whole head, as it were, of the vanguard, were no other but those banished persons. And as the Lacedæmonians above said were coming, who should meet and affront them arranged in order of batel at the very gate of the camp, but they? At the first they welcomed them with chiding and railing, after that they fell to bitter words and brails, and their blood was up on both sides, inmuch as those of the banished crew who were of hottest spirit and sharpest metal, made no more ado but ran upon the Lacedæmonians: whereupon they called the Gods to witness, and cried to the Embassadors for protection: who together with the Pretor himself came between, voided the press, and safeguarded the persons of the Lacedæmonians, empeaching and staying some of their hands who were already about to bind them and make them sure. But the tumult still encreased, and the multitude was all up on a hurry. The Achæans ran first to see only what the matter was, and to be lookers on. But afterwards, when the exiles began with a loud voice to cry out, and report what wrongs and injuries they had sustained, beseeching them of their help and avouching with all right confidently, that if they let slip this opportunity, they should never have the like again, alledging moreover, that the league first made in the Capitol, after renewed at Olympia, and last of all confirmed by a sacred oath in the Castle of Athens, had been broken and disannulled by them, and therefore the guilty and culpable parties were to be punished accordingly, before they entered into any bond of new accord. At these words the multitude was incensed, and by occasion of one mans voyce, who cried to strike and knock them down, fell to flinging stones at them. And by this means seventeen of them, who during the garboil chanced to be tied in bonds, were floned to death. The rest, to the number of six and thirty, were the next morrow apprehended, whom the Pretor had shielded and protected from violence, not for any desire he had to save their lives, but because he would not have them miscarry and perish before they were heard. These were preferred and exposed as a prey to the unruly and angry multitude: and when they had made some small speech unto them, from which they turned away their ears, they were all condemned and delivered over to be led to execution. When the Lacedæmonians were once put in this fear, then they were commanded, Imprimis, To demolish and break down their walls. Item, That all forrain auxiliary souldiers, who were waged and served for pay under the tyrants, should avoid out of the Laconian country. Item, That all the slaves whom those tyrants had set free (and of such there was a great number) should depart before a certain day: and that it might be lawful for the Achæans to attach the bodies, to sell and carry away as many as staid and remained behind. Item, That they should abolish the laws, ordinances and customs of Lycurgus, and frame themselves to live after the fashions and manners of the Achæans, for so they should be incorporate into one civil body, and better accord and sort together in all things. They condescended to none of all these conditions more willingly and sooner, than to the raising of their walls, and nothing troubled them so much and vexed their heart, as the restoring of the banished persons. Howbeit there passed an act at Tegæa for their restitution in a general Council of all the Achæans there held.

A In which assembly, upon a report and mention made, that the mercenary strangers above specified, and the new enrolled Lacedæmonians (called zefcripti (for so they termed them, who by the tyrants were enfranchised and endued with freedom) had abandoned the City, and were depicted sundry waies into the country, it was thought good before the army was dissolved and cast, that the Pretor should go with a company lightly armed and appointed to lay hold upon all that sort of people, and make sale of them, as of a prize and booty gained from the enemies. Many of them were apprehended and sold. And with the money raised of them, that perchance Callicyrtas at Megalopolis, which had been ruined by the Lacedæmonians, was by the permission of the Achæans rectified. Likewise the territory of Helbina, which the Lacedæmonian tyrants unjustly held in possession, was laid again to that City, according to an old decree of the Achæans, which was made during the reign of King Philop, son of Ambrac. The City of the Lacedæmonians by this means much enfeebled, continued a long time in subjection and thralldom under the Achæans, but their State received damage by no one thing to much, as by the abolishing of the discipline of Lycurgus, to which they had been used and accustomed for the space of 700 years.

Prefently after the holding of this Diet, wherein the Achæans and Lacedæmonians debated their causes before the Consul, M. Fulvius repaired to Rome (for that the year was almost expired) against the solemn election of new Magistrats: wherein he created for Consuls, M. Valerius Messalla, and C. Livius Salinator, and gave the repulse to M. Annius Lepidus his enemy, who that year made suit also to be Consul. This done, there were Pretors also chosen, to wit, Q. Marcius Philippus, M. Claudius Marcellus, C. Stertinius, C. Catinus, P. Claudius Pulcher, and Lu. Manlius Acidinus. When this election was ended, it was thought expedient that M. Fulvius should return into his former Province to the army there: and not only he, but his colleague also Cn. Manlius, had their commission revived, and they continued in government another year. The same year according to the direction of the Decemvirs, there was brought into the Temple of Hercules the statue of the same God: and within the Capitol were set up by Cn. Cornelius six steeds in gold drawing a chariot with this inscription, That he being Consul gave that present, Alfo P. Claudius and S. Sulpicius Galba, Ediles Cursile, hung up twelve broken shields, made of the fines that certain corn-hoorders paid, for hoarding up and keeping in their grain. Moreover Q. Fulvius Flaccus an Edile of the Commons, erected two golden images (sailed by the money that one guilty person was condemned in (for they commenced their actions severally by themselves.)

As for A. Cæcilius his companion, he condemned none. The Roman great games were set forth all throughout, thrice: and the Plebeian plaiex exhibited likewise full and whole five times. After this, M. Valerius Messalla and C. Livius Salinator, entered their Consulship upon the 15. day of March, and proposed before the Senat as concerning the affairs of the State, touching their Provinces also, and the armies. As for Ætolia and Asia, there was no change at all. The Consul, by a decree of the Senat had the charge, one of Pisæ together with the Ligurians: and the other of Gaul: and they were commanded either to agree between themselves, or to call lots for their Provinces. They were enjoined also to levy new armies, and each of them to recruit two legions, and either of them to charge the allies of the Latine Nation with 15000 foot, and 1200 horsemen. Unto Messalla fell the government of Liguria: and to Salinator of Gaul. After this, the Pretors likewise cast lots for their Provinces: the jurisdiction within Rome of citizens was allotted to M. Claudius, and of forainers to P. Claudius. Sicily to Q. Marcius, Sardinia to C. Stertinius, high Spain to L. Manlius, and the low to C. Catinus. As for the armies, ordained it was, that the legions under the conduct of C. Lælius should be withdrawn out of Gaul, and made over to M. Tuccius the Propretor for to serve in the Brutians country. Item, That the forces which were in Sicily should be discharged: and that M. Sempromius the Vice-pretor there, should bring from thence the fleet to Rome. Ordained likewise it was, that either of the Provinces of Spain should have one legion, which at that time served there: and that both the Pretors should for supply levy of the allies three thousand foot, and two hundred horsemen apiece, and transport the same over with them. Now before that these new Governors went to their Provinces, by order from the whole college and society of the Decemvirs, there was published a general procession and supplication to be holden for 3 daies in all the quarterours, or cross streets of the City: for that in the day time between the third hour and the fourth, there arose a general darkness which continued almost all that while. Moreover, a Novendial sacrifice was published to be celebrated for 9 daies together, because on the Aventine hill it had rained bones.

The Campains, when as the Censors (by verue of an act of Senate which passed the former year) compelled them to be enrolled at Rome, (for aforesaid they knew not where to be enrolled) made petition now that they might contract marriages and take Roman citizens to their wives: and that whosoever had wedded any of them before, might keep them still: and what children forever they had born before that day, should be reputed legitimate and their rightful heirs. Both suits were granted. As concerning the free burgeses of Formia, Fundis, and Arpinum, C. Valerius Toppo a Tribune of the Com, preferred a bill, that they might be privileged to give their voices in Rome: for before that time, citizens in deed they were of Rome, (and that was all) for liberty of suffrages they had none. This bill was crossed and nipped by four other Tribunes, because it was propounded without the warrant and approbation of the Senate. But being afterwards better advised and enformed, that it appertained to the people and not to the Senate to give their voices where it pleased them, they gave over their enterprise, and opposed themselves no more to hinder the proceeding thereof. So it passed; and enacted it was. That the Formians and Fundans should give their voices in the tribe Amyliæ; and the Arpinat in Cornelios in these tribes then first and never before, were they enrolled by an act of the same Valerius. M. Claudius Marcellus the Centor took a survey of the City, and by lot obtained the pre-eminence thereof before his colleague T. Quintus. In which there were numbered 258;08 polls of Roman citizens. This review being accomplished, the Consul took their journeys into their several provinces.

During that winter season whilst these things thus passed at Rome, there returned Embassadors from all States, Cities and Nations which inhabit on this side Taurus, unto Cn. Manlius first Consul and afterwards Pro-consul, whilst he kept his winter in Asia. And as the victory achieved over Antiochus was more honorable and glorious to the Romans, than that over the Gauls; so the conquest of the Gaul was more joyous and pleasing to the Roman allies, than that of Antiochus. For the servitude in which the King held them was more tolerable, than the cruelty of these savage and inhumane barbarians; and the doubtful fear and fright wherein they stood every day; as not knowing how far forth they would proceed, carried lo (as it were) in a tempest; and wait and spoil them clean. And therefore as nations who by the defeat of Antiochus recovered liberty, and by the subduing of the Gauls enjoyed peace; they presented themselves not only to give thanks and shew their contentment in that behalf, but also brought with them certain coronets of gold, every one according to their ability. Likewise there came Embassadors from Antiochus, as also from the very Gauls, to have conditions of peace ministered unto them: yea, and from Arriaratus King of the Cappadocians, who craved pardon, and offered to buy out his treispass for money, in that he had given aid unto Antiochus; and fined he was to pay 200 talents of silver. K The Gauls had this answer returned unto them. That K. Eumenes when he came should tender unto them articles of peace. The embassages of the other states and cities were dismissed with gracious answer, and went away better pleased and contented, than they were at their coming. The Embassadors of Antiochus were commanded to bring money into Pamphylia and corn likewise according to the covenant made with L. Scipio: for thither the Consul purposed himself to come with his army. After this, having taken a review and survey of his forces, he set forward in the beginning of spring, and within eight daies arrived at Apamea. There he sojourned in camp for three daies: from thence he removed, and at the third daies end came to Pamphylia, whither he had given order to the Kings Embassadors to convey their money and corn. There he received 1500 talents of silver which were transported unto Apamea. The corn was divided in the army. L From thence he marched to Perga, which was the only country in those parts held with a garrison. When he approached the Captain of the garrison met him on the way requesting 30 daies space in which time he might know the pleasure of K. Antiochus as touching the rendering of that City. The time was granted and within that day the garrison quit the place and departed. From Perga he sent his brother L. Manlius with 400 footsiders to Oraanda for to demand the rest of the money which by promise was due: and himself because he was advertised that K. Eumenes and the deputies or commissioners were come from Rome to Ephesus, returned with his army also to Ephesus, and commanded the Embassador of Antiochus to follow him thither. There, by the advice of the ten commissioners, a final league was concluded, and comprised in these or such like terms: There shall be amity and friendship between King Antiochus and the people of Rome under these conditions ensuing. Imprimis. The King shall not suffer to pass through any part of his realm, or their countries that are under his dominion any army that intendeth to make war against the people of Rome or their allies: nor aid them with victuals or any other succour whatsoever. Item. The Romans and their allies shall do the like by Antiochus, and all those that are under his subjection. Item. It shall not be lawful for Antiochus either to make war with those that inhabit the Lands, or to pass over into Europe. Item. He shall quit all Cities, Lands, Villages, and Fortresses on this side the mountain Taurus unto the River Eufrates; and moreover from the foot and valley under the said hill, unto that ridge thereof which bendeth toward Lycania. Item. Out of those Towns, territories and Castles which he is to void, he shall carry away no armour: and if he have conveyed from thence any already, he shall duly restore the same to every place accordingly. Item. N He shall receive neither soldier nor any other person out of the Kingdom of Eumenes. Item. If any citizens belonging to those Cities which are divided and cut off from his realm, chance to remain now with him they shall remain all to Apamea within a certain day. Item. As many as appertain to the Kingdom of Antiochus, and are now with the Romans or their allies, may depart home or tarry still at their pleasure. Item. All slaves, whether they be fugitives or taken captive in war; likewise all other persons free of condition before, and afterwards either taken prisoners or revolted, he shall deliver again to the Romans and their allies. Item. He shall make delivery of all his Elephants, and shall provide himself of no more hereafter. Item. He shall yield up all his Gallies of war, with the tackling to them belonging: neither shall he keep above ten small vessels; and none of them shall have more than thirty oars to guide and row them; nor so much as one Gallie with a single bank of oars to serve in any war that himself shall first begin. Item. He shall not sail within the remotest ports of Calycadum and Sarpedon, unless haply there be some ship that bringeth money, Embassadors, or hostages. Item. It shall not be lawful for King Antiochus to levy and wage any soldiers out of those nations which are subject to the people of Rome: no, nor to entertain so much as volunteers from thence. Item. What houses and edifices belonging to the Rhodians and their allies, are now within the precincts of the realm of Antiochus, shall return to the

A the said Rhodians and their afforians, in as good estate and tenor as they were before the war began. And if any money or debt be to them due, they may demand and recover the same. Item. If ought have been taken from them, they shall have good law and right to search, own, demand, and challenge it again. Item. If any of those Cities which ought to be redreid, be held by those unto whom Antiochus hath committed them, he shall withdraw the garrisons from thence, and take order that they be surrendered accordingly. Item. He shall pay within twelve years by even portions, 12000 Attick talents of good and lawful silver: provided, that every talent weigh no less than eighty pound after Roman poise; besides 540000 modii of wheat. Item. He shall pay unto King Eumenes 350 talents within five years; and for corn according to the rate and proportion 127 talents. Item. He shall send unto the Romans 20 hostages, and change them for others every three years: provided, that they be not under 18 years of age, nor above 45. Item. If any allies of the people of Rome, begin of their own motion to make war upon King Antiochus, it shall be lawful for him to revenge himself, and use forcible means to withstand their violence; yet so, as he hold no City in right of war, nor receive any into amity: and all controversies which shall arise between them, shall be decided by law and justice; or if both parties be so pleased they shall trye the issue by force of arms. Item. It was comprised also within the covenants of this accord, that he should deliver into the Romans hands, Amibitis the Cathaginian, Thas the Aetolian, Mnasimachus the Acarnanian, Eubolus likewise and Philo the Chalcidians. Finally, if ought hereafter hapned to be added moreover, or changed otherwise, the same in no case to prejudice any thing contained within the covenants aforesaid. To this accord the Consul swore: and to receive the Kings oath likewise there went unto him Q. Minucius Thermes and L. Manlius, he who fortuneed at that time to return from the Oradians. And the Consul wrote his letters to Q. Fab. Labeo Admiral of the fleet, presently to come to Patara, and what shipssoever of the Kings were there, to tow them in pieces, and make a light fire of them. So he departed from Ephesus, and either brake into fitters or burnt 50 covered ships belonging to the King. In the same voyage and exploit he surprized and won T. Lucius, by reason that the Townsmen were so affrighted at the suddain coming of the fleet. Then forthwith he departed out of Icaria, and having given order to those that were left behind at Ephesus to follow after, he crossed the Seas (between the Islands) over into Greece. After he had sojourned some few daies at Athens, until the ships from Ephesus were entered into the harbor of Pyraeus: from thence he brought back his whole armada to Italy. Cn. Manlius having received (among other things which were to be yielded up of Antiochus) the Elephants also, and bestowed them all freely upon Eumenes, gave audience to the controversies of many Cities and States, amongst whom (during these changes and alterations) there arose sundry troubles and much variance. And Arriaratus the King, who by the means and mediation of Eumenes (unto whom about that time he had affianed his daughter in marriage) was discharged and had acquittance for the one moiety of the money imposed upon him, entered into amity with the people of Rome. When the differences of the Cities aforesaid were debated and known, the ten Commissioners set down an order between them, respectively to their condition. To as many as had been tributaries to King Antiochus, and yet sided with the people of Rome in affection, they granted franchise and immunity: but as many as took part with Antiochus, or were tributaries unto King Antiochus, those were commanded to pay their customs and duties to King Eumenes. Moreover, they freed and exempted from all task and tallage (expressly by name) the Colophonians inhabiting Natium together with the Cymceans and the Milesians. Unto the Clazomenians (over and besides the same freedom) they gave the Island Drimusa. To the Miceians also the territory called Sacer: to the Ilians, they annexed Rheteum and Gerythius not to much for any fresh and late deserts, as in memorial of their ancient beginning and foundation: which was the cause also that they let Dardanius free. Semblably the Chians, Smyrneans, and Erythreans, for their singular loyalty and devoir which they shewed in that war they not only indowed with fair lands and territories, but also graced with all kind of honor and reputation above the rest. Moreover, the Phocceans had both their own lands restored unto them which they enjoyed before the war, and also liberty to live under their ancient laws. As for the Rhodians, they had those things now confirmed and established unto them, which by a former decree were granted: and to better their estate, Lycia and Caria were bestowed upon them, as far as the River Maender, all save the City Telmessus. Unto the dominion of King Eumenes, they laid Chersifusus in Europe; and Lysimachia, with all the Castles, Villages, and Lands thereto belonging, in as large terms and ample manner as Antiochus held the same: also within Asia, the one and the other Phrygia, as well that which consisteth upon Hellaspontus, as the other which they call the Greater. Moreover, they restored unto him Mysia, which King Prusias had taken from him: over and besides, Lycania, Mylia, and Lydia: together with these Cities by special name. Tralles, Ephesus, and Telmessus. As touching Pamphylia, some debate there was between the Agents of Eumenes and the Embassadors of Antiochus, because one part thereof is situate on this side the mount Taurus, and the other lyeth beyond. The decision of this controversy was wholly referred to the arbitrement of the Senat. Manlius having set down these covenants and decrees, departed with the ten Legates and all his army toward Hellaspontus: and when he had caused the Princes of the Gauls thither to repair before him, he declared unto them in what terms, and under what conditions they should entertain peace with Eumenes: & therewith he gave them warning, to leave their manner of roving and roving in hostile wise by force of arms, and to contain themselves within the precincts and bounds of their own territories. After this, having gathered into one place all the vessels from the sea coasts, together with the entire fleet of King Eumenes, which by his brother Aschepus was brought from Elea, he transported all his forces into Europe. From whence he marched through Choroneus by short & easy journeys, because his army was heavily charged with prizes and booties of all sorts; and encamped at Lymnachia, purposing there to rest a while, to the end that his travelling beasts of draught and carriage, might be fresh and in good heart to pass through Thracia, which was a voyage and journey commonly feared and abhorred. The same day that he dislodged from Lymnachia, he came to the River which they call Melas, and from thence the next day to Cypseli. When they were past Cypseli, they had for ten miles almost no other way, but through wild woods, narrow streights, and those rough withal and uneven underfoot. For the difficult, way of which passage, the army was divided into two parts. The one he commanded to march before, the other to come behind in the rearward a great distance after, and in the midst between, he belted the carriages with bag and baggage, and amongst them were waggons and wains, laden with the publick treasure, and other pillage of great price. As he thus marched through the freight pass, there were about 10000 and not above, raised out of four nations of Asia, to wit, the Attians, Carians, Madaurenes, and Celeres, who beset the streights to debar them of passage. It was supposed that King Philip of Macedony his hand was herein, and that they entred not into this action without his privacy and fraudulent practise: who as he knew that the Romans could return no other way but by Thracia, so he was aware and witt well enough what a mass of money they carried with them. The Roman General himself was in the vanguard, careful only and troubled about the difficulty of the way. All this while the Thracians sat still and stirred not, until the armed soldiers were passed by. But when they perceived once, that the vanguard was gotten out of the streights, and that the rearward was far enough behind, they fell in hand with the packs and coffers of the carriages; and after they had killed the guards, some of them ranfacked and rifled that which was in the waggons, others led away the pack horses and other lumpier beasts with their load and burden on their backs. Hereupon arose a cry and alarm, and was first heard of those that followed, but afterwards of them also in the forward & so from both ends they ran to the midst, and at one time in diverse places, skirmished without all order confusedly. The Thracians heavily charged and encumbered with pillage, and most of them without any weapon at all, because they might have the use of their hands more nimble and agile to snatch & catch unto them their prizes, were by this means more exposed to receive hurt, and soon killed. The Romans again were much distressed and annoyed through the disadvantage of the ground and the waies; which the barbarous people were well enough acquainted with, and out of them would issue forth to encounter, and otherwhiles lurk within hollow blind caves, and not be seen. The very packs likewise and the waggons, standing and lying unto wardly in the way, sometime of one, and sometime of other (as it happened) troubled and hindered them much in their fight. So as he in one place lay the thief dead, there in another the true man that pursued him. And according as the plot of ground was good or bad, as well for the one or less, so the skirmish and fight was variable: and in one word, of both sides many a man lay in the dust and lost his life. By which time the night approached, and the Thracians departed out of the conflict, not so much to avoid wounds and for fear of death, as for that they had piped themselves sufficiently of prizes. The Roman vanguard encamped without the fortress in the open ground about the Temple of Bendis. The rearward remained still behind in the midst of the woods to guard their carriage fortified within a double pallisado off strong stakes. The morrow after, when they had well discovered by their spies the way before them, they joined themselves with the vanguard. In this battle (over and besides a great part of their pillage lost, and a number of camp-followers and lackies slain, with some soldiers also, for that there was skirmishing every where throughout the chafe) there died Q. Minutius Thermus; and a right great loss there was of him, for he was a man of much valour and execution. That day the army marched as far as to the River Hebrus. From whence they passed through the confines of the Anians, near unto the Temple of Apollo whom the inhabitants name Zerynthius. And there they met with another freight passage about a place called Tempyra, as rough and cumbersome under foot as the former. But forasmuch as there were no woods about it, it yielded no good place for ambushes. Howbeit the Thracians (a people likewise of Thrace) assembled together, hoping also to light upon the like booty. But by reason that the vallies lay naked and open, so as if any be at the narrow waies they might be discovered a far off, the Romans were less afraid and troubled. For, say that they were to fight in some place of disadvantage, yet they might arrange themselves in battle array in open field, and join in close fight hand to hand. Being therefore embattled in Squadrons thick and strong they charged the enemy with a great shout and cry, and the first shock forced them to retreat and lose ground, and afterwards to turn back and flee. And in the rout they were beaten down and killed; for even their own streights which they seized for their vantage, empeached and hindered themselves. The Romans having gotten the victory, encamped near a village of the Maronites, called Sare. The next day they marched through the champain open country Priniticus, where they joyned three daies to take in corn, partly from the fields of the Maronites, which willingly of themselves they conferred upon them, and partly out of their own ships, which followed after, well furnished with all kind of provision. From this place they made but one daies journey to Apollonia, and so passing through the territory

A of the Abderites, they came to Nepes. All this way they journeyed peaceably through the Colonies of the Greeks. But the rest behind, it it were not dangerous unto them for any hostility, yet unspecified still it was, all the whies that they passed night and day through the midst of the Thracians, until at length they came into Macedony. The same army conducted sometime before by Scipio that very way, found the Thracians more gentle and tractable, for no other cause, but that they had less store of pillage and booty with them to set their teeth on water and fingers on itching. And yet even then a so (as Claudius writeth) there were fifteen thousand Thracians that encountered Numius the Numidian, as he marched before the vanguard to discover the coasts; and he saith, that he had in his company four hundred Numidian horsemen, and some few Elephants: also that his son, with aneivet wing of a hundred and fifty horse, brake through the midst of the enemies, who also within a while after. (When his father Numius having placed the Elephants in the midst, and the Horsemen in the flanks, joined in battle with his enemies, charged them upon their backs, and put them in great fear) by means of which (both and tempest (as it were) of the Cavalry, they never came so far, as to deal with the battle of the footmen. Cn. Manlius led his army through Macedony into Thessaly, and marching on by the way of Epirus, arrived at Apollonia, where he abode all winter. For he made not to fight a matter of winter sailing, that he durst take the Sea, and hazard the passage at that time of the year. The year almost expired, M. Fulvius the Consul returned out of Liguria to Rome: for the creation of new Magistrates, having achieved no less memorable exploit in his Province during the time of his government, as might have yeilded any colourable reason of his long stay, in that he came more tardy (than the usual manner was) to the assembly for an election of Consuls: (for holden it was upon the 12 calends of March) wherein were created, M. Aemilius L. papius and C. Flaminius. The next day after these Pretors were elected; namely, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Ser. Sulpicius Galba, Q. Terentius Culla, L. Terentius M. Jullianus, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and M. Ummidius Crassipes. After the election of Magistrates the Consuls proposed to the Senat as touching the Province, and governments of the Pretors. And the LL decreed that two of them should remain at Rome, 200000 miltiter laws and execute justice: other two should be employed out of Italy, in Sicily and Sardinia: two in Italy to wit, at Tarentum and in Gaul. Immediately before they entred into office they were enjoined to call tois: and Ser. Sulpicius had the jurisdiction of the citizens, and Q. Terentius of strangers and aliens: L. Terentius took the charge of Sicily, Q. Fulvius of Sardinia, Ap. Claudius D was to govern Tarentum, and M. Fulvius to rule Gallia. It fortuned the same year that L. Aemilius Myrrinus and L. Manlius were delivered to the Carthaginian Embassadors, by the hands of the Fœdial herads at the commandment of M. Claudius Pretor of the City for the time being and transported over to Carthage, for that the voice and speech went, that they had beaten the said Embassadors. A bruit and rumour there was of a great war begun in Liguria; which encreased every day more than other. Whereupon the Senat ordained to both the new Consuls the Province of Liguria: that day on which they propounded unto the Senat to consult about the Provinces and the affairs of the Common-weal, but Lepidus the Consul opposed himself against this their act and ordinance alleging, That it was a shameful indignity, that both the Consuls should be shut up, and employed within the vallies of Liguria; whereas for two years already M. Fulvius and Cn. E Manlius had reigned like Kings, the one in Europe, the other in Asia, in stead of Philop and Antiochus. And if (qd. he) it be the pleasure of the Senat that there should be armies maintained in those parts more meet, it wot it were, that Consuls should have the command & conduct thereof: of than those privat persons. As for them, they range about those nations, terrifying them with threats of war against whom there hath been none proclaimed: making merchandise and selling peace among them for sums of money. Now it is requisite and needful to keep two armies for the government and defence of those Provinces, like as M. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius Consuls, succeeded M. Aedius and L. Scipio Consuls: so C. Lælius and M. P. Perperna the Consuls ought to have entered in place of Fulvius and Manlius. At least while now, when the Ætolian war is finished and brought to an end, Asia recovered and conquered from Antiochus, and the Gauls vanquished F subdued either ought Consuls to be sent unto their armies, or else the legions to be brought back from thence, and at length delivered to the Common-weal. The Senat notwithstanding that they gave him the hearing, persisted still in their resolution, that both Consuls should be employed in the Province of Liguria. Yet thought good it was, that Manlius and Fulvius should leave their Provinces, withdraw their forces from thence, and return to Rome. An old grudge there was and a rankred enmity between the said M. Fulvius, and M. Aemilius the Consul: and among other matters of old contentment, Aemilius gave out, that by the means of Fulvius, himself was created Consul two years later than otherwise he should have been. And therefore to work him delight and make him odious to the World, he caused the Embassadors of Ambracia (whom he had suborned and set on for to lay matters to his charge) to enter into the Senat-house. Thelie being in place complained that M. Fulvius had waived upon them at what time as they were in need performed all that other Consuls before had imposed upon them and were also read in ill duty and allegiance to do the same unto him. First out lands and territories lay that they were pitifully spoiled and wasted: then were we terrified with the facking of our City, and the threat with the killing of our people, that for very fear we were forced to shut our gates. Afterward we were be captured and assaulted and against us all kinds of hostility practised, word by fire, by ruining and ranfacking our City. Our wives, our children, have been led

"and haled into captivity and bondage; our goods violently taken from us (and that which a"bove all went nearest to our heart) our Temples throughout the whole City deploiled and "robbed of their good ornaments: the images of our Gods, and finally our Gods themselves
 "plucked out of their shrines and places, and so carried away; yea, the very walls and pillars left "bare and naked, so as the Ambracians have no Gods remaining amongst them to adore, and to "whom they might make their prayers and supplications. As they poured out their complaints, the Consul of a mind to aggravate and heap more matter upon his adversary, ceased not to propounto them many interrogatories (as it was completed between them before) and drew them out to speak many things, as if with their good will they would not have uttered them. When the rest of the LL. were moved herewith, then the other Consul C. Flaminius undertook the apologie and defence of M. Fulvius, saying, "That the Ambracians trod in an old beaten way, and did no "otherwise than some before them had done. For even so was M. Marcellus accused by the Syracufians, so was Q. Fulvius charged by the Capuans. And why by the same means suffered they "not T. Quintus to be charged by King Philip, M. Atilius and L. Scipio by Antiochus Cn. Manlius
 "by the Gauls, and the same Fulvius himself by the Aetolians and people of Cephalonia? That "Ambracia was assaulted, battered, and forced in the end; that images and ornaments were "taken from thence; that other acts were done and committed, which usually follow upon the "winning of Towns, think ye my LL. that either I in the behalf of Fulvius will deny, or Fulvius "himself will disavow? who, in regard of these worthy exploits and noble acts, is minded to de"mand at your hands the honor of a Triumph, who purpoiseth to carry before his triumphant "chariot the portraiture of Ambracia as it was taken, the images which they accuse him to have "carried away and other spoils of that City; yea, and to let them upon the polls of his house for a "memorial to posterity? No reason there is that the Ambracians should sever themselves from "the Aetolians, and do more than they, for their sake and condition is all one. And therefore let "my colleague shew his rage and malice, and bewray a festered enmity in some other cause: or "if he will needs follow and pursue this forward, let him intertain and keep still his Ambracians "unto the coming of M. Fulvius. And for mine own part, I will suffer no act to pass either of the "Ambracians or the Aetolians so long as M. Fulvius is absent. Emilius accused his enemy for ha"ving a crafty head of his own, and for his subtle fetches: as being notorious and well known to all men for no better saying, that full cunningly he would trifle out the time, and make delays all the year long: that he might not come to Rome so long as his adversary was Consul. Thus in this debate between the two Consuls two dayes were spent and nothing else done. And it appeared evidently, that so long as Flaminius was in place and preience, nothing could be concluded and determined. Whereupon a time was spied out when Flaminius chanced to be sick, and by that occasion was away. Then upon a motion made by Emilius there passed an act of the Senat, That the Ambracians should have all their goods restored unto them again; that they should enjoy their freedom and franchises, and live under their own Laws: and finally might take what customs, toll and imposts they would for portage, as well by Land as Sea: provided always that the Romans, and their allies the Latins, should be exempted and free therefrom. As for the images and other ornaments which they complained were taken out of their sacred Temples, the Senat ordained that when M. Fulvius was returned to Rome, the college of the Pontifics should have the hearing and deciding thereof, and look what they awarded and set down, it should stand and be performed accordingly. And the Consul not content with all this, took the vantage when there were but few Senators in the house, and procured an other act of Senat in this form. That they judged Ambracia not to be reputed a City forced by assault. This done, there was by virtue of an order from the Decemvirs a solemn supplication holden three dayes for the health of the people, in regard of a grievous pestilence that deploiled both City and Countrey. After that the Latine feasts and holy-dayes were celebrated. When the Consuls had accomplished these devotions, and rid their consciences of scruple, and withal made a full and compleat levy to furnish legions (for both of them were desirous to have new souldiers) they departed into their Provinces, and called all the old.

After the Consuls were set forward on their journey, the Pro-consul Cn. Manlius returned home to Rome. For whose sake the Pretor Servius Sulpicius assembled the Senat in the Temple of Belloin: Where after relation made of his deeds achieved, he demanded that in consideration thereof, due honor and thanksgiving should be rendered to the immortal Gods, and withal, that himself might ride triumphant into the City. The most part of the Legats and Commissioners, who had been with him gainst and denied the same, and above all the rest L. Furius Purpurio, and L. Emilius Paulus, who stepped forth, and informed against him in these terms: "That they had "been sent in commission to assist Cn. Manlius, for the making of a peace with Antiochus, and fi"nishing of that accord and those covenants and conditions, which were commended and begun "between him and L. Scipio. Yet Cn. Manlius, say they, endeavoured all that ever he could to trou"ble that peace yea, and to have surprised and intrapped Antiochus by trains of ambush. If he had "ever come in his way, or within his reach, But the King being a ware of the Consul's fraud and "deceit, albeit there was made great heats many a time to have caught him by colour of parley
 "and conference, yet avoided evensome not only to have speech and communication with him,
 "but also to come within his sight. And when Manlius would needs have passed over Tauris,
 "hardly and with much ado could he be kept back, notwithstanding all the commissioners prayed
 "and

A "and besought him to stay, and not to hazard himself and incur the danger of a notable loss and "overthrow, fore-told by the verities and prophecies of Sisylla to light upon them that would pass
 "beyond the bounds limited by the fatal destinies. All this notwithstanding he advanced forward "and approached with his army, yea, and encamped near the very pitch and top of the mountain, "where all the water that falleth from above, runneth contrary ways into divers Seas. And "when he could find no quarrel there for which he might make war (became the Kings people "and subjects were still at quiet) he turned the army about to the Gallogrecs, against which "nation there was no war intended either by warrant and authority from Senat, or by grant and "commission from the people. And what man was ever so hardy and bold, as to war upon his "own head? The wars against Antiochus, Philip, Amibal, and the Carthaginians are most re"membered in each mans remembrance: and of all these the Senat was consulted with, and the people "granted their ordinance. Embassadors many a time and often were addressed before: restitution and "amends were by order demanded: and last of all, heralds were sent, solemnly to excommunicate and "proclaim war. Now tell me, Cn. Manlius, which of all these things were done? that we may call
 "this by the name of a publick war, allowed by the State of the people of Rome, and not rather a "privat brigandage and robbery of your own? But contented you your self with this, and did you
 "no more? marched you directly forward, and took you nothing but that which was in your "way; leading your army against those only whom you took to be your enemies? or rather at "all turnings and windings, nay, at every forked high way leading on both hands, when you "were at a stand, followed not you like a mercenary and wagger Consul unto Attalus (King E"menes his brother) with the Roman army, what hand soever he turned and marched? There "was not a crank and nook but you visited; there was not a corner that you left unsearched, in all
 "Pisidia, Lycania, and Phrygia. There was not a tyrant, Prince, nor Potentate: there was not a Lord "of any borough or cattle, how far soever out of the way, but you had a laying to them to pill and "poll them, and to pick pence out of their purses. For what business had you with the Orandi-
 "ans? What had you to do with other nations, as innocent and guiltless as they? Now as con"cerning the war, (in regard whereof you demand a triumph) in what sort managed you it?
 "Fought you a battail either in place commodious, or time convenient? Surely, I must needs say,
 "great reason you have and good cause, to require that honor and praise be given to the immor-
 "tal Gods: first for that their gracious will and pleasure was that the army should not smart
 "for the temerity and rashness of their chieftainer, warring as he did against the law of nations:
 "then in that they presented unto us, not men indeed for enemies, but very beasts and no better.
 "For ye must not think that it is the name only of the Gallogrecs, which is mingled and com"pounded: for long time before, both their bodies and minds have been mixed and corrupted,
 "and the men themselves battard and degenerate from their first nature. Had they been the same
 "Gauls with whom we have fought a thousand times in Troy, and with doubtful issue, and lost as "much as we won, and every foot received as good as we brought, think ye there would have re"turned ode messenger from thence, to bring us news, for any good at least, while that our Gene"ral there did? Twice he came to conflict with them: twice he encountered them in place of dis"advantage: mounting with his army against the hill, and ranged in the bottom of the valley, "even under the enemies feet: in such sort, that if they had lacked no darts against us from the "higher ground, but only come upon us with their naked and disarmed bodies they had been able "to have overcome us and gone over our bellies. And what hapned hereupon? God-amercy the "good fortune of the people of Rome: we may thank (I say) the great and terrible name of the "Romans. Their fresh renown of the late ruins and overthrow of Amibal Philip and Antiochus, "amazed and astonished (as one would say) their men with their so corpulent and mighty bod"ies; with slings and arrow-shot only were they discomfited and put to flight, to alighted "were they. There was not a word once bloudied in all this Gauls war: at the first twang of the "bow and ringing of the arrow, they fled away, like swarms of bees with ringing of balsons. And "yet believe me, even we the time and no other (as if fortune would admonish and shew what "had become of us if we had affronted an enemy indeed) in our return, when we returned to "light upon certain petty robbers and thieves of Thrace, were soundly beaten, killed, and put to "flight, and spoiled and well stripped of our bag and baggage, Q. Minutius Thermus (by whose death
 "we have sustained a far greater loss, than if Cn. Manlius had miscarried, whose rashness was the "cause of all this calamity and misfortune) with many a tall and valiant man besides, lost his life in "this skirmish. Our host bringing away with them the spoil and pillage of K. Antiochus, was di"vided and parted into three troops: the vanguard in one place, the rearguard in another, and
 "the carriages in a third: were faine to take up their lodging one whole night amongst bushes, bri-"ars, and brambles, and lurk within the caves and dens of wild beasts. Are these the brave and "worthy exploits, for which you demand a triumph? But say, that you had received in Thrace, "neither damage nor dishonor: which be the enemies over whom you would needs triumph in "all the hall? Do they bethe whole, whom the Senat & people of Rome destined & assigned to be your "enemies: for so was triumph granted to this L. Scipio here in place: so likewise to that M. Atilius "before him over K. Antiochus: so also erewhile to T. Quintus for the victory of Philip, and so to "conclude unto P. Africa for subduing Amibal the Carthaginian, and K. Siphax. And when "the Senat had ordained war, yet before they entered into and began these high and haughty affairs,
 "they made some doubt and pause in such petty circumstances as these, to wit, unto whom they "should

"should send defiance and denounce the said war whether to the Kings themselves in their own
 "prison: or it were sufficient to give intimation to one garrison or other within their fortresses,
 "And would ye now (my matters) that all these observations and ceremonies should be pol-
 "iced and conformed, that the rights and laws of the Feciales and heralds should be abolished, &
 "that there shall be no more Fecial at all, But let religion and divine service (God forgive me if I "seem to blaspheme) be trodden under foot: suppose the Gods were utterly forgotten of you, and
 "their remembrance quite exiled out of your hearts: Is it your pleasure also, and think ye it meet,
 "that the Senat be consulted no more for their advice in question of war? or that a bill be pro-
 "pounded to the people, in this wise: Pleaseth it you or no, to ordain that war be levied a"gainst the Gauls? The other day, and no longer since, the Consuls were desirous and earnest to "govern Greece and Asia, yet when they perceived you to be resolute and perfit still in assigning "unto them both, the Province of Liguria, they were content and obeyed. Great reason shall
 "they have therefore to demand a triumph at your hands, after they have achieved an happy "victory and finished that war, which they first enterprised under your warrant and authority.
 "After this manner as ye have heard, Furius and Emilius. And Manlius again, as we find in "record, answered thus, or much to this effect, as followeth: "Right honourable & my very good
 "LL, the Tribuns of the Commons were ever wont afore-time, to repugn and cross them that "demanded triumph: and I take my self much beholden unto them for this favour, that either in "their love to my self, or in regard of my great and notable exploits, they have not only by their "silence given their consent for my honor, but also seem ready and prett to propound the same
 "unto the people, if need had been. But now forsooth, when have I (and God will) for mine ad"ventures but even some of my ten adjacents or suffragans, whom our ancestors thought good to "give unto their Generals in the wars, as a council both to assist and aid them, and also to coun-"enance and grace them in their victory? L. Furius and L. Emilius are the men and none but "they, who inhibit and debar me from mounting up into the triumphant chariot; they are ready to "pluck from my head the glorious and honorable crown that I should wear: even those (I say)
 "whom (if the Tribuns had hindered and impeached my triumph) I would have reported my self "unto as witnesses of my worthy acts. Certainly, (my LL,) far be it from me, that I should envy "and repine at the honour of any man: but I remember well, that of late daies when certain Tri-
 "buns of the Common State (men of great courage and action) went about to stay and forbid the "triumph of Q. Fabius Laber, ye by your authority diverted and scared them from that intended "enterprise; and he triumphed in the end, notwithstanding his adversaries gave out and said a"loud, not that he had fought a war unjustly, but in reproachful manner charged him. That he had "not so much as set eye upon the enemy. And I, who have often in ranged battel fought with "an 100000 most fierce and warlike enemies, slain or taken prisoners more than 40000 of them, "forced and won two of their camps: and left all places on this side the ridge of the mountain
 "Taurus more peaceable and quiet than is the Land of Italy, am not only frustrate and put beside "my triumph, but also stand here before your honor: to defend my self against the challenge of their "mine own Council and Suffragans. Whi. accusation of theirs, consisteth (as ye have heard my "LL,) of two principal points: for objected they have, first, that I ought not at all to have made
 "war with the Gauls; and secondly, that I conducted and managed the same, rashly and with"out direction. The Gauls (say they) were no enemies of ours; but being quiet in peace, and "ready to do whatsoever they were charged, were by you abused and wronged, I will not require
 "(my LL,) that ye should have the same hard conceit of the Gauls which inhabit in Asia, as touch"ing their ruelty and mortal hatred against the Roman name, which ye know generally to be in "the people of the Gauls: Do but consider and judge of these Gauls as they be in themselves "simply without respect of the infamous name and odious opinion that goeth of the whole ge"neration: O that King Emmenes were here. Would to God that all the States of Asia were pre"sent in place, that ye might hear them rather what complaints they would make; than my self ac"cusing of them. Send but your Embassadors to all the Cities of Asia and enquire whether serv"itude were greater and more grievous, that which they were delivered from by the chaine of "the Gauls? Let them relate unto you, and make report how often their territories have been "wasted by them, how many booties have been driven, and prizes carried away out of them, and "how they were brought to so low a pass, that they hardly could find means and make any shift "to redeem their prisoners by ransom. Let them tell you what they heard there besides, how "they killed men, yea, and their children, to sacrifice, unto their Gods. But know ye now from "me, that your allies yielded tribute to the Gauls, yea, and should have paid till at this day, not"withstanding they were by you delivered from their subjection under King Antiochus. If I had "not be-arr'd my self the better, For the farther that Antiochus was removed from them the more
 "he boldly and outrageously would these Gauls have ruled like LL, over all Asia, and whatsoever
 "lands had lien on this side the top of the mount Taurus, you should have laid to the leignory of "the Gauls and not annexed to your own Empire & dominion. All this is true will some one say,
 "and what of all that? These Gauls likewise once spoiled the temple at Delphos, repented in times
 "past the common Oracle of the whole world and situate in the very heart and midst of the earth,
 "& yet the people of Rome neither denounced nor made war for all that, Certainly, I shalwaies wond
 "have thought there had been some difference to be made between those daies, when as neither
 "Greece

A "Greece nor Asia was under your jurisdiction and obbedience (that you should need to take care
 "and regard of what was done in those parts) & this present time, in which ye have let the moun"tain Taurus to be the bound & limits, wherunto your Empire extendeth in which you give free"dom and immunity to Cities, in which ye enlarge the confines of some, and take in the precincts
 "of others, fining these cities with forfeiture & loss of their territories, punishing those with taxes "and tributs: in which I say, you augment and diminish realms, give and take away Kingdoms at "your good pleasure, and in one word, in which ye judge it a matter that concerneth you, to pro"vide that there may be a general peace both on land and sea. Were you of opinion indeed, that "Asia might not be counted free, unless Antiochus had withdrawn his garrisons, which he kept quiet
 "within their fortresses and castles, and stirred not forth, and thought you wishal, that your gifts
 "B granted unto King Emmenes, might be assured unto him, and the freedom likewise of the Cities, "established unto them, if whole armies of Gauls might range all about to and fro in those coun"tries? But why stand I so much arguing and reasoning in this manner, as if I had not found the "Gauls enemies, but rather caused them to be our enemies? O L. Scipio I call you here to witnesse, "into whose charge and government I succeeded, whole virtue and felicity withal, I besought the "immortal Gods to vouchsafe unto me (and my prayer was not in vain) and you likewise, O P.
 "C Scipio, who with the Col. your brother and in the whole army, had the room & place indeed of "an adjoint Lieutenant and no more, but carried the Majesty of a Colleague & joint companion;
 "speak frankly both of you upon your knowledge, whether whole legions of Gauls served not in "the army of Antiochus? Tell us, whether you saw them not in the field, marshalled in both the "points and flanks of the main battel, as the very flower and strength of the whole pilluance of "Antiochus? Say directly, fought ye not with them slew you them not, & carried away their spoils, "as undoubted and lawfull enemies? And yet both Senat decreed and people ordained war with "Antiochus by name, and not with the Gauls. But I tro (or else I am much deceived) within this "decree and ordinance, they included all those besides that came to aid and assist him. Of whom
 "D (excepting Antiochus himself, with whom Scipio had art. led peace and alliance, and ye also had "expressly given order therefore) they all were our enemies no doubt, who had born arms against "us in the quarrel and behalf of the said Antiochus. Now albeit the Gauls above all others were "complicd in this number, together with some petty Kings and Tyrants besides; yet I contracted "accord and peace with others, (after I had forced them to suffer due punishment according to "their trespasses) as far forth as I thought it expedient for the honour of your Empire: yea, and I
 "assisted also to gain and win the hearts of the Gauls, if haply it had been possible to have dulced
 "and reclaimed them from their inbred fierceness and natural cruelty. But when I perceived that "they were untractable untamed, and implacable, then and not before I resolved, that it was high "time to bridle and bring them into order by violence and force of arms. Now that I have cleared
 "the former point of my accusation, as touching the enterprise of the war, it remaineth that "I yeeld you an account of the conduct thereof, wherein verily I would make no doubt to ap"prove mine innocence, and justify the goodnes of my cause, if I were to plead, I say not in the "Senat of Rome, but even at the council table of Carthage; where (as men say) they make no more
 "ado, but truse up, hang, and crucify their Generals, if they proceed to execution of any service in "E war with bad advice and counsel, although the issue and event be never so good. But in that "City, which therefore useth the name of the Gods both before they begin, and also when they "proceed to the managing of all their affairs, (because no person should come to detract or de-"prave that millicionly, which the Gods have once approved) and which City in the grant & or"dinance either of procession or triumph, useth this solemn form of words: For that he hath well
 "and happily administered and managed the weal publick: In this City, I say, if I were unwilling, nay,
 "if I reputed it an odious matter, and favouring too much of pride and arrogance to vaunt my self
 "and boast of mine own prowess; yet if in regard of the happy success and felicity of my self and "mine army in that without any loss of soldiers, we vanquished and subdued so great and mighty
 "F a nation, I demanded first that due honour and thanksgiving should be rendered unto the im"mortal Gods, and then, that I might my self ascend and mount up the Capitol in triumph from "whence I descended to take my voyage, after I had conceived and pronounced my vows, and "made my prayers after the solemn religious order: I would ye deny both me and the immor"tal Gods also? Yes marry would you, and why? Forsooth I fought in a place of disadvantage,
 "But tell me then, I pray you, in what ground I might have fought with better vantage? con"sidering the enemies were seized of the hill, and kept themselves within their strength and fort,
 "I should have gone unto them, if I had been willing to have vanquished and overcome them,
 "What? how if they had been there within a strong City? how if they had kept within the walls,
 "and would not have issued forth? You must then have laid siege unto them and given them
 "the assault. Must I so indeed? And how I pray? Fought M. Acilius (I beseech you) at Thermopila
 "G in a place of advantage? Why? did not T. Quintus after this manner disposesse Phylip of the high "Mountains, which he held over the River Aous? In faith, I cannot yet devise what kind of ene"mies they either imagine to themselves they were, or would have you to take and elect them
 "to be, if degenerate, if effeminate, if enervate with the delights and pleasures of Asia, what "danger was it to march up the hill against them with all disadvantage? If redoubted and terrible "for fierce courage and bodily strength, deny ye triumph for so noble a victory? Envy (my "good LL,) is blind, and can skill of nothing but to detract and defame virtues, to falsifie

"and corrupt the honors and rewards due thereto. Pardon me I beseech your Honors and hold me if excused, if I have been over long and tedious. It is now late, and I desire you any delight and pleasure that I take to put forth and glorify my self, but a necessity imposed upon me (in mine own defence, to confute these crimes objected against me) which hath driven mine Oration out in length. To proceed, was it possible also that in Thrace I could make the passes within the forests large and wide, which naturally were straight and narrow? the ground plain and smooth, which by nature was uneven and rugged? Could I make level downs of steep mounts? open champion and fair fields of woodland overgrown, and rough wylds. Lay it in me, to prevent those Thracian thieves that they should not hide themselves within their lurking holes and ordinary covert thickets? Was it in my power, to impeach them that they might snatch and carry nothing of our baggage? Was I able to warrant that none of our laboring beasts out of great a number, I should be driven and led away from their company? that no person should be hurt? and finally, that Q. Minutius a brave and hardy knight, should not die of his wound? My adversaries press hard and much upon this misfortune, that it was our unlucky hap to lose so worthy a Gentleman: but they never think that if they would say nothing but suppress and conceal all, yet you should know (since the whole army is here present to testify that which I say) That although the enemy afflicted us in a narrow freight, in an inconvenient place of great disadvantage, yet both of our battalions at once, as well the vanguard as reterward, compassed the army of the Barbarians busy and occupied in rifling of our carriage, flew many thousands of them that very day, and within few days after either killed or took prisoners a greater number of them by far. Well, if I had not drawn a sword in Asia, if I had not seen an enemy there, yet I Pro-consul had deserved a triumph well enough for those two battels in Asia. But enough hath been said of these matters, and I am to request you rather (my Lords all) to forgive me for my boldness; if I have held you longer than my will and desire was.

The accusation that day had prevailed more than his own defence; but that they continued arguing and debating in the Council-house until it was late in the evening. Then the Senate arose with this mind (as it should seem) to deny him a triumph. The next morning, the kinsfolk and friends of Cn. Manlius, laboured all that ever they could: Likewise the authority of the ancients stood him in great stead; who said plainly that the precedent could not be found in any histories. That a General who had vanquished his enemies, accomplished the full time of government in his Province, and brought his army back, returned into the City as a private person, without the honor of the triumphant chariot and the laurel garland. The very indignity and shame of this example, surmounted the malice of his adversaries, in so much as the Senators in a frequent assembly granted his triumph.

The remembrance and memory of this debate, was afterwards drowned in a greater contention that arose with a far mightier and more noble personage. For as Valerius Antias hath recorded, that two Q. Petilii, called P. Scipio Africanus into question, and set him down a day perpetually to make his appearance, and answer for himself. This action divers men construed diversly, according to their several disposition and affection. Some blamed not so much the Tribunes of the Commons, as the whole City in general, for suffering such an abuse; discoursing in this wise: That the two chiefest States and Common-wealths in the World were become at one time unthankful, but Pompey more ungrateful of the twain. For Carthage being subdued, had banished Antias likewise vanquished: but Rome a victress was about to expulse Africanus a conqueror. Others again reasoned thus: that in no State there ought to be a citizen so pre-eminent and high above the rest, that he might not be under law, and brought to answer unto interrogatories accordingly. And nothing, preferreth liberty in a City, and maintaineth equal liberty more, than to have the mightiest man to hold up his hand at the bar. For what may be safely committed to any man (and surely the sovereign rule of the late least of all other things) if he be not to yield an account of the managing of his affairs? And verily, he that can not abide to be equal unto others, to proceed against such a one by rigor and force, is no injustice at all. Thus men commonly talked pro & contra, until the judicial day came of his personal appearance, and answer to be made. Never was there man known before that day (no not Scipio himself when he was at the highest, either Consul or Censor) accompanied with a greater train of men of all degrees and qualities, than he that day was conducted unto the common place and court of Pleas as an accused person, there to plead his cause. Being commanded to speak in his own defence, he began his oration without any mention at all of the imputations and matters with which he was charged, and entered into a discourse of the acts by him achieved: and that with such a Majesty and magnificence as it was well known and confessed, that never man was praised either better or more truly than he. For with what courage and mind he achieved those his brave exploits indeed, with the same spirit he delivered them in words. And no man thought him tedious and was weary to hear his speech, because all that he related was for his own defence in this his danger; and not upon vain glory and ostentation. The Tribunes of the Commons his adversaries, when they had laid open certain supposed crimes committed of old, as touching his wasteful excesses while he was in Syracus, as also the riot and outrage of Pleninius which happened at Locris; they proceeded to charge him by presumptions and insinuations, rather than by direct evidences and proofs, for embezzling and averting to his proper use certain treasure gotten from King Antiochus; and namely, that his son being taken prisoner, was rendered unto him without ransom; and that in all other things, Scipio was respected and

A alone had carried the Roman peace and war under his guidance. Also that he bare a strong hand over the Consul, more like, I wot, a Dictator and absolute commander, than a Lieutenant and assistant unto him, all the while he was in the province. Neither aimed he and those at any other mark, when he went that journey, but that the same, which long before was notoriously known to Spain, Gaul, Sicily, and Africa, might as evidently appear to Greece, to Asia, and all to the Kings and nations of the East parts, to wit, that he was the only man, he was the chief, the head and pillar of the Roman Empire, that under the shadow of Scipio his wing, that City which is the lady of the world, was covered and protected: that a beak and nod of his head, was as good as all arrests of Senat and helts of people. Thus when they could not touch him in life, nor fasten upon him any note of infamy, they charged him all that ever they could with matter to kindle envy. Thus with orations they spent the time until night came, and the business was put over to another day: which being come, the Tribunes, only in the times in the morning were set in their pewes within the Rostra [or common place] the defendant was called, who paraded with a great company of his friends and followers, passed through the midst of the assembly, approached the Rostra and stood full under it. Then after an exordium; and silence made: My Masters (quoth he) you that are Tribunes of the commons, and ye likewise Quirites, my neighbors and citizens of Rome upon this very day of the month it was that I fought a pight battle against Antias and the Carthaginians, with right fortune and happy success; meet therefore and good reason lieth it, that to day all pleas and actions be created: I will go directly and immediately from hence, to the Capitol and present my self before Imp. Opt. Max. before L. Iunius and M. Aemilius, with all the rest of our gods and goddesses, presidents and patrons of that temple, and so to relieve, to perform my humble duty unto them to salute and thank them, for that they have vouchsafed me that resolute and powerful means with all, both on such a day as this, and also many times besides, to perform my devoir well and truly unto the Commonwealth. As many of you here before (Quirites) as well may, give with me, and pray the gods to lead to you like governors to my self, and no worse. If I say (and not else) as you ever (since I was seventeen years of age, even to these mine old daies, you always advanced me to honors before the ordinary time of mine age) I again advanced and prevented the said honors with good service and noble deeds. This said, he departed from the Rostra and ascended up to the Capitol, whereto the whole audience there assembled turned at once and followed Scipio; in so much as all the tribes and noaries, yea, and the very legions left the Tribunes there alone, without any to bear them company but their own bondservants and the common cryer, who still from the Rostra called and cited the defendant. Scipio not only visited the temples upon the Capitol hill, but also in the perambulation with the people of Rome throughout the whole city to all the churches and chapels of their gods and goddesses. This was in manner a more solemn day unto him in regard of the affectionate favour of men, and the estimation of his true grandeur indeed, than on which he rode into the City in triumph over King Syrax and the Carthaginians. But it was the last fair day that ever he saw; and never shone the sun again pleasantly upon P. Scipio. For after this, foretelling envy growing toward him, and what a hate and how full of debates he should have with those Tribunes, upon a longer day granted for the proceele of law against him, he retired himself apart to Luternum, of set purpose to make default and not appear to plead his cause any more. He carried a greater spirit with him, his heart was too big, & used he had been to an higher degree of port & honor, then to take knowledge what it was to be accused: he could not skill to vale bonet and stoop so low, and to abate himself to the abject condition of those that speak for themselves at the bar. Now when the day was come, and that in his absence his name began to be called, L. Scipio answered for him, and alleged sickness to be the cause why he was away. But the Tribunes his accusers, would not admit of that excuse, replying and saying, That upon the same pride of heart, in which he avoided once before, his judicial trial, and left the Tribunes and the whole assembly, he now also would not appear to make his answer. Even so triumphed he then over the people of Rome, when accompanied with those whom he led after him as prisoners (after he had once taken from them their power and liberty to give their sentence and doom of him) he requested himself that day, by way of an intercession from the Tribunes of the Commons into the Capitol. Well as he now loved therefore (say they) and justly punished for that daies folly and rashness. For lo how he himself now abandoneth you, who was your mover and leader then, to forsake us. See how every day more then other our courage is fallen and heart abated: and dare not we now lend talk to fetch him (a private person and no more) out out of his farm and house in the country, and make him to appear and plead his answer, unto whom not past 17 yeeres ago, as when time as he was General of an army on land, & Admirall of the Armado by sea, we were so bold as to lend Tribunes of the Com. & an Edile, to arrest and bring him away with them to Rome? In the end, the rest of the Tribunes of the Com. being called earnestly unto by L. Scipio for their lawful favour, set down his order & conclusion, that if sickness were alleged for his excuse, and that there were nothing else but it that occasioned his absence, it should be received for good & lawful, and their colleagues should adjourn his trial to a farther day. It fortuned at that time that Tib. Sempronius Gracchus was one of the Tribunes, between whom & P. Scipio there was some quarrel. He forbade expressly that his own name should be subscribed to the instrument of the aforesaid decree of his colleagues. And when every man looked to hear, some heavier sentence denounced against Scipio, he awarded in this manner. "For as much as L. Scipio excuseth the absence of his brother by sickness, it is good and sufficient in my opinion. And more than that, I will not for my part suffer P. Scipio to be accused before he return again to Rome. Yea, and then also, if he call for my helping, he and I will give him assistance, and stop the course of picketings against him. And as to the main point of the cause, this is my resolution, that P. Scipio being advanced to highly as he is to that pitch of honor, by his noble and famous exploits, and by the dignities received at the hands of the people of Rome, as if both gods and men had consented to let him aloft, for him to come down now and stand pleading below at the bar beneath the Rostra, and there to have his ears glow and ring again with the checks and taunts of certain green heads and buse youths, were a great ter shame and disgrace to the people of Rome, then to himself. Nay, he stand not thus with this bare sword, but leaped and set it on fire with words of indignation, testifying his discontentment for this course and manner of proceeding. And shall Scipio (quoth he, my master Tribunes) that renounced conqueror of Africa, stand under your feet at your devotion? Defeated he and put to flight in Spain a most brave and noble General of the Carthaginians, with their 4 entire armies? Took he Syphax prisoner, vanquished he Annibal, subdued he Carthage and made it tributary unto us? Chased he Annibal beyond the mountain Tamusis, (for it might be confessed, that in this glorious conquest L. Scipio had his brother copartner with him) and all for this, to be taken under foot of two Petilius? And that ye should seek to triumph over P. A- fricanus? Will it never be better? Shall great personages, with all the good effects of their own for all the dignities and honors by you upon them conferred) never reach and attain to a strong fort and sure place of defence, wherein they may make account to be safe and pass all danger, K and wherein their old age may rest and repose, if not with worship and honour, yet at least with in security, exempt from abuse and violent outrage? The sentence it self of Gracchus enforced with such a speech (especially) moved not others only, but also the very accusers themselves; who made no other rejoinder again but thus. That they would consider better what they might by their place and what they ought of duty to do. When the assembly of the people was broken up, the L.L. of the Senat began to sit in council; where, the whole order of the Senators (but principally the ancients and as many as had been Consuls) highly commended and thanked Tib. Gracchus, for that he had preferred the weal publicly, before private grudges and particular quarrels. But the Petilius were well content and bated with reproachful checks. In bitter rebukes, in that they would seem to rise up the fall of another, and to grace themselves with L the disgrace of Africanus, and seek to triumph over him, and be enriched with his spoils. Well after that, there was no more words of Scipio Africanus. The rest of his life he passed at Lutetium and never had mind to come to the City: there ended he his daies in a country village; and (as they say) he charged his executors upon his death bed, to inter him in that very place. And there his tomb or monument was built, because he would not that so much as his funeral obsequies should be performed at Rome, (his native country) to unthankfull as it was. A rare man he was and worthy to be recommended to the memory of all posterity: howbeit the former part of his life was more singular and memorable, as well for the conduct of martial exploits in war, as the governance of civil affairs in peace, then in his latter daies. For in his youth he followed the wars continually; whereas in his old age, as his body decayed and faded, to whatsoever he did, M lost much of the wonted beauty and lustre. Besides, there was no matter presented, to employ that wit and spirit of his. What odds was there between his former Consulship and the second, although ye put his Consulship to it in the balance? What comparison was there, and what femble thing in that lieutenantcy of his in Asia? of so little or no employment was it by reason of his own fickleness; and blemished withal, by the occasion of the misfortune of his son. And afterward, his return home again was no less unfortunate, for the hard choice whereunto he was driven, forced of necessity to abide the trial of a doubtful issue in judgment, to quit withal his native City for ever. Howbeit he alone went away with the honor above all others, of finishing the punick war, as great and dangerous to the Romans as any that ever they made.

When Africanus was once dead and his head laid, his adversaries and enemies were aloft: of whom, M. Porcius Cato was the chief and principal: a man who was wont to bark (as it were) and rail against him during his life in regard of his greatness. And it is thought, that the Petilius were let on by him, and procured through his perswasion, both in the life of Africanus to have drawn out, and after his death to have preferred a bill in this form and manner following: "I please you to grant and ordain, that true search and diligent enquiry be made, what sums of money were taken in prize, carried away, and levied away of King Antiochus and those which were under his obedience and dominion; and that of as much thereof as came not into the publick treasury and chamber of the City, Ser. Sulpicius (the Pretor of the City) may propound unto the Senat, to know their advice and pleasure touching it: that whensoever of all the Pretors O for the time now being, it shall please the Senat to appoint, he may sit in commission and inquisition thereof. This bill was first moved by Q. and Lucius Mummus, who thought it meet and reacn that the Senat alone (as at all times heretofore, should be the equity of the monies lo purloined and embezzled: as is storied, and not brought in to the equity of the City. The Petilius charged the Scipios for being over great and mighty and as it were K King the Senat, to say all before them. L. Furius Purpureo (a man that had been Consul, and one of the ten commissioners in Asia, was of opinion, that the forsaide enquest should be granted in more large & ample terms, namely,

A namely, as touching the money not only taken from Antiochus, but also from other Kings and nations: covertly taxing herein Cn. Manlius his old enemy. L. Scipio on the other side stepped forth to disswade this matter: albeit it was thought he would rather speak in defence of himself, then against the thing. He complained much and shewed his grievance, that such a bill as this should come forth now, and be set on foot after the death of his brother Africanus, the most valiant knight and noblest personage that ever was. As if it were not sufficient, that P. Africanus wanted the solemn Panegyrick oration at the Rostra after his death, but he must be executed also. Why? the very Carthaginians are contented with the exile of Annibal, and seek no more:
but the people of Rome is not satisfied even with the death of Scipio, unless both his own good name after he is buried be wounded and mangled, and his brother also (to fill up the measure of B mens malice and hatred) be killed and sacrificed upon his tomb. M. Cato spake in the behalf of the bill, and perswaded that it might passe. His oration as touching the treating of King Antiochus, it extant to be seen: and by the majesty of his authority, he diverted the two Mum- mii Tribunes of the Commons, clean away, from interposing themselves any more. When they once had renounced and given over their negative, all the tribes in general passed their voices affirmatively. P. rogatus. After this, Ser. Sulpicius propounded unto the Senat, (Whom they would appoint for this enquest according to the act Petilius) and the L.L. of the Senat deputed Q. Tor- quatus Culeo. This Pretor was so great a friend to the house of the Cornelii that some authors, namely those, who report how P. Scipio both died and also was carried forth to be entered at Rome (for that bruit, do runneth current) have written, How he went to his funerals before C the bier and the mourners, with a cap of liberty on his head, like as he had done before in his triumph, and gave sweet wine or merriment to all those that attended the company, as far as to the gate Capena. This honour he did Scipio at his death, for that among other prisoners in Africa, he was by his means recovered out of the enemies hand, but it should seem rather, that he was such an enemy to that family, that for the cankred rancour and malice when he carried against that name, he was by the adverse faction of the Scipios, chosen especially of purpose to sit upon & execute that inquisition. But certain it is, before this Pretor (in his extremities, who enter in love & friendship, or in hatred and enmity, kept no mean) information was given immediately against L. Sci- pio. Presentments were made likewise, and the names received of his lieutenants A. Hostilius and L. Hostilius both Catos: and of his treasurer besides, C. Furius Deuleo. And to the end that it D should appear to the world, that they were all attaint of this crime of purloining and robbing the publick treasure of the common weal in one complot, there were two secretaries also and one of his lieutenants called into question. But these three last mentioned, and L. Hostilius before-named, were found unguilty and acquit, before Scipio had his judicial trial: howbeit Scipio and A.
Hostilius his lieutenant, together with C. Furius were condemned. Scipio, for that he (as Valerius Antius writeth) makes more easie peace to the contentment of Antiochus, received 600 pound weight of gold, and 480 pound weight of silver more then he brought into the City chambers. A.
Hostilius, for that he likewise detained eighty pound weight of gold, and 483 pound of silver: and Furius the Quellor for keeping back to his own use 130 pound of gold, and two hundred of silver. These I sum of gold and silver, as I find them gathered and registered by Valer- E ius Antius in his Chronicle. As for the sum of gold and silver, which L. Scipio should embezzle, I would rather think that the clerk or secretary faulted with his pen in writing the copies, then the author lied to loud with his tongue in the first inditing of the Original. For it is more likely of the twain, that the weight of the silver was more then of gold. As also for the fine wherein he was condemned, should amount but to forty thousand sesterties, then srie to two hundred and forty thousand. And I am rather induced thus to calculate, because it is said, that P. Scipio himself was F required in the Senat to give his account but of such a sum; and when he had bidden his brother L. to fetch him that book of accounts, he took it of him, and there before the Senat, tare and rent it with his own hands, with indignation, that having brought into the Treasury two millions of sesterties, he was called to his account for forty thousand. In which confident boldness of spirit and courage, when the Quellors durst not against the order of law) take forth any one of the Treasury, he called for the keys, and said he would be so bold as to open the chests of the Treasury since he was the cause that they were locked. Many things besides are diversly reported of Scipio, especially as touching the latter end of his life, his trouble and accusation, his death, his funerals, and last of all, of his sepulchre and tomb, which distract me so, that I wot not what report to cleave unto, nor which records to believe. For they accord not as concerning his accuser. Some write it was M. Naevius, others again say that they were the Petilius that called him to his answer. Neither agree they in the time when he was troubled, nor in the year, no, nor the place wherein he died, nor yet where he was entered. Some affirm he ended his daies G and was buried at Rome, others at Lutetium. And in both places there are monuments and Statues of him to be seen. For at Lutetium there stood a tomb, and over the same tomb an image of his personage erected, which of late time we our selves saw overthrowen in a tempest. At Rome likewise without the gate Capena, there be three statues upon the monument of the Scipios, whereof two are said to be of Pub. and L. Scipio, and the third of Q. Ennius the Poet. And this difference among authors is not touching his acts and affairs only, but also about the very Orations (if it be they were the orations indeed of P. Scipio & Tiberius Gracchus, which we commonly to taken and carried about, which disagree so much as they do. For the title of the oration that goeth for P. Scipio, hath the name of M. Naevius, a Tribune of the Commons: but through the whole Oration it self there is no mention at all that accusers. He termeth him one while Nebulo [Knave] and another while Nugator [Confounder.] In like sort the oration of Gracchus maketh no mention at all either of the Patris, the accusers or Africanus, or of the day assigned unto him for his answer. And we must devise to tell the whole tale otherwise, it would have it to agree with the oration of Gracchus; and follow we must those authors; who write, that when L. Scipio was accused and condemned for taking bribes of King Antiochus, his brother Africanus was Embassador in Tulesny; and upon the news of his brothers misfortune, left his embassage and made hast to Rome. Where he took his way directly from the gate to the common place (for that it was told him how his brother was going to prison) and thrust the fergant from his body, yea, and when the Tribunes themselves would have restrained him, he used violence against them, and carried himself in this action so, as he shewed more kindness and love to his brother, then manners and civility otherwise. For thus complaineth Gracchus in his oration, that the Tribunes authority and power was infringed and broken by a privat person. And in the latter end, when he proudly and power was infringed and broken by a privat person. And in the latter end, when he smiled to aslist L. Scipio, he knit up his speech with these words, that it was a thing more tolerable that both the Tribunitian puissance and the Common-weal should seem overcome and surmounted by Tribunes themselves, then by a privat man. But he aggravated and enforced this one violence and excessive outrage against him, and made it odious in such sort, that in blaming him for so much overshooting himself and degenerating as it were from his own nature, he rehearsed the commendable parts of his moderation and temperate carriage of himself aforetime, and that in so good terms and ample manner, that thereby he made him some part of amends for the sharp reprehension he used for the present. For he said, that in times past he had rebuked and reproved the people, when they would have made him a perpetual Consul and Dictator; that he had forbidden expressly, that any of his Statues in triumphant habit, should be set up and erected in the publick places of assemblies, as in the Comitium and Curia, in the Capitoll and chappell of Jupiter Opt. Max. These commendable reproofs of him, if they were uttered in an oration penned of purpose for his praise, must needs tellifie and shew a wonderful magnanimity of his, in the moderate use of high honours according to a civil port; which an enemy by way of reproch and upbraiding him, acknowledgeth and confesseth. But all writers accord, that Gracchus, took to wife the younger of his two daughters (for the elder without all question was affianced and given in marriage by his father to P. Cornelius Nasica, but it is not so certainly agreed upon, whether she was both betrothed and wedded unto him, after her fathers death or no. As also, whether it be true (as it is reported) that when L. Scipio was a leading to prison, Gracchus, seeing none of his own fellow Tribunes to succour and rescue him, swore a great oath and protested that he was an enemy till to the Scipios as much as ever he was, and would not do any thing to curry favour with them, or to come into their grace; yet could he never endure that he should be carried to that prison, into which he had seen his brother Africanus lead Kings, great generals and commanders of offences, captive. Moreover, that the same day the Senat furnished to be at supper together in the Capitoll, and arose up all at once, and requested Africanus to affianse his daughter to Gracchus, before the supper and banquet was ended. Which espousals being performed with all due complements accordingly, during the time of that solemne feast, Scipio, when he was returned home to his house, said unto his wife Emilia, that he had affianced and bestowed his daughter upon an husband. She then falling into a fit of choler like a woman, and chafing that he had not made her acquainted with the matter, and taken her advice touching the maiden, who was as much her child as his, brake out into these words withall, that if he had given her in marriage to Tiberius Gracchus, yet good reason it was that the mother should have been at the making of the bargain. Whereupon Scipio took great contentment and joy at this conformity of judgment in the choice, and inferred streight waies, that he was the man to whom she was espoused. Thus much I thought good to relate of this worthy and noble person, albeit there is great variety of opinions, and diversity of writings in that behalf.

After the Pretor Q. Terentius, had finished the inquisition and whole process thereof, Hastilius and Furius, who were attaint and condemned, that very day put in sufficient larcies to be bound in recognisance to the treasurers of the City, for the payment of their fines. But Scipio debating the matter still, & pleading that all the money which he had received was in the City chamber, & that he had purloined none of the publick treasure, was laid hold on to be had away and committed to prison. P. Scipio Nasica called unto the Tribunes for their help, and made a speech full of fine praises and commendations, not in general only of the whole name and family of the Cornelii, but in particular also of his own house. And namely he alledged and said, That himself and P. Africanus, together with L. Scipio (who now was going to prison) had to their fathers Cn. Scipio and P. Scipio, most noble and famous personages; those who for certain years in the land of Spain, advanced the renown and glory of the Roman name, mangle the heads of many captains & armies, as well of Carthaginians as Spaniards; not only in martial feats of war, but also in civility and faithful dealing of the Romans; and in the end both of them spent their blood and lost their lives in the quarrel of the people of Rome. And albeit it had been sufficient for all their posterity to maintain only & uphold the glory from them received, yet P. Africanus was not born of human blood, but of divine and heavenly race of the gods. As for L. Scipio, who now is in trouble, to say nothing of his worthy acts which he achieved in Spain and in Africa, when he

A "was lieutenant there to his brother Consul) he was both reputed by the Senat sufficient, without any calling of lors, to undertake the province of Africa and the war against King Antiochus, and also esteemed by his brother Africanus to worthy a person, that himself who had been Consul twice, Censor once, and had ridden in triumph, thought not fitter to accompany him unto Africa in quality of his lieutenant. In which province (to the end that the greatness & resplendent glory of the lieutenant should not dim the brightness of the Consul, and to shew his virtues and good parts) it so fell out, that the very same day, on which L. Scipio vanquished Antiochus near Magnesia, P. Scipio lay sick at Eleea, a City distant certain daies journey. He decaied I say an army there, nothing inferior to that of Antiochus, with whom his brother had encountered before in Africa. In which battell amongst other great commanders and captains under the King, Antiochus was himself imploied in person, even he who had been the grand General in the Punic war, which service was so well conducted and managed, that a man positively could not find fault to much as with fortune, or any accident that hapned there. And now when the war is unblamable, there is picked matter of crimination in the peace; and it (they say) was bought and sold for money. In which challenge the ten deputies and assistants in council, are also touched and noted with corruption, by whose advice the said peace was granted and concluded. Well, of those ten, there were some that stepped forth and accused Cn. Manlius; yet to far off was that accusation of theirs from being credited, that it did not to much as hinder and delay the very time of his triumph. But (believe me in Scipio his case, the very conditions of peace favour) strongly of bribery and indirect dealing, for that they are advantageous, respective & favorable to part of Antiochus. For his kingdom is left entire and whole unto him; now that he is vanquished, he possesseth as much as before the war began; and Scipio having received from him a mighty masse of gold and silver, hath brought nothing into the common treasury, but averred all from thence, and converted it to his proper use. Why? was there not carried in pomp at the triumph of L. Scipio (in the very sight of all men) as much gold and silver as in ten triumphs before (and put them all together) could not be shewed. For what should I speak of the confines and frontiers of his realm? Namely, that Antiochus beforetime held under his dominion all Africa, and the marches also of Europe adjoining; & great a part of the world: that is which extendeth from the hill Taurus, and lyeth out so far as the Egean Sea; how many not Cities only, but spacious countries and populous nations it containeth, all men know right well: as also that this country bearing out in length more then 30 daies journey, and in breadth between two seas ten daies journey, even as far as to the top of the mountain Taurus, is taken from Antiochus; & he driven into the utmost angle and corner of the globe of the earth? What could he have been disleased of more in case his peace had cost him never a penny of money? When Philip was conquered, he had Macedonia left unto him: when Nabis was subdued, he enjoyed still Lacedaemon: and no man ever went about to call Quintus in question for it. And why may he be denied to his brother Scipio Africanus, for whose sake the envy and malice of men hath defaced and hurt L. Scipio, whereas his brothers glory ought to have graced and helped him. Would any man of sense and reason judge, that so much gold and silver was brought into the house of L. Scipio, as may not not possibly be raised, if all the goods he hath were sold to the worth? What should become of all that gold of the Kings? Where be those great purchases of lordships and inheritances that he hath made therewith? Certainly it cannot be, but in that house that hath not exceeded in superfluous expence, there should be seen some heap and mount of this new treasure. But what care his enemies for this? That which cannot be made of the substance and goods of L. Scipio they will make good on his body and back; which they mean to torture (belike) and expose to contumely & villany, to the end that a man of the best mark and quality that ever was, should be shut up in a dungeon among robbers by the high way side, amongst night thieves and cut-purses, and there in the hard stocks and balefull darkness render his last breath; and when he is dead, to have his body cut out naked at the prison dore. But be it whensoever it shall, this will be no greater blot to the house Cornelia, than a shamefull reproach for ever to the City of Rome. Against all these remonstrances, the Pretor Terentius uppoed and read the law Patris, the decree of the Senat, and the sentence given of L. Scipio, and he for his own part said, he could not do withall, but if the sum wherein he was condemned, were not brought into the common Treasurehouse, he knew no other remedy, nor what else to do, but to command him (a condemned person) to be apprehended again, and had away to prison. Then the Tribunes went apart to consult and lay their heads together. And within a while after C. Flaminius pronounced aloud, according to his own advice and the opinion of all his Collegues (excepting only Gracchus) that the Tribunes would not interpose themselves, but that the Pretor might do and execute his office and his authority to the full. But Tib. Gracchus let down his own decree in this form, That as touching the sum wherein L. Scipio was condemned, he would not be against it, nor impeach the Pretor, but that he might use his power according to his place, and take it out of his goods, as far as they would extend. But that L. Scipio who hath subdued the mightiest and most puissant monarch in all the world, who hath drawn out and extended the bounds of the Roman empire, as far as the farthest frontiers of the earth; who hath obliged and bound King Eumenes, the Rhodians & so many Cities and States besides of Africa, and made them beholding to the people of Rome for favours and benefits bestowed upon them; finally, who hath himself laid up fast in prison any a General captain over the enemies, after he led them in triumph: that he I say, should lie in prison & rons triumph which I have so justly deserved: that a General (I say) who had so worthily achieved his service, and an army so victorious, should stay and give attendance without the City gates, until it pleased the Consul to return home: who no doubt of very purpose and on set purpose, upon this occasion would make flow bath and take his leisure. But now considering that the enmity and heart-burning that the Consul beareth to me is so notorious as it is, What indifferency and reasonable dealing may a man look for at his hands? who taking the advantage of the time when a small number of Senators were assembled, caused an act of the Senat to passe by stealth, and entered it in the treasure house, containing thus much in effect, that Ambra should not be reputed as a own forced by assault, notwithstanding it were assailed with manilets and platforms: where we were driven to erect new fabricks, and plant other engines and ordnance of war after the former were consumed with fire: where we maintained fight about the walls, as well under the ground as above, for the space of 15 daies together: where after that the souldiers had scaled and gained the walls, the conflict endured notwithstanding a long time doubtfull, from morning to night: and where were slain above 3000 enemies. Now as touching the sacrileg committed (after the City was forced) in spoiling the churches of the immortal gods what a slander think ye, hath he raised of me? what a matter hath he made thereof, and how he hath informed the Pontifics and Bishops? unless a man would say, that lawful it was not for the City of Rome to be garnished & beautified with the ornaments of Syracusa & other Cities won by force: but the law of war extended it to this only City of Ambra? I beleech you therefore the L. of the Senat, yes, and I request the Tribuns, not to suffer me to be mocked and abused by a most insolent and proud adversary. Then at all hands they dealt with the Tribune, some increased him, other rebuked and blamed him: but the speech of Tib. Gracchus (one of his colleagues) moved him most of all others: who shewed, that it was no good precedent and example, that men should maintain and follow their own privat quarrels in time of magistracy and publick government; but a shamefull matter and a foul indignity it was, and much becoming the Tribuns of the Commons and their sacred laws, that a Tribune should be Proctor to other men and prosecute their actions and enmities. Men ought (quod he) according to their own discretion and judgment, either to love or hate the persons, to like or dislike the cause; not to depend and hang upon the countenance and beck of others, not to be carried to and fro with the wills, pleasure, and appetites of other men. As for the Tribune of the Commons here, he accordeth and taketh part with a choleric and reddy Consul, and remembereth well what M. Emilius left with him in privat charge; but forgetteth altogether that the Tribuneship was committed unto him by the people of Rome: committed I say, and put into his hands for to assist privat persons, and to maintain their liberties, and not to uphold the Kinglike rule and a royalty of a Consul. Never leteth he thus much before him, that it will be written another day in the Annals and yearly Chronicles, that of two Commoner Tribuns in the same fellowship and society, one for the love of the Common-weal renounced and gave over his own privat displeasure and enmity to a particular person, and the other took charge as it were by way of Commission, to pursue the quarrell of another man. The Tribune could endure no longer these rebukes and checks, and therewith departed out of the temple: then the Pretor Ser. Sulpicius propounded the bill the second time; and so a triumph was granted to M. Fulvius. Who after he had rendered great thanks to the L. of the Senat, added moreover and said, that the very day wherein he forced the City Ambra, he had by vow promised, to the honor of Jupiter Opt. Max. for to exhibit the great and solemn Rom. games. And to that effect the Cities of Greece had contributed towards the charges, a hundred pound weight in gold: his petition was therefore, that the Senat would ordain that out of that mass of money which he was to carry and shew in triumph, and meant to bestow and lay up in the City Treasury, the forsaid sum of gold might be sequestred and reserved apart for the proper use above named. The Senat commanded, that the Colledge of the Prelats and Priests in this case should be consulted with, and their advice demanded, whether they thought it necessary that so much gold should be spent and consumed in the charges of the said games? The Prelats made answer again, that it was not material to relegion and to the service of the gods, to how great a great reckning over the charges of the games should arise. Whereupon the Senat permitted Fulvius to do say what he would himself, so as it exceeded not the sum of 80000 [Ales.] He had propoied to triumph in the month of January, but hearing that Emilius the Consul (who was advertised by letters, that Ambra the Tribune of the Commons had renounced and let fall his opposition which he commented) was coming in proper person to Rome, only for to hinder the triumph, and stayd by the way sick; he prevented the day, for fear he should have had more anger and trouble in his triumph, then during his war. So upon the 22 day of December he triumphed over the Ætolians and Cephælians. Before his chariot there were born 100 crowns of gold, weighing 12 pound peece: of silver 83000 pound weight: of gold 243 pound weight: of Attick Tetradrachms 18000: of Philip peecees of gold coin 12422: images of brasse 85: of marble 230. Likewise of armor, as well defensive as offensive; and other spoils of the enemies, an huge deal, besides Catapults, Balists, and other engines and peecees of battery. Moreover, there went before him 27 captives either Ætolians and Cephælians, or else under King Antiochus, left by him in those parts. The same day before that he entered into the City, he bestowed in the cirque Flaminium, many military gifts upon many colonels, captains, horsemen and centurions, as well Romans as allies. Generally to all the footmen he gave out of the pillage 25 Denarii peece: twice as much to the centurions, and threefold to horsemen.

- A Now approached the time of the solemn assembly for the election of Consuls, and because M. Emilius whole lot it was to be president thereof, could not be present at the day, C. Flaminius came of purpose to Rome. By whom were created Consuls Sp. Posthumus Albinus, and Q. Marcius Vibullius. After that were Pretors elected, to wit T. Manius, P. Cornelius Sulla, C. Calpurnius Piso, M. Licinius Lucullus, C. Aurelius Scamius, and L. Quinctius Crispinus. In the end of the said year, after the magistrats were thus created, Cn. Manlius Valerius, the great son before the Nones of March, triumphed over the Gauls who inhabited Asia. The cause whereof triumphed for late, was this, for that he would avoid making his answer (according to the custom) whilst Q. Terentius Culleo was Pretor, fearing he should burn in the flame of the same sentence and judgment whereby L. Scipio had been condemned, or lest the flame of another mans judgment, I mean the sentence whereby L. Scipio had been condemned, would have been too hot for him, and caught hold of him likewise: considering that the jury and enquest were more incensed and provoked against him then Scipio; for that he succeeding after him, had spoiled and marred with all kind of licentious looseness, the military discipline, which Scipio had observed most precisely and severely. Neither was he noted and touched in name for those things only which by bare hearsay were reported to have been done in the province, far remote from the view of men, but also of those particular instances to be seen daily in the demeanor of his souldiers. For verily the foreign excellence and strange superfluities took beginning from the Asian army, who brought all with them into the City. They were the first with in Rome that took up the use of brailen tables of rich counterpoints, carpets, cupboord-cloths, hangings and curtains of luscious kinds of stuffe. Likewise of one footed standing tables, buffets and cupboards, which in those daies were counted magnificent and stately moveables. Then came up the manner of having at banquetting painted wenchens, and such as could play upon the dulcimers or other instruments of musick, with dancers, jesters and other pastimes, and delightome pleasures and fits of mirth at the table. Then began the board to be furnished and set out with more exquisite and deincy viands, and of greater expence. Then Cooks, who in old time were reputed the most contemptible slaves, as well for calling as estimation, as for the use they were put unto, came to be in great request: and that which before time was a mechanical kind of manual service, grew now to be accompted a science of deep skill and understanding. And yet all these things that then bare so great a show, were scarce to much as small fees and tips, to the excessive superfluities that were to ensue.
- D Well, Cn. Manlius carried in triumph two hundred crowns of masie beaten gold, weighing twelve pound a peece: of silver 220000 pound weight: of gold 2103 pound weight: of Attick Tetradrachms 127000: of Cistophors 250000: of Philip golden peecees 16320. Also much armor there was and spoils of Gauls carried in few upon wagons: and 52 captains of enemies were led before his own chariot. Amongst the souldiers he gave a donative of 42 denarii peece, he doubled the same to every centurion. Also to every footman he gave double pay, and to every horseman triple. Many there were of all States and degrees, whom he rewarded with military presents for especial service; and those followed next after the chariot. The souldiers chanted such songs and sonnets, as a man might easily see they were compelled to feed the humor of a General desirous of glory, and one that made much of his souldiers especially: whereby his triumph was more honored with the affectionate favour of them, then otherwise recommended and celebrated with the hearty love of the people. Howbeit the friends of Manlius served him in good stead to win the good will of them also through whole soliciting & earnest endeavour, there passed an act of the Senat, that out of that money which had been shewed in triumph, there should be repaid unto the people that subsidy which had been levied among them for souldiers pay, and not yet contented back again. So the Treasurers of the City made true and faithfull payment with all diligence of 25 ailes and d. in every thousand [for the loan.]
- About the same time two Colonels came out of both provinces of Spain, with letters from C. Gatinius and L. Manlius the governors there: by which letters intelligence was given, that the Celtiberians and Lusitans were in arms, waisting and spoiling the lands of the Rom. confederats. The Senat referred the entire consultation of this matter to the new Magistrats. During the time of the Roman games that year which P. Cornelius Cethegus, and Aulus Posthumus Albinus represented, a certain malt or high pole which stood not fast in the new place called Circus maximus, fell down upon the image of Pallentia, and overthrow it to the ground. The L. hereupon made some scruple in conscience, and ordeined, that the solemnity of those games should continue one day longer, and caused two images to be set up for that one, and that the new should be all gilt. Likewise the Plebeian plaies were renewed one day more, by the Aediles, C. Sempronius Blaesus & M. Furius Lufenus. The year following averted the Consuls Sp. Posthumus Albinus, & M. Marcius Philippus from the stmy, from the regard I say of wars and government of provinces abroad, to the punishment of a certain intestine conspiracy at home. The Pretors last costs for their provinces, T. Manius had the jurisdiction of the citizens, and M. Licinius Lucullus betwene citizens & strangers. Unto C. Aurelius Scamius fell the governance of Sardinia, and to P. Cornelius Sulla of Sicily. L. Quinctius Crispinus was assigned to the higher Spain, and P. Calpurnius Piso to the farther. Both Consuls were enjoined to make inquisition into secret conspiracies within the City.
- There was a certain Grecian of base degree and condition, who came first in Hevynia; a man not endued with any of those arts, whereof the nation (of all others most learned) hath brought many unto us, as well for the erudition of our munde, as the trimming of our bodies: but affect-

ficing priest he was, and a divining wizard withal. Neither was it one that made out-ward profession of reaching men, and thereby getting a living openly, and so by an open shew of religion polluted their heads and minds with fear and horror; but the knowledge he had (sooth for certain hidden and secret sacrifices. These mysteries of his at first he taught but unto a few, howbeit afterwards they began to be communicated and divulged as well to men as women: and to this religion were added pleasures and delights of wine and good cheer, to the end that more customers might be allure and enticed for to have a liking thereof. Now when wine had drowned and dulled the understanding: when the night season, when the entermingling of men and women together one with another (and namely, they of yong and tender years, with those of elder age) had clean put out and extinguished all respect and regard of themselves honestly: there began first to be practised all sorts of corruption, for every one had all pleasures ready at commandment, and his choice of those whereto by nature he was more prone and given to lust after. Neither was there wickedness committed here, of one sort, namely, the abusing of mankind and womankind one with another without distinction: but out of this shop and workhouse proceeded false witnessnes, forging of seals, depositions, and testimonies; and more then so, wrong and untrue informations. From hence came the devilish craft of poisoning, and privy murders of the secret of kindred in one house: and the same to secret, that otherwhiles the bodies would not be found to be committed to the earth. Many sinful parts were there played by way of fraud, guile, and cunning confesage: but more by apart force. As for violence, it was kept close and hidden, by reason that with the hideous noises, with the found of tymbrels, labors and cymbals, there could no voice be heard of such as cried out, when either they were forced to villany and abuse, or beaten to death. The infection of this catching poison of Heurania, spread as far as Rome, like a contagious maldy. At the first the spacious capacity of the City, having been used to wink and bear with some enormities, concealed all: at length revealed it was to the Col. Postumius, much after this manner.

The Bacchanals detected.

P. Eburnius (whose father had served in the wars in quality of a gentleman of Rome with a City horse) left an orphan, after that his guardians were likewise deceased, became ward to his mother Dunonia and his father in law (her second husband) T. Sempronius Rustilius, under whom he had his bringing up. Now as his mother was wholly devoted and obsequious unto her husband, so his father in law had so handled the matter in his guardianship, that he could make no good, except thereof, and therefore his desire was, that either the infant his ward should be made away, or else obliged and entrallied unto him. The only way to compass and bring this about, was the corruption and abuse of the Bacchanals. The mother therefore upon a time called her son unto her, and told him, that she had made a vow for him when he was sick, that so soon as ever he should recover and be well again, she would present him to the priests of Bacchus to be consecrated and professed in their mysteries: and now, quoth she, seeing that by the goodnes of the gods thou art amended, and I thereby obliged by the bond of that vow, I will acquit my self thereof, and perform it accordingly. She bare him in hand therefore, that he must for ten dayes live chaste, and not touch a woman, and at the ten dayes end after he had taken his supper, and was well washed and perfired after the manner, she would bring him into the holy place of those sacred mysteries. Now there was a famous trumpeter, by condition a bondwoman enfranchised, named Hippala Pessena, too good, I wis, for that occupation which she used while she was a yong wench, and bondservant: but yet still after that she was manumitted and in franktate of a free denizen, she maintained her self by the same trade and manner of living. Grown he was into familiar acquaintance with the foresaid yong Eburnius, by reason they were neerer neighbours, and dwelt not far asunder: yet so, as she endangered not the youth one jot either in charging his purse, or touching his credit. For she it was that first was insomered upon him, and him the wood: and for as much as he had but short allowance every way from his mother and father in law, and by them kept hardly, he was maintained well by the bounteous liberality of this loving harlot. Nay, more than that, in continuance of time she was so deeply engaged in him, that when her own patron was dead, and her self at the disposition of none, she sued unto the Tribunes and the Pretor for another tutor, because she meant to make her last will and testament, wherein she desired Eburnius her only heir in remained or to all that she had. There passing thus between them the pledges and pledges of love, and they using to empart the one unto the other the secrets of their hearts, the yong youth by way of mery and pleasant talk, willed her one day not to marvell or think any thing in it, if for certain nights he lay aways and parted beds with her: for that upon a religious zeal and devotion that he had, he was minded for to be professed and consecrated by the Priests of Bacchus, and all to be allotted from a vow made in regard of his health. The woman hearing him say so, and troubled in spirit, Mary god forsend, (quoth she) and I would not that for all the good in the world. And better it were for me and you too to die both at once, then to do so; and with that she threatened, she curled and banded, wishing all mischief and plague to light upon him, that had put such a thing into his head. The youth wondered much to hear her words, and to see her so to fare and take into beyond all reason and order, beseeching her of all loves to be content, and to forbear those curled speeches, and said, it was his own mother, by the consent of his father in law, who had enjoined him to do so. And is it that father in law of yours, quoth she, (for peradventure I should not do well to blame your mother, that hatheth you by this action of yours to make shipwrack of your honesty and chastity, of your credit and good name, your hope another day, and lastly, to hazard your very life? Hereat the yong man marvelled much more then before

A fore, and desired earnestly to know the depth of all this matter. Then after she had prayed all gods and goddesses to pardon her, if for tender love and affection that she bore unto him, she could neither will nor chuse but reveal those secrets that indeed were to be concealed, she let tale out end and said: That she herself once entered into that chappel, when as she waited on her mistress, but since that she was made free and at her own liberty, she never left her within the doore. And upon my knowledge (quod she) it is the very shop and workhouse of all wickednes that can be devised. And now for certain these two yeers I sit past, there is not one professed and admitted to those mysteries there, who is above 20 yeers of age. There is not one professed and brought thither, she or he is delivered to the priests as a very sacrifice to be killed for they lead them to a place which resoundeth with yelling and crying with singing of divers concerts, B with jangling notes of cymbals, with thumping and beating of tabors, to the end that the voice of any one that cryeth and complaineth of force and violence done to the abuse of his or her body might not be heard. Now I beseech you therefore, and of all loves I pray you, that in any case by one means or other you avoid this, howsoever ye do: and plunge not your self headlong thither, where if you shall be une to enquire and suffer, and afterwards to perpetrate and commit all abominable wickednes not to be named. And never would I see the young gentleman here, until he had made her faithful promise to abstain and forbear such mystic and ceremonies. When he was come home, and that his mother was in hand with him, telling him what he must do this day and that day, and to forbear his flesh, denied and said plainly he would do neither the one nor the other, and at one word, professed and consecrated he would not be, whosoever came of it. His father in law was present and at one end of this resolute speech of his, his mother straightwies cried out and said, that he could not find in his heart to bespurn from Hippala one ten dayes, and that he was so far bewitched and envenomed with the charms and poisoned allurement and lies of that false serpent and perilous Hydra, that he had no selective regard either of his mother, or of his husband, no, nor any reverent fear of the immortal gods. The mother rated him of one side, she farther baited and cursed him on the other, till at last and they hunted him out of doors with 4 bondslaves besides. The yong man betook himself unto Eburnia, an aunt that he had by his father's side, and she welcomed her the whole matter, why his mother had thrust him out of her house by the head and shoulders: which done, by her advice and counsel the next day he opened and declared to her in great secret, without the hearing of any earthly creature, to the D Consul Postumius. The Consul commanded him to repair again unto him three dayes after, and so for that time dismissed him. Then the Consul in the mean while enquired of his wives mother Sulpicia, a brave and sober matron, whether she knew an old wile called Eburnia dwelling in the Aventine? Yes that I do quod she, and I know her to be an honest dame, and a woman of the old world, and few her like now a days. I would needs speak with her (quod he) and therefore I would have you send a messenger unto her, for to will her to come hither. Eburnia at the first sending came unto Sulpicia; and the Consul within a while followed (as it were by chance) into their company. Began to find some talk of her brothers son Eburnius: with that the woman eyes flood full of water, and with tears she began to bewail the case and mishap of the yong man; who being spoiled of all his goods and patrimony (by those who of all others should least have done it) was now at E home in her house, chafed and driven out of doors by his own mother: for that the least good youth (God blese us all and be mercifull unto us) was unwilling to be consecrated and admitted to certain filthy and detestable sacrifices (shall be true that is reported thereof). The Consul had enough now, and was fully persuaded of Eburnius, that he had told him no lie. Then he gave Eburnia leave to go her waies home, and requested his mother in law Sulpicia a storemaid, to send likewise for Hippala from thence out of the Aventine to come unto her (quod he) affianced and well enough known to all the neighbours of that street: for that I have somewhat to say to her. Hippala was somewhat disquieted at this message, to think that she should be sent for to so noble and honourable a dame, and knew no cause wherefore. But after that she saw the F all the Consul himself in person, she was attoned and (in manner) half dead. The Consul taking with him his wives mother, had the woman into an inward room of the house, and said unto her, that she need not be afraid, if to be she could find in her heart to tell the truth: and for assurance thereof, she should have the faithful word and promise either of Sulpicia (a lady of good credit and reputation) or of himself if need were. Only he would have her utter and declare what was ordinarily done at the grove of Similina in the Bacchanals, where they used to sacrifice in the night season. The woman had no sooner heard that word, but she fell into such a fear, trembling and quaking all over her body, that for a good while she was not able to open her lips and speak a word: but after she was come to her self again out of this trance, and by them G heartened and encouraged, she said, that when she was a very yong wench and a bondmaid, there together with her mistress, was there professed and consecrated: but for certain yeers of late, and namely since that she was affianced and made free, she was not acquainted with the place, nor will not what work was there. I can thee thanks for this yet (quoth the Consul) that thou deniest not how thou wert there entered into that profusion; but say on and tell out the rest as truly and faithfully. She answered again, that she knew no more then she had already disclosed. The Consul replied upon her and said, that in case she were taken in a trap, and that another came forth to her face & reproved her, she should neither find the face to pardon, nor have the like favour at his hand.

as otherwise she might if of her self she confessed the thing, forasmuch as he who had all from your own mouth, hath already discovered the whole. The woman knew where he was then, and was rewarded verily (as it was indeed) that Ebunius was a blab of the tongue, and had revealed this secret: whereupon she fell down at the feet of Sulpia; and first began in most humble manner to beseech her, that she would not suffer, that words of courte passed between her an entranced woman and her paramour, should turn not only to earnest and importance, but also to a capital matter, to touch her as much as her life was worth: for what I said (quoth she) was but to fright him, and not for that I knew any such thing. Posthumus hereat was chafed, and fell into a fit of choler: What? (quoth he) thou thinkst belike that thou art jelling and coggling with thy lover Ebunius, and forgettest how thou art in the house of a right worshipfull lady, and in communication with a Consul. But Sulpia on the other side, willed her to stand up, (affrighted I as she was) and withall, both exhorted her to be of good cheer, and also appeased the wrath of her son in law. In the end after she had taken a better heart unto her, she greatly blamed & found fault with the difloyalty and falshood of Ebunius for serving her so, and requiting her ill badly against for to singular a good turn that she had done him, and then said, That she stood in great awe of the gods, whose secrets she should reveal and divulge; but in greater fear of men, who no doubt for bewysing these matters, would be ready to tear her in pieces with their very hands. And therefore she brought Sulpia, and entreated the Consul to take some order for her, and to send her into some place out of Italy, where she might passe the rest of her daies in safety yet of her life. But of good cheer woman (quoth the Consul) let me alone for that, I will provide well enough, that thou shalt live at Rome, and that without all danger. Then declared Hippala the original and first commencements of these sacrifices and solemnities. At the beginning (quoth she) it was privileged place & consecrated for women only & they alone mediated with their mysteries; neither was it the custome and manner, that a man should enter in among them and three tell holidays they had in the year, during which time, the priests of Bacchus performed their ceremonies in the day time, and folk were admitted by them, to their religion and profession; and women they were all (and those matrons) who were created priests for that purpose, in their time & turn one after another. But Paculla Minia (a Campanian woman) when she was the priest, changed all, as being advertised and admonished by the gods to do so: for she was the first that sacred and admitted men, to wit, her own sons Minus and Herennius the Cernians: the altered the solemnity from the day to the night; and for three daies in the whole year, she ordered five or six very much, to serve for the attendance and ministry of these mysteries. Since which time that these sacrifices & ceremonies were thus divulged, & men and women intermingled together, & the licentious liberty of the night time also to help all forward, there is no act so wicked, no fact so filthy, but there it is committed: and more sinful & unnatural abuse there is, of mankind one with another, then there is of women. If any are either unwilling to suffer this foul filthiness, or belike themselves more dully in the beauly action and performance of them, the principal point and sum of their religion, to hold and beleve that nothing is unlaful whatsoever. The men shaking and wagging their bodies to and fro after a fantastical fashion, as if they were distracted & out of their right wits, seem to divine and tell things to come. The women, attired like the she-priests of Bacchus, with their heads unbound and their hair hanging loose about their ears, and take them out again light burning till, because they are made with sulphur vive and quick lime: and they say that certain men are by the gods carried away from among them, no man knoweth whither: such as they wind fall to a certain engine or frame, and hury them out of sight into certain hidden caves: and those be such, as either would not swear to be of their conspiracy, or be partners with them in all their mischievous designments, or endure against kind to be abused. The number & multitude of them assembled, is exceeding great, and grown now be another body of a people: and among them are some noble persons, as well men as women. But now for these twenty years last past, we deigned it is that none should be deduced and drawn to error, or most subject to be forced to suffer abuse and villany. When he had thus finished her information and discovered all, she fell down upon her knees again, and lay at their feet, and repeated her former supplication the second time, to wit, That he would lend her some house, whereunto Hippala might retire treated his mother in law to spare some void corner of her house, and there make her abode. So she allowed her an upper lodging in her house, and the stairs that led towards the street were stopp'd up, and the entrance turned into the house. Then presently were all the moveable goods and household stuff of Fessenia removed, and her family sent for thither, and there entertained. Likewise Ebunius was commanded to go and lodge with a tenant or client belonging to the Consul. Thus when both the informers were forthcoming and under Posthumus his hand, he declared the whole matter to the Senat. And after he had said every thing abroad in order, namely, what was reported unto him first, and what he had learned afterwards by enquiry, the Lords of the Senat were surprized with exceeding great fear, as well in regard generally of the commonweal, lest those conspiracies, nightly meetings and conventicles, might import some secret complot of mischief and danger: as also for doubt in particular, that some of their own friends or family should be accessary and culpable.

A The Senat yet were of this mind, that the Consul was highly to be praised and thanked, for that he had found out and brought to light this matter as this, both with so much care & diligence, and also without any tumult and uprore. Then they took order and ordained, Imprimis That the Consul should have an extraordinary commission to make leach and inquisition into these Bacchanals and night-sacrifices. Item, That Ebunius and Fessenia the informers thereof should not be prejudiced thereby, nor come to harm for it, yea, and that a recompence and reward should be propounded to others that could give light and reveal the same. Item, That the Priests belonging to these religions, be they men or women, should be sought out not only at Rome, but in all other markets towns, jaies and places of frequent resort, and conveyed before the Consul to be and remain at their disposition. Item, That proclamation be made at Rome, and edicts sent throughout of Bacchus, to tell any more into assembly or conventicle for those sacrifices, nor yet do ought pertaining to such divine service. And above all things, that information and presentment be made of all those that had frequented such meetings or conventicles, to commit whoredome or any such filthiness and wickedness. And these were the ordinances of the Senat. The Consul then granted that religion, and upon apprehension to keep them in free ward and large prison forthcoming for to be examined: also to the Aediles of the Commons to look well, that no service of the gods and ward throughout the City, and see to meetings by night, for fear that no more fire might catch at any place. To those three Communiaries or Triumvirs were five other Quinquavirs adjoynded assistants, who every one should watch well and take charge of all the houses of his quarter within Tyberis. Then the Consul having set them about these their severall charges, mounted up the Rosses or place of publique audience. And when the people were assembled together, then the Consul after he had pronounced the solemn prayer which Magistrates are wont to use as a preamble, before they make speech unto the people, began his Oration unto them in this wise. "Never in any of your assemblies, O Quirites, was this solemn prayer unto the gods, either to meet and convent, or to go to seek and needfull as in this, to advertise and put you in mind, that those be the true gods indeed whom your ancestors ordained, that you should honour, serve, worship, and pray unto, and not these here who prick & provoke (as it were) with goods of furies, your spirits and minds transported and carried away with false and strange religions to commit all wickedness, mischief & filthy lust. Surely for mine own part I wot not either what I were best to conceive, or how far forth to speak out and utter my mind. If you know not all, doubt I should give you occasion to be negligent; again if I discover all, I fear me that I shall affright & terrify you too much. But what and how much soever I shall say, be ye sure it will be far less than the greatness and enormity of the thing requireth. Yet endeavour will we so much to deliver, as may suffice to give you a warning and watch-word to take heed. This am I well assured of, that you intend not only by hearsay and bare reports, but also by the ringing noises and yelling cries in the night season that the Bacchanals have been a long time kept over all Italy, yea, and in many places throughout the City of Rome, which resoundeth again therewith. But what manner of thing it is, I am verily persuaded there is not one of you that knoweth. Some beleve that it is a certain worship and service of the gods; others suppose it is some fooltry and wanton pastime tolerated and winked at. But be what it will be, they think there be but a few interceded & employed therein. As touching the number and multitude of them, if I should tell you that they were many thousands, you cannot chuse but suddenly be afraid, unless I also presently shew you that they be of and of what quality. Know ye therefore first and foremost, that the most part of them are women; and from thence is spring the source of all this mischief. If there are there men indeed but such as for all the world resemble women, so innocent they are: such I say as have abandoned themselves as well to be abused as to abuse others: fantastical persons and bereaved of their wits by reason of excessive watching, past sense & even astonished with hiberning of wine without measure, with hooting, hollowing & crying all night without intermission. I this conventicle of conspirators is yet of no great force, howbeit it gathereth much strength, in regard that they multiply still; and their number is every day more than other. Your ancestors in times past would in no wise admit that ye should assemble together at a venture and without important and just occasion, unless it were either by raising a standard or banner upon the fortres for to levy an army; or to gather the people together to give their voice in elections of Magistrates: or that the Tribunes proclaimed a general congregation of the common people: or some of the Magistrates summoned them to an open audience for to hear an Oration; and wherefore a multitude were thus met together, there they ordained and thought meet to have a lawfull government and oversight of them. But what kind of night conventicles think ye first they might be & namely, where men and women are met and thronged together pell mell one with another? In faith if ye wist at what age they of the male sex are professed and made novices, ye would not only pity them, but also be ashamed and dismised. Think ye my masters Quirites, that young men thus professed, & having taken this oath, are meet to make soldiers of? and that ye are to put weapons into the hands of such as are taken out of their thinking and deservable Chappel? Shall these thus stained, polluted, and overwhelmed with filthy uncleannesses, as well of their own kind as others, fight for the pure chastity, for the honesty (I say) of your wives and children? Let's harm

Posthumus, for the overthrow of the Bacchanals.

had it been, if they could have rested so, and become only effeminate by their own unchaste im-
 "purity (for that had redounded most to their proper shame and dishonour) and not have abused "their hands to practice mischief, and busied their brains to contrive fraud and deceit. But never "was there in Commonweal either to great and dangerous a malady, as touching more persons,
 "or reaching to farther matters of greater consequence. For wot ye well this, that all the misall "parts committed for these late years, were it filthy lust, crafty cozening, or of wickedness what"soever, proceeded & sprung out of this one ungracious chappel and place of counterfeited holiness,
 "and no other. Yet have they not put in practice all their mischiefs, which they have most curbed-
 "ly compelled and sworn to execute. Hitherto their impious & detestable conspiracy hath bro"ken out, and passed no further than to particular and privat mischiefs, because they have not gal"thered force and strength enough to invade and oppress the Common-weal. Howbeit, the evil
 "encreaseth, and the malady spreadeth further daily, and by this time is grown to much, as it will "not contain within the privat fortune and condition of particular persons, but threateneth the "very main State of the Common-weal. And unless (Quirits) ye take order to prevent it, these "night Congregations may soon be as frequent and great as this present assembly, summoned by "order of Law and commandment of the Consul in the open day time. Now are they (singled by "themselves apart) afraid of you, when they see you thus all assembled together, but so soon as "you are retired either to your houses within the City, or farms in the country, & by that means
 "severed alunder they will surely meet together: devise they will and consult both to save them"selves, and also to ruin and destroy you at once. Then take heed to your selves: then shall you "(singled one from another) be in dread and danger of them all in general. It behoveth therefore
 "every one of you to desire and wish that all they who belong any way unto your charge wife

 "headlong into that gulph and sink of in-to, to hold such a person to be of their crime, with whom he "hath thus sworn and devoted himself to all sin and abominable wickedness, and not reckon him
 "of your own retinue and train any more. Moreover, careless I am not of your own persons in "this behalf, that none of you should be seduced and led away with error. For nothing is there "in the world, that deceiveth more under fair semblance, than false religion. For when the name
 "and Majesty of the gods is pretended to cover and colour naughtiness, suddenly there entreth
 "into our mind a scrupulous awe, which doth captivate and possels our conscience, for fear lest "in chastising and punishing human trespasses, we violate and offend some divine right and power. L
 "therewith. But of this scrupulosity discharged ye are, by an infinite number of Pontifical decrees, "and acts of the Senat, yea, and answers of divine Sages and Soothsayers. For how many a time and "often in the daies of our fathers and grandfathers, hath commission been granted to the Magi"strats, To restrain and forbid expressly all forrain sacrifices and strange lustriges? To chafe & ba"nish all odd hegd-Priests, Wizards, Tellers of Fortune, and Magicians out of the common place, "out of the shew place and theatre, yea, and quite out of the City? To search out all their books "of Magick and Prophecies, and to let a fire on them? Lastly, to abolish all other order and man"ner of sacrificing but according to the Canon, form, and order of Rome? For they judged (wise "men as they were, and deeply seen in all divine and humane laws) nothing so forcible to ruin
 "and overthrow religion, as when divine service is celebrated after some strange and forrain fa"shion, and not according to the ancient custome of the place. Thus much I thought good by way "of caveat to foretell you of to the end that no superstitious opinion should trouble your spirits
 "when you shall see us to demolish and overthrow the Bacchanals, and scatter these unlawfull "assemblies. For all this will we do with the good leave, favour, and grace of the gods. Who be"ing highly offended to see their divinity and godhead thus polluted with wicked and abomina"ble filthiness, have discovered the same lying hid in darkness, and brought it to light: neither in "their wisdom and providence, was it their will and pleasure, that such enormities thus detected
 "should remain unpunished, but be suppressed and extinguished for ever. Now hath the Senat
 "directed out unto me and my Collegue an extraordinary commission and warrant to make due "inquisition herinto by vertue whereof, we for our parts will accomplish our charge according"ly with all diligence and expedition. As for the night-watch throughout the City, we have gi"ven order already to the inferior Magistrats to look unto it. Likewise, meet and reason it is, "that every one of you according to his place and calling, quit himself well in whatsoever shall "be imposed and laid upon him: and especially to endeavour and prevent that no danger or mu"tiny arise by the maliciousness of those that are culpable and offenders. Then the Consuls com"manded the acts of the Senat in this behalf to be read openly: they propounded and promised "also rewards to all informers, that either converted and brought before them any such persons,
 "or presented their names if they were absent and out of the way. And look whosoever were thus "nominated and fled upon it, they would assign him a certain day to make his appearance: upon "which day, if he answered not to his name when he was called, he should be condemned unto
 "the information to be without the land of Italy, he should have a longer term let down to come "in and make his answer. After this, they published an Edict, forbidding (left any one should be de"sirous to sell or buy ought tending to flight and departure) to receive, conceal, aid or maintain by "any means those that were about to flee. After the assembly of the people dismissed, great fear
 "there was over all the City: neither was it contained within the walls, liberties, and territory only

A of Rome, but in all parts of Italy they began to quake and tremble for fear: and namely, after that "these came from their friends and acquaintance, touching the ordinance of the Senat, the solemn "assembly of the people, and the Edict of the Consul aforesaid. The next night following that day "(wherein this matter was thus declared openly in audience before the people) many would gladly "have started aside and been gone, but apprehended they were and brought back again by the Tri"umvirs, who had set a good watch at every gate. Many presents were made, and certain per"sons thus presented, as well men as women killed themselves. It is reported that there were found "in this conspiracy of both sexes one with another above eleven thousand, the principal heads were "known for certain to be M. and L. Lucius Romans both, and by calling not to good as Senators: De Pile.
 "L. Opimius of Falerii, and M. C. C. C. a Campane. These were the ring-leaders of the reit,
 "B from them arose all mischief and villany whatsoever: these were the chief Priests (for oath) and
 "the founders of this religion. To apprehend these persons with all speed no prohibitions were "neglected. And when they were brought before the Consuls, they confessed all, and for any let in "them, they might presently have been condemned. But such a number there was of them who fled
 "out of the City, that because the actions and goods of many men hereby were in danger to be "lost and perished, the Prætors T. M. Manius and M. Lucius were constrained by the Senat to give "thirty daies respite and delay for the pleas, until such time as the Consuls went through with their "inquisition. By occasion of the lame interpleg, (for that they whole names were presented, nei"ther made answer nor could be found) the Consuls were enforced to ride their circuit about mar"ket towns and places of resort, and there to hold Assize and Sessions for to make inquisition, and
 "C judicially to proceed in sentence against the offenders. As many as they found to be only enticed, "and to have taken orders, namely, such as according to a certain form of words, ended and
 "prompted by the Priest, had made their prayers (saying after him (in which was contained a detest-
 "able sacrament and oath that they took to commit all wicked acts and basely filthiness), and yet
 "notwithstanding had offered and done no such act either in their own persons, or in others, to "which they were obliged by oath) those I say they let still in prison and durance. But such "were defiled with filthiness of lust polluted with bloody murders such as were attaint and stained "with bearing false witness with forging and twisting of wills and testaments, with counterfeiting
 "of seals, and other such cozening crafts, those they executed with loss of life, and the number of "D them that thus were put to death surmounted those other that suffered only imprisonment. But "a wondrous multitude there was of both sorts the one and the other, and those as well women
 "as men. As many of the women as were condemned they committed over to their next kinsfolk, "or to two guardians under whose tuition and subjection they were that they might themselves "privately at home punish them accordingly. But if there were none to be found meet to do the ex"ecution, then they suffered publicly abroad in the face of the world. After this, a commission was "granted to the Consuls, for to overthrow and pull down first at Rome, and then throughout Italy,
 "all the place of these Bacchanals, unless in any of them there stood some old altar or image con"secrated. And for the time to come, by an act of the Senat a prohibition went out, that there "should be no Bacchanals any more either in Rome, or in Italy. Moreover, if any person made some "confidence of this religion, and held it for a devout, solemn, and necessary institution, and pro-
 "E ceeded before the Prætor of the City, that he could not lay away the same without prick, remorse,
 "and clog of conscience: then the said Prætor was to put the cause in question before the Senat,
 "and if the Senat (assembled in no less frequent than one hundred) would allow and permit the "time, then might the party solemnize that devotion and divine service: provided always, that "there were not above five persons present thereat. To assist him nor any common silver to be used "in the ministry, nor Offer-master nor Priest. Over and besides, another act of the Senat there "was joyned unto this, and the same moved by the Consul Q. Martius. That as touching those "persons whom the Consul had for the informers and revealers of this matter, the full authority
 "in disposing of them, should be wholly referred to the Senat, so soon as Sp. Posthumius had fini"shed his inquisition, and was returned to Rome. As for Cerinius the Campane, they ordained
 "F that he should be sent to Ardea there to lie in prison, and that the Magistrats of Ardea should "have a charge given them beforehand to look to their prisoner more straightly, that neither he
 "brake prison and made an escape, nor yet might have means and opportunity to make himself a"way. After a certain time Sp. Posthumius came to Rome again, and when he put to question be"fore the Senat, concerning the reward of P. Ebutius, and Hippola Festus, for that by their means
 "the Bacchanals were discovered, there passed an act and decree, That the Treasurers of the City "should deliver unto them out of the City Chamber 100000 asses apiece. Also that the Consuls "should deal with the Tribunes of the Commons for to prefer a bill unto the people, as soon as "possibly they might that P. Ebutius for ever might be exempt from fondlicity, and have his pension "and fee as if he had accomplished his term of service by law required, so as he neither were com"pelled to go to warfare against his will, nor the Consuls should assign unto him a publicke horse
 "G of service. Moreover, that Festus might have the liberty and power to make a deed of gift or "alienation of her goods unto whom he pleased, yea and spend the same and do therewith
 "what he thought good. Item, That the might be wedded out of her own family into what house
 "she would her self, and make choice of her tutor and patron to her own liking and contentment, "and her husband by his will and testament had so ordained and set down. Item, That she might "be wedded to one of frank condition or freeborn and that he who had espoused and married her,

should not thereby sustain discredit, or receive damage. Finally, that not only the Col and Prators H now in place, but also those hereafter to come, should provide and take order that no wrong be done to that woman, but secure her from all harm. This the Senat judged meet and requirit to be done. All these things were likewise propounded unto the Com, and executed according to the ordinance of the Senat. Finally, as touching both the impunity and also the recompence of other the Innomers, it was referred to the discretion of the Comius.

By this time Q. Martius also having finished the inquisition in his circuit and quarter, made preparation to go into his Province of Liguria, after he had received for to supply and make up his legions 3000 foot, and 150 horsemen Romans, besides 5000 footmen and 200 horse of Latins. The same Province with the like number as well of horse as foot, was decreed likewise unto his companion in government. Those armies they took charge of which the former year C. Fl. Minius I and M. Aemilius the Col, had: moreover, by an act of the Senat enjoynd they were to enroll two new legions besides: and withall they levied of the Latine allies 20000 foot, and 3000 horse: 3000 footmen also and 200 horsemen Romans. All these forces (setting aside the legions) it was thought good to be led to furnish out the army in Spain. And therefore the Col, whences they were themselves in person occupied upon about the forelaid inquisitions, gave command unto T. Menius to take the musters. And when those enquests were performed and done as is beforelaid, Q. Martius took his journey forth of the ewain towards the se ret and blind passes, wherein at all times they had their lurking retreats and places of late retreat: within those freights and passages which the enemies had seized before, he was environed by them in a place of great disadvantage where he lost 4000 K foundiers: with three ensigns of the se and legion, and eleven banners of the L. time allies which were all taken by the enemies. Also much armour and many weapons were thrown away there and there, by reason that they were embredmereth as they fled through the woody paths of the forest: neither did the Ligurians give over their chase, before that the Roman ended their flight. The Conful so soon as he was escaped out of the enemies territory sent his army away into divers parts of the peaceable country to the end, that it might not feel the same much his losses were empained, yet could not he for all that suppress and smother the bruit that was blown abroad of his unfortunat journey, nor cancel the remembrance of the overthrow: for ever after, the forest out of which the Ligurians humed him was called The freights of Martius. A little before the news of the affairs in Liguria, the letters out of Spain were read containing sorrow L mixed with joy: to wit, That C. Catinus, who two years before went as Prator into that Province, fought a field with the Luitan, in the territory of Albis, where 6000 enemies fell upon the sword: and the rest were discomfited put to flight and driven out of their camp. Afterwards, he conducted his legions to the assault of the town Albis, which he forced and won wither greater ado than before he gained their camp. But as he approached near the wall and took no good heed to himself, he was wounded, and of his hurt within few daies died. Upon the reading of these letters (importing the death of the Pro-Prator) the Senat was of advice to dispatch an messenger (to overtake the Prator C. Calphurnius) as far as the port of Luna, and give him to understand from the Senat that their advice was, he should make all the haste he could in his journey, to the end that the Province might not be without a governor there to command. The courier M which was sent, within four daies arrived at Luna: and but few daies before, Calphurnius was departed and had put himself in his journey.

Moreover, L. Manlius Acidinus (who was gone into his Province at the same time that C. Catinus went) struck a battell likewise with the Celiberians in the higher Province of Spain, but they departed on both sides out of the field with doubtfull victory: have only that the Celiberians the next night following dislodged and removed from thence: whereby the Romans had liberty and time both to inter their dead, and to gather up the spoils of their enemies. And within few daies after the same Celiberians having raised a more puissant army, of themselves gave the Romans battell near the city Calagurris. It is not set down in the history, what should be the cause why they were the weaker, considering their number was re-enforced: but foiled they were in fight and had the overthrow. Of the enemies there died upon 12000 and not so few as 2000 taken prisoners: and the Romans likewise were Masters of the camp. And had not Manlius been impeached and restrained in this train of victory (which he hotly followed) by the coming of Calphurnius his successor in government, the Celiberians had been utterly subdued. The new Prators withheld both armistice to their wint'ring harbors.

At the same time that these news came out of Spain, the plaies called Taurilia were exhibited two daies together in honour of the gods. And after them M. Fulvius set out (with great furniture in sumptuous manner for the space of ten days) his plaies which he had vowed in the Ætolian war. And for to do him honour and grace this solemnity, many cunning actors and players came out of Greece. This was the first time that there was represented at Rome the show of champions and wrestlers for the best game: then also was exhibited the pastime of hunting and baiting Lions and Panthers: and in one word, these sports were celebrated with as great magnificence and variety almost as the modern pastimes and games in these daies. After all this was holden a Novendia feast: during which, there was much sacrificing and all by occasion that for three daies it rained stones in the Picene country: and because it was reported, that the lightning in divers places, and in sundry sorts, had blasted and lightly singed the garments especially of many folk, To

A To the said feast, there was adjoynd a supplication of one day, ordained by a decree of the Pontifices, for that the Chappel of the goddess Ops (standing in the Capitol) was smitten with a thunderbolt. In regard of these prodigies, the Col procured expiation by sacrificing greater heatts, and so they purged and hallowed the City. At the same time word was brought out of Ætolia, that there was an Hermaphrodite or Scat found almost twelve years old. This was held for a detestable monster: and therefore order was given, that it should be kept out of the territory of Kentis, and killed out of hand.

The same year, certain Gauls from beyond the Alps passed into the territory of Venec without foraging, spoiling, and using any hostility; and not far from the place where as now Agueda standeth they seized upon a plot of ground to build a City in. Certain Roman Embassadors were sent about this matter beyond the Alps: where they received this intelligence and answer from the inhabitants of the country, That neither those Gauls took that voyage and expedition by authority and warrant from the whole nation neither knew they what they did in this.

L. Scipio likewise about the same time, let out his plaies for ten daies together: for which he said that he had made a vow during the time of the war against Antiochus: & he desired the charges thereof with the money contributed unto him by divers KK, and States for that purpose. Valerius Antius writeth, that after he was condemned, and his goods confiscated and sold he was sent in Embassage into Albis, for to take up certain controversies and differences between the two KK, Antiochus and Eumenes: and then it was (saith he) that the said contribution was made, and many skillful artificers and plaies gathered unto him out of all Albis, and in the end, under this Embassage, he moved the Senat for these games, because he had made no mention nor words at all of them after the said war: by occasion whereof (by Valerius his saying) he vowed them.

The year being now at an end, Q. Martius in his absence was to leave his Magistracy: & Q. Posthumus having fate upon the inquisition aforelaid, and with all diligence and careful diligence, that might be brought in to an end, held the solemn assembly for election of Magistrates: wherein were chosen Col, Ap. Claudius Pulcher & M. Sempronius Tuditanus. And the morrow after were elected for Prators, P. Cornelius Cethegus, A. Posthumus Albinus, C. Asinius Sella, C. Atilius Serranus, L. Posthumus Tappianus, & M. Claudius Marcellus. At the years end upon the relation of Sp. Posthumus the Col, that in his visitation about the enquests aforelaid, as he rode along the sea coasts of Italy on both sides, he found certain Colonies dispeopled and desolate, to wit, Spartum upon the Adriatick sea, and Excentum upon the Tisican. T. Manius the City Prator by virtue of an act new inhabitants there, namely, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Tullius and C. Rabius Tappianus.

The war against King Perseus and the Macedonians, which now was a breeding arose not upon that cause & occasion which most men imagine, nor yet from Perseus himself: for the first groundwork thereof was laid by Philip, who if he had lived longer, would have been seen in open action. One thing there was above the rest which stung him, at what time as the Romans imposed conditions upon him after he was vanquished to wit, That the Senat laid a bar for to be revenged of those Macedonians who had revolted from him: which he despaired not but it had been possible to have obtained at their hands, considering that Quintius in the capitulations of peace reserved that point entire and excepted not against it. Now afterwards, when Antiochus was defeated in the battel of Thermopylae, and that both Philip & the Col contented upon the several exploits: Achilus went in hand to assault Heraclea, and Philip at the same time the City of Lamia. Heraclea was no sooner forced, but Philip had commandment to levy his siege before Lamia, and the town was yielded to the Romans: and this he took to the heart. Howbeit the Col, appealed his challenge for the time, in that making haste in person to Naupactum (unto which town the Ætolians alter their rout were retired) he suffered Philip to upon which town the Ætolians alter to adjoyne also and lay unto his kingdom: those Cities which the Ætolians had taken from the Thessalians. Now had Philip chased Aminander out of A. Eonina and won certain Cities without any great ther, with the nation of the Magnetes he brought under his obedience. After this, he forced certain towns in Albis, which were troubled with the seditious variance of their principal and great peronages: by reason that they knew not how to use their new liberty, wherewith they had not been acquainted: he won those Cities (I say) taking part with those, who in this civil dissension were the weaker, and otherwise would have gone to the walls. By these means the wrath of the King against the Romans was well allayed for the present: nevertheless he ceased not all the time of peace to be think how he might gather more strength, and be able to war again, whensoever any good occasion should be presented unto him. He increased therefore the revenues of the Crown, not only by raising taxes out of all the fruits of the earth, and setting import and customs upon all merchandise brought into his Realm by sea from foreign parts: but also revived the revers & issues of the old mines which had discontinued, yea, & in many places ordained new. Moreover, to replenish his country, which by many calamities following was, was dispeopled, he not only took order that his subjects should multiply by forcing them to get, breed, and bring up children, but also translated a great multitude of Thracians into America; and for a good time wherein he was in repose and rest from the war, he bent his whole mind, and employed all his study how to make himself great, and augment the puissance of his kingdom. Then old matters and quarrels were renewed, which might whet his stomach, and kindle his anger against the Romans. For the complaints which the Thessalians and the Perrhaebians made for that their Cities were by him possessed, likewise those grievances which the Embassadors of King Eumenes laid abroad touching the Thracian Towns, which he seized and held by force, were heard by the Romans: so as it evidently appeared, that they neglected them not. But that which moved the Senat most was this, That they had intelligence how he intended to be Lord of Aenus and Maroneas: for the Thessalians they took less regard of them. Moreover there came the embassadors of Athamania, who complained not for the loss of some part of their territory, nor that he encroached upon their frontiers, but that all Athamania full and whole, was reduced under the subjection and jurisdiction of the King. The banished persons also of Maronea, who had been chased out of the City by the Kings garrison (for that they stood in defence and maintenance of liberty) made relation, that not only Maronea was in the hands of Philip, but the City of Aenus also. Likewise there came Embassadors from Philip, to purge him of all these matters laid to their charge, who averred, That their King and Master had done nothing but by commission and warrant from the Roman General. They pleaded and alledged, that the case of the Thessalian, Perrhaebian, and Magnesian Cities yea, and the whole nation of Athamania together with Aminander, was all one with the Ætolians: namely, That after Antiochus the King was chased and expelled, the Col, himself being employed and occupied in besieging the City of Ætolia, sent Philip to recover the States above named, which being vanquished in war, were now subject unto him. Hereupon the Senat, because they would not determine and let down any thing in the absence of the King, sent three Delegates or Commissioners, to decide these controversies, to wit, Q. Caelius Metellus, M. Banius Lampilius, and T. Sempronius. Upon whose arrival, there was published a general Diet of all those States that were at difference with the King to be holden at Tempe in Thessaly. When they were all met there in council, the Roman Legats, as umpires and judges, the Thessalians, Perrhaebians, and Athamans as plaintiffs and accusers, and Philip as defendant to hear and receive the challenges and accusations against him: the chief Embassadors from the said Cities, pleaded against Philip bitterly or mildly, more or less according to the several disposition or their natures, and the proportion either of affectionate favour or malicious hatred which they bare to him. Now all the question and debate touching Philopopolis, Lyceas, Pholioris, Eumeneia, and other towns about them was this. Whether those pieces, considering the Ætolians won and held them by force (& well known it was, that Philip had taken them from the Ætolians) belonged in right to the Thessalians of appertained of old time to the Ætolians? for Aetolus had granted them unto the K, upon these conditions, namely, if they were any of the apperturances of the Ætolians, and if they combined and took part with the Ætolians willingly of their own accord and not by constraint and force of arms. Upon like terms stood the controversy of the Perrhaebian and Magnesian towns. For the Ætolians had brought a confusion in all their tenures, by reason that they held and possessed those Cities, by taking their vantage upon divers occasions. Besides these substantial points properly to be decided, the Thessalians came in with their complaints also: For "that those towns (in case they were out of hand delivered unto them yet) he should render them spoiled, naked, and desolat, for over and besides those who miscarried by casualty of war, Philip had carried away into Macedony 500, even the principal flower of their youth, and abused them like slaves in putting them to base minitries & servile drudgeries, and look whatsoever by compulsion he redelivered to the Thessalians, he had taken order afore that they should be good for nothing. As for example (say they) Thebes in Phthia, the only maritime City for much traffick and merchandise was in times past gainfull and commodious to the Thessalians, and brought them great revenues and profits. But Philip had turned the staple and all the trade and negotiation by sea from thence to Demetrias, and having got bulks and hoys, caused them to bank and pass by Thebes and direct their course for Demetrias. Nay, he could not so much as hold his hands from evil entreating their Embassadors, who by law of nations are inviolable. For he foretold them in ambush as they were in their journey to T. Quintus, by which means the Thessalians all in general were so over-awed by him, and put in such fear, that there is not a man amongst them dare open his mouth, either in their own Cities, or in any of the Diets and Councils of the whole nation. For why? their patrons of whom they hold their liberty are content off, but an imperious Lord they have that sitteth over on their skirts, and pricketh them continually in the sides, and will not suffer them to live and enjoy the benefits granted them by the people of Rome. For take away from them the liberty of speech once, what freedom have they left? And even at this present for all the assurance and confidence they have in the privilege of Embassadors, they rather sigh and groan out their words, than speak frankly, and parley with liberty. And unless the Romans provide better in some good sort, that both the Greeks remaining in Macedony may be void of fear, and Philip also curbed and kept short for being too bold, it will be to no purpose at all, that either he was vanquished, or they enfranchised. He is therefore to be held in with a rougher and harder bit in his mouth, like an headstrong and unruly horse, that will not be ruled with a gentle bridle. In this sharp and eager manner dealt the last where- as the former had used fair language to appease and mollifie his anger, by being his grace to pardon them in case they spake their minds for their liberty, to lay down the rigor of a Lord and Master to bear himself like a kind ally and loving friend, & to take example of the Romans, and that to imitate, who chose rather to gain associates by love, than constrain them by fear. After audience given to the Thessalians, the Perrhaebians came in place, and alledged that Gonoscodon-

A "that it might be restored unto them. They demanded also to have a new and Eumeneia again. Then the Athamans put in, and spake for their liberty, and to have the ports of Ætolia and Poetum redrend unto them. Philip because he would seem more like a plaintiff than a defendant, & to accuse rather than to be accused, began himself also with complaint, he told them himself grieved, that the Thessalians had won by force of arms the City Atolus in Thessaly, that the apperturances belonging to his kingdom, Ascom, that the same Thessalians and the Perrhaebians together had forced Pera in Pieria, Ascom, that the same Thessalians and the Perrhaebians they had indeed laid it unto his leignory, but Perrhaebians which should be under Philip, & by no right in the world was annexed to the Thessalians & comprised within their charter. B "as touching the matters (quoth he) charged upon me so odiously, namely, of laying await for the Embassadors of frequenting those port-towns or abandoning those: the one is a meer mockery and ridiculous thing: namely, for me to give account what havens, merchants and mariners sail unto or arrive at: the other is clean adelic & contrary to my nature & that which I never could abide to practice. For these many years (quoth he) Embassadors have never ceased and given over, to inform grievous matters against me to the Roman Generals and to the Senat at Rome: and which of them ever to this day hath had more than a foul word given again unto him from me? Supposed & objected it is, that once they were tormented by the way as they were going to Quintus, but it is not laid withall what happened unto them. This manner of dealing & a consolation's worth of quarrellers: that fair would I have somewhat to say, & it never to false when they can find no matter of truth to charge a man withal. These Thessalians beyond all measure able to be kindred: & indulgence of the people of Rome, & starting as men who had endured a long drought, they drink over-greedily, pouring in their liberty & nothing else to it and know not when to make an end, and to break their draught: Like, for all the world to bondslave suddenly set at freedom beyond their hope and expectation. whole manner is to break out into bro, & terms and licentious language and cannot contain but revile an arrant at their very Milder. And at last, in a furious fit of choler he burst forth into these words. That the sin was not let and gone to bed for ever, but would one day rise again, this minatory speech of his nor eny the Thessalians took to themselves but the Roman also construed as a plan at them. Upon the words arose some bruit and murmuring in the assembly, but being in the end appeased & stilled, he answered D the agents for the Perrhaebians and Athamans in this wise "That the sale and condition of those Cities for which they stood, was one and the same, namely, that the Col, Antiochus and the Romans passed them unto him by a deed of gift: as having aforetime belonged to their enemies. Now if they who have given, will also take away the same, then (quoth he) I must needs quit my men of no regard and good for nothing, do more and manifest wrong to a far better and more faithful friend. For nothing is there in the world more thankless and less while accepted than liberty, especially with them who know no how to use it, & by abuse thereof will soon spill the grace of such a benefit. Then the Roman Delegates, having heard the reason and allegations of both parties pronounced sentence, That the Macedonian garrisons should quit the Cities above said, and the Realm of Macedony be confined within the ancient bounds and limits. As touching the injuries which they complained to have been reciprocally offered from one to another, there was a form and course of law to be set down which should contain a process and manner, how the matters between the Macedonians and the other nations might be reformed and composed. Hereat the King was highly offended and displeased, but the Delegates were their waies toward Thessalonica, to visit likewise the Cities of Thrace, and to hear their causes; where the Embassadors of King Eumenes made a speech to this effect. "If the pleasure of the Romans be that the two Cities Aenus and Maronea shall be free, it is not for us in modesty to say any more, but advertise & admonish them to leave the same in real and not in verbal liberty, and not suffer a gift by them granted to be impeached or intercepted by another. But if they have less care and consideration of the Cities and States planted in Thrace, yet more meet and reason it is that those places which sometimes were subject unto Antiochus, should fall to Eumenes rather than to Philip: by way of recompence for war-service in regard as well of the merits of his father Attalus during the war against Philip, as of his own deserts, who during the war with Antiochus, was personally present in all travels & dangers both by sea and land. And to this effect he hath besides an award of the ten Delegates passed already beforehand, who in the grant and donation of Chersonesus & Lysimachia, have no doubt given Maronea & Aenus likewise to be as dependants of a greater gift, considering the near vicinity and neighborhood of those other Cities. For as concerning Philip, what hath he deserved at the hands of the people of Rome? What right of leignory can he pretend, why he should plant garrisons in these Cities so far remote & distant as they be from the frontiers of Macedony? I wish ye would call for the Maronites, and hear what they can say, who are able to inform you more fully and certainly in all respect of the whole state of these Cities. Then were the Embassadors of the Maronites called in: who affirmed That the King had a garrison not in one place only of their City (as he had in other Cities besides) but in many quarters thereof: & one time to as Maronea was pestered full with Macedonians. And there they say they the Kings tutors and flatterers are they that rule all and bear the sway, & by one means or other, may be allowed to speak the Romans. For the complaints which the Thessalians and the Perrhæbians made for that their H Cities were by him possessed, likewise those grievances which the Embassadors of King Eumenes laid abroad touching the Thracian Towns, which he seized and held by force, were heard by the Romans: so as it evidently appeared, that they neglected them not. But that which moved the Senat most, was this, That they had intelligence how he intended to be Lord of Ætoliæ and Macedonia: as for the Thessalians, they took less regard of them. Moreover there came the Embassadors of Albania, who complained not for the loss of some part of their territory, nor that he encroached upon their frontiers, but that all Albania full and whole, was reduced under the subjection and jurisdiction of the King. The banished persons also of Macedonia, who had been chased out of the City by the Kings garrison (for that they stood in defence and maintenance of liberty) made relation, that not only Macedonia was in the hands of Philip, but the City of Ænus also. Likewise there came Embassadors from Philip, to purge him of all these matters laid to their charge, who averred, That their King and Master had done nothing but by commission and warrant from the Roman General. They pleaded and alleged, that the case of the Thessalian, Perrhæbian, and Magnesian Cities yea, and the whole nation of Albania together with Aminander, was all one with the Ætoliæ: namely, That after Antiochus the King was chased and expelled, the Col himself being employed and occupied in besieging the City of Ætoliæ, sent Philip to recover the States above named, which being vanquished in war, were now subject unto him. Hereupon the Senat, because they would not determine and let down any thing in the absence of the King, sent three Delegates or Commissioners, to decide these controversies, to wit, Q. Cælius Metellus, M. Baebius Lampilius, and T. Sempronius. Upon whose arrival, there was published a general Diet of all those States that were at difference with the King to be holden at Tempe in Thessaly. When they were all set there in council, the Roman Legats as umpires and judges, the Thessalians, Perrhæbians, and Athamans as plaintiffs and accusers, and Philip as defendant to hear and receive the challenges and accusations against him: the chief Embassadors from the said Cities, pleaded against Philip bitterly or mildly, more or less according to the several disposition of their natures, and the proportion either of affectionate favour or malicious hatred which they bare to him. Now all the question and debate touching Philippolis, Tricca, Phaloria, Eumeneia, and other towns about them was this, Whether those pieces, considering the Ætoliæ won and I did them by force (as well known it was, that Philip had taken them from the Ætoliæ) belonged in right to the Ætoliæ: or appertained of old time to the Ætoliæ: for Acilius had granted them unto the K, upon these conditions, namely, if they were any of the appurtenances of the Ætoliæ, and if they combined and took part with the Ætoliæ willingly of their own accord and not by constraint and force of arms. Upon like terms stood the controversy of the Perrhæbian and Magnesian towns. For the Ætoliæ had brought a confusion in all their tenures, by reason that they held and possessed those Cities, by taking their vantage upon divers occasions. Besides these substantial points properly to be decided, the Thessalians came in with their complaints also: For that those towns (in case they were out of hand delivered unto them yet) he should render them spoiled, naked, and desolate. For over and besides those who miscarried by casualty of war, Philip had carried away into Macedonia 500, even the principall flower of their youth, and abused them like slaves in putting them to base ministeries & servile drudgeries, and look whatsoever by compulsion he redelivered to the Thessalians, he had taken order afore that they should be good for nothing. As for example (say they) Thebes in Phthia, the only maritime City for much traffick and merchandise, was in times past gainfull and commodious to the Thessalians, and brought them great revenues and profits. But Philip had turned the staple and all the trade and negotiation by sea from thence to Demetrias, and having got hulks and hoys, cauled them to bank and pass by Thebes, and direct their course for Demetrias. Nay, he could not so much as hold his hands from evil entreating their Embassadors, who by law of nations are inviolable. For he foreclosed them in ambush as they were in their journey to T. Quintus. By which means the Thessalians all in general were so over-awed by him, and put in such fear, that there is not a man amongst them dare open his mouth, either in their own Cities, or in any of the Diets and Councils of the whole nation. For why? their patrons of whom they hold their liberty are so off, but an imperious Lord they have that fitteth ever on their skirts, and pricketh them continually in the sides, and will not suffer them to use and enjoy the benefits granted them by the people of Rome. For take away from them the liberty of speech once, what freedom have they left? And even at this present for all the assurance and confidence they have in the privilege of Embassadors, they rather sigh and groan out their words, than speak frankly, and parley with liberty. And unless the Romans provide better in some good sort, that both the Greeks remaining in Macedonia may be void of fear, and Philip also curb'd and kept short for being so bold, it will be to no purpose at all, either he was vanquished, or they enfranchised. He is therefore to be held in with a rougher and harder bit in his mouth, like an headstrong and unruly horse, that will not be ruled with a gentle snaffle. In this sharp and eager manner dealt the last where- as the former had used fair language to appease and mollifie his anger, byceiving his grace to pardon them in case they spake their minds for their liberty, to lay down the rigor of a Lord and Master to bear himself like a kind ally and loving friend, & to take example of the Romans, and to imitate, who chose rather to gain associates by love, than to constrain them by fear. After audience given to the Thessalians the Perrhæbians came in place, and alleged that Gommoedus

A "In a City which Philip named Olympia belonged in right to Perrhæbia: & carnell they were, that it might be restored unto them. They demanded also to have Ænus and Eumeneia again. Then the Athamans put in, and spake for their liberty, and to have the ports of Ætoliæ and Pæstum rendered unto them. Philip because he would seem more to be a plaintiff than a defendant & to accuse rather than to be accused, began himself also with complaint. He told how himself grieved, that the Thessalians had won by force of arms the City Ænus in Thessaly: that the appurtenances belonging to his kingdom, Ism, had the same Thessalians and the Perrhæbians together had forced Pæra in Pieria. As for Ænus, an Ætolian town without all question they had indeed laid it unto his seignory, but Perrhæbians which should be under Ænus by no right in the world was annexed to the Thessalians & comprised within their charter. B "As touching the matters (quoth he) charged upon me to do, namely, of laying await for the Embassadors of frequenting those port-towns or abandoning those: the one is a meer mockery and ridiculous thing: namely, for me to give account what havens, merchants and mariners sail unto or arrive at: the other is clean contrary to my nature & that which I never could abide to practice. For these many years (quod he) Embassadors have never ceased and given over, to inform grievous matters against me to the Roman Generals and to the Senat at Rome: & which of them ever to this day hath had so much as a foul word given again unto him from me? Supposed & objected it is, that once they were tormented by the way as they were going to Quintus, but it is not laid withal what happened unto them. This manner of dealing & a confusion of voerth of quarrellers: that fair would I have somewhat to say, & it never to fail, when they can find no matter of truth to charge a man withal. These Thessalians beyond all measure abate the kindness & indulgence of the people of Rome, & starting as men who had endured a long drought, they drink over-greedily, pouring in their liberty & nothing else to it, and know not when to make an end, and to break their draught: Like, for all the world to bondslave suddenly at a freedom beyond their hope and expectation. whole manner is to break out into bro, terms and licentious language and cannot contain but revile anarist at their very Muler. And at last, in a furious fit of choler he burst forth into these words. That the sin was not let and gone to bed for ever, but would one day rise again, this minatory speech of his nor eny the Thessalians took to themselves but the Roman Delegates, having heard the reason and allegations of both parties pronounced sentence, That the Macedonian garrisons should quit the Cities above said, and the Realm of Macedonia be confined within the ancient bounds and limits. As touching the injuries which they complained to have been reciprocally offered from one to another there was a form and course of law to be set down, which should contain a process and manner, how the matters between the Macedonians and the other nations might be reformed and composed. Hereat the King was highly offended and displeased, but the Delegates went their waies toward Thessalonica to visit likewise the Cities of Thrace, and to hear their causes; where the Embassadors of King Eumenes made a speech to this effect. "If the pleasure of the Romans be that the two Cities Ænus and Macedonia shall be free, it is not for us in modestly to say any more, but advertise & admonish them to leave the time in real and not in verbal liberty, and not suffer a gift by them granted to be impeached or interpreted by another. But if they have less care and consideration of the Cities and States planted in Thrace, yet more meet and reason it is that those pieces which sometimes were subject unto Antiochus, should fall to Eumenes rather than to Philip: by way of recompence for war-service in regard as well of the merits of his father Attalus during the war against Philip, as of his own desert, who during the war with Antiochus, was personally present in all travels & dangers, both by sea and land. And to this effect he hath besides an award of the ten Delegates passed already before-hand, who in the grant and donation of Chersonesus & Lysimachia, have no doubt given Macedonia & Ænus likewise to be a dependants of a greater gift, considering the near vicinity and neighborhood of those other Cities. For as concerning Philip, what hath he deserved at the hands of the people of Rome? What right of seignory can he pretend, why he should plant garrisons in these Cities so far remote & distant as they be from the frontiers of Macedonia? I wish ye would call for the Maronians, and hear what they can say, who are able to inform you more fully and certainly in all respect of the whole state of these Cities. Then were the Ambassadors of the Maronians called in: who affirmed That the king had a garrison not in one place only of their City (as he had in other Cities besides) but in many quarters thereof at one time: so as Macedonia was pestered full with Macedonians. And therefore say they the Kings favorites and flatterers are they that rule all and bear the sway, and one but they may be allowed to speak

"speak both in Senat at the Council-table, and in general assemblies before the people: they go away with all honours & dignities, & either are invested therein themselves, or else confer them upon whom they please. The best men, who stand either for defence of freedom, or in maintenance of the laws, either are driven their country and banished, or fit a cold & blow their nails, for any advancement they come unto; & being subject and thrall to persons of no worth, stand like cyphers and hold their peace. Somewhat they said moreover as touching the right of the limits to wit, That Q. Fabius Labco, at what time as he was in those parts, confined Philip within the bounds of the old Kings street or high way, which directly leadeth to Paroreia in Thrace, and in no place declineth toward the sea: but Philip afterwards had made a new cauley, and drawn it with a compais about, within which he empaled and took in the Cities & territories also of the Maronites. To these challenges Philip began far otherwise, than he did of late against the Theffalians and Perthebians, and in this wise he spake: "I have, quoth he, no matter to debate either with the Maronites or Eumenis; but now at this present I am to contest even with you (my Masters of Rome) at whose hands I have seen thus long that I can obtain no reason and equity. I thought it meet and right, that the Macedonian Cities, which had revolted from me during the time of truce, should be rendered again unto me: not for any great encrease of feignery that thereby should have accrued unto my kingdom (for small towns they are, god wot, and situate upon the utmost frontiers) but because their precedent and example might have imported much, to retain the rest of the Macedonians in their duty and allegiance. In no wise it would be granted, During the Aetolian war, I was enjoyed by the Consul Acilius to besiege and assault the City Lamia: and after I had been toiled out and wearied with maintaining skirmishes, raising fabricks, planting ordnance and engines against it, even when I was at the very point to scale the walls and force the City, the Col. reclaimed and called me away, yea, and compelled me to levy the siege, and withdraw my forces from thence. And for to make me some part of amends for this wrong done, permitted I was to win again and conquer certain small piles and forts, rather than Cities of Thessaly, Perrhabia, and Athamania. And even those also, may I say unto you Q. Caecilius, ye have taken from me within these few daies. And now forsooth of late, the Emballadors of Eumenis also (and God will) have premeditated upon this as a thing granted and without all question, That more reason it is for Eumenis to have & enjoy that which belonged to Antiochus, than for me, But my judgment is far otherwise. And why? Eumenis could never have continued in his Realm, unless the Romans, I will not say, had vanquished K. Antiochus, but surely if they had not waged war against him, And therefore is he indebted unto you, and you no waies beholden unto him, As for my kingdom, so far was it off that any part or quarter of it should be in hazard and jeopardy: that when Antiochus of his own meer motion offered to buy my society with three thousand talents, and fifty covered ships of war, together with all those Cities in Greece which I held in possession aforesaid: I refused all, and disdained his alliance, yea, and I professed openly, even before that M. Acilius came over with his army into Greece, that I was his enemy, and together with that Consul, was employed in what part of the war, which he charged and laid upon me. Also when L. Scipio the Consul succeeded, determined to lead his army by land to Hellaspont, I not only gave him leave to pass peaceably through my Realm, but also caused the high waies to be paved and gravelled, bridges to be made against his coming, yea, and furnished him with provision of victuals, And this did I, not in Macedony alone, but also throughout all Thrace, where among other matters, this was not of least importance and consequence, to restrain those barbarous nations there, from running upon them, and to keep them in peace and quietness. In consideration now of this kind affection of mine (If I may not call it a good desert) unto you, whether ought ye Romans in re:son to give me somewhat that I have, to augment and encrease my dominion by your largels and munificence or, to take from me (as you do) that which I have either in mine own right, or by gift from you? The Macedonian Cities, which you confels to have been parcels of my kingdom are not restored unto me, Eumenis on the other side, he comes to make spoil of me, as if I were Antiochus, and (mark I pray you the device of it) he pretendeth a decree of the ten delegates to colour his most shameless, impudent & cautious falsehood; even that by which himself may be most refuted and convicted. For in very exprels and plain terms it is thus written, That Cheironneus & Lysimachia are given to Eumenis. Where I pray you, and in what corner of the instrument and patent stand Enus, Maronea, and the Cities of Thrace? Shall he obtain that at your hands, and by your means, as given and granted from those ten Delegates, which he never durst so much as once demand and require of them? Tell me (if the thing be worth so much) in what place ye would range and reckon me? If your purpose be to persecute me as an enemy and mortal foe, spare not, but go on till ye have begun: but if you respect me as an King, as your ally and friend, I beseech you, repute me not worthy of so notorious and manifest a wrong. This Oration of the King in some measure moved the Commissioners, and therefore by framing a mean and indifferent answer, they held the matter still in suspense undecided.
If (I say they) the Cities in question were given to Eumenis, by vertue of a decree fell down by the ten Delegates, we will not change nor alter any thing therein. But in case Philip acquired them by Conquest and force of arms, he should have held them as the gerdion of his victory. If neither, we are of opinion, That the hearing and decision of this difference shall be referred over to the Senat: and to the end, that all may remain entire, the garrisons in those

A "those Cities, shall be withdrawn and dep. rt. These, I say, were the causes that principally estranged the affection of Philip from the Romans, and wrought discontentment in his heart: in somuch, as evident it is, that the war was not enterpried by his son Perseus, upon any new quarrels and fresh occasion: but upon these motives left unto him by his father to be pursued.

No suspicion was there at Rome of a Macedonian war; L. Metellus the Pro. Consul was returned out of Spain: and when he demanded a triumph of the Senat assembled in the Temple of Bellona, the same in regard of his noble and worthy exploits might have been obtained; but for example sake it was not granted. For an order it was in Rome, by an ancient custome of their forefathers, that no man might triumph, who brought not his army back with him unless he left unto his successour the Province fully subdued and settled in peace. Howbeit, Marius was allowed an indifferent honour, namely, to enter into the City by way of Ovation. In which solemnity he had born before him in a pompous pageant two and fifty coronets of gold. Moreover, in gold a hundred thirty two pound weight, and in silver six thousand three hundred. Also, he pronounced aloud in the Senat, that Q. Fabius the Queltor was coming, and brought with him ten thousand pound weight more of silver, and eighty of gold, which he meant likewise to bring into the Chamber of the City.

That year a great commotion and insurrection there was of bondslaves in Apulia. L. Posthumus the Prator had the government of Tarentum, and he sat in inquisition upon a damned crew of certain herdmen and graziers, who had conspired together, and aimed to rob by the high-way side, and in the common pastures belonging to the City; which Commission he followed with C. such severity and rigor, that he condemned 7000 of them. Many elaped and fled, but many were executed and suffered death. As for the C. s, long were they kept in the City of Rome, about the levy of soldiery, but at length they went into their Provinces.

The same year, C. Calpurnius and L. Quinctius the Prators in Spain, having in the beginning of the Spring led forth their armies out of their wintering holds, and joyned their forces together in Beturia, advanced forward into Carpantium, (where the enemies were encamped) with a resolution to manage and conduct the war with one joint mind and common council together. Not far from the Cities Hippon and Toletum, there began a skirmish between the foragers of both parts, that were gone forth to make provision: seconded they were from the one camp and the other, by flames whereof, the whole armies of both sides by little and little, came forth into the field to D strike a full battell. In this tumultuary skirmish, the enemies had the vantage, as well of the ground wherein they were embattelled as of the manner of fight and service. By reason whereof, both the Roman armies were discomfited and driven back into their camp: but the enemies pressed not upon them, notwithstanding they were put in great fright and much disordered. The Romans, in great secret and silence, the morrow after should be assailed, dislodged in the night before break of day, the Spaniards in ordinance of battell approached the trench and rampier: and being entred within the camp (which they found void and empty beyond their hope and expectation) they rifled and rancked all that the Romans left behind them, whilst they made haste away in the night season: from whence the enemies returned to their own camp, and there for certain E daies abode in handing leaguer and stilled rest. In that battell and in the chase together, there were slain of Romans and allies 7000: and with the spoiles of their bodies, the enemies armed themselves: from thence they marched to the river Tagus. The Roman Prators in the mean season employed all that time to levy and assemble new forces out of the Confederate Cities of Spain, and in comforting and encour. ging the hearts of their own soldiery after their fright, upon this adverse conflict and unlucky foil. Now when they had gathered (as they thought) a sufficient power, and took themselves strong enough, and that the soldiery also desired to be doing with the enemy, for to rale out and cancell the former ignomy and disgrace, they encamped twelve miles from the river Tagus aforesaid: and about the third watch of the night advanced their standards, and marching in a four square battell, by day light they were come to the bank of the F river (now were the enemies lodged upon a little mount beyond the water:) and incontinently they waded through with their arms, Calpurnius on the right hand, and Quinctius on the left. All this while the enemies continued quiet and moved not: but in the mean time, while as they wondered at their sudden coming, and devied how to trouble and disorder the soldiery as they should make haste to pass the river, the Romans had transported over themselves, and their bag and baggage also, yea, and brought all together into one place. And because they perceived by this time the enemy to stir and remove, and had no time to fortifie their camp, they put themselves in battell array. In the midst stood the fifth legion of Calpurnius, and the eighth of Quinctius, which was the very flower and strength of the whole army. Now they had a fair open plain all the way between them and the enemies G camp, so as there was no cause to fear any ambush. The Spaniards so soon as they espied two armies of their enemies upon that side of the bank which was next to them: all at once lifted out of their camp and ran to battell: to the end that they might surpris and empeach them before they could joyn and range themselves together. The fight was sharp and hot in the beginning: for the Spaniards of the one side were pushed up with the com. et and pride of their late victory: and the Romans of the other were galled and incensed for anger of a dishonour received, which they were not used unto. The battell in the midst (consisting of two most valiant
and

The Consuls having finished the levy of soldiers, and accomplished all things requisite to be done in Rome, led the army into their Province of Liguria. Sempronius departed from Pisa, and made a journey against the Aspan Ligurians; whereby, waiting their territories and burning their towns and fortresses, he made way into the forest, and opened the passages as far as to the river Macra and the port of Luna. The enemies took a certain mound (an ancient hold) where their ancestors sometimes had fortified themselves: but from thence they were by force dispossessed, by reason that the Romans overcame the difficulties of the avenues thertoe. Asp. Claudius likewise for so much that the Romans overcame the good fortune to his College, as having fought certain prosperous battles with the Ligurian Inguames. He forced besides six towns of theirs, and took many thousands of prisoners within them. Of the chief authors of that rebellion, he caused three and forty to lose their heads.

A together with his brother beſtirred himſelf, and without his Liſters attending upon him, travelled and laboured hard in all parts of the common place : notwithstanding the advetiories, yea and the molt of the Senators cried out upon him, and ſaid, That he ought to conſider and remember rather that he was the Col, of the people of Rome, than brother to P. Claudius : Why then fat he not ſtill in the Tribunal either as preſident and judge of the court aſſembled, or elſe as a beholder and ſpectator only, without ſaying any word himſelf ? Howbeit, he could not poſſibly be reclaimed from this diſordinate affection of his which he ſhewed in labouring for his brother. This election was divers times alſo troubled with the great debates and contentions cauſed by the Tribuns of the Commons : whiles ſome of them ſpake againſt the Col, others again maintained his ſuit, and took part with him, But in the end, Fabius took the foil, and Appius went away with the game, or B his brother, So P. Claudius Pulcher was created Col, beyond his own hope, and more than others looked for, L. Porcius Licinius held his own, and obtained the ſecond place in his courſe ; for that the Commoners went moderately to work, & ſhewed not ſo much affection and forcible means as Claudius did. After this, was holden the election of Pretors. And choſen there were, C. Decimus Flavius, P. Sempronius Longus, P. Cornelius Cethegus, Q. Naſius Annibal, C. Sempronius Blaſius, and A. Terentius Varro. Thus much concerning the acts achieved both at home in the City, and abroad in the war, that year wherein App. Claudius and M. Sempronius were Conſuls.

In the beginning of the next year, in which P. Claudius and L. Fortius bare the Consulship, when as Q. Caelius M. Rabius and T. Sempronius (who had been sent to hear and decide the controversies between the two Kings, Philip and Eumenes, and the States of Theſſaly) had made re-C to enter into their embassages; they permitted likewise the Embassadors of the said Princes and Cities, to enter into the Senat. Who related the self-same things again, which had been alledged before in the preſence of the ſoleſaid Legats in Greece. After this, the LL. of the Senat addreſſed another new embage into Macedonia and Greece, whereof App. Claudius was the chief for to visit and ſee, whether the Cities adjoined and affigned to the Rhodians, Theſſalians, and Perthabians were delivered unto them accordingly. They alſo had in charge to cauſe the garriſons to quit Eumens and Maronea, and to look that all the ſea-coaſt of Thracia, were freed from the ſubjection of Philip and the Macedonians. They were enjoyed moreover to go into Peloponneſus, from whence the former embage was departed in more doubtful terms than if they had never gone thither. Forover and beſides other things they were ſent away without any anſwer for their diſpatch: and al-D be they requeſted the Achæans for to aſſemble their general Diet; they might not obtain it. For which, when as Q. Caelius found himſelf diſcontented and grievouſly complained, and the Lacedæmonians withall made pitious moan that the walls of their City were demolithed and rased, the common people lead away in captivity into Achaia, and theſe fold, and the laws of Lycorgus taken from them, under which their City and Common-weal until that day had been maintained and governed: the Achæans excuſed themſelves moſt of all for the imputation of reſuſing to hold a Council; and to that purpoſe they rehearſed a Law and Ordinance, whereby they were forbidden expreſſly to call and publiſh a Diet, unleſs it were in the caſe of laying war and contracting of peace, upon occaſion that any embassadors came directly unto them from the Senat of Rome with letters, or commiſſion in writing. But for that this manner of excuſe ſhould not ſerve their E turn again afterwards, the Senat gave them plainly to underſtand, that they ought to take care and order that the Roman Embassadors might at all times have means of free acceſs to their Councils, like as they alſo reciprocally ſhould have a Senat hold for their ſakes, as often as they would themſelves.

After these embassies were departed, Philip was advertised by his Embassadors, that there was no remedy but he must abandon those Cities, and withdraw his garrisons: and herewith being mightily offended & angered against all, yet he discharged his choler only upon the Maronites, Unto Oromastus, warden of the ports and Eux-coasts he gave commandment to kill the chief of the adverse part. And he by the means of Cassander, one of the Kings supplicants and favorites, who a long time had dwelt in Macedonia, procured certain Thracians to be let into the town by night: & there he committed murder and massacre, as if it had been a City won by force of arms. And when the Roman embassadors made complaint to him, namely of such outrages committed so cruelly against the guiltless Maronites, and so proudly and insolently against the people of Rome; in that they should be killed and cut in pieces as enemies, unto whom the Senat had ordained restitution of their freedom, he made answer and said, that neither himself, nor any of those who belonged unto him, could do withall: but it was long of themselves and their variance one with another; whilst some of the Citizens drew to him, and others enlisted to King Emenes. Whiche way may (qd. he) soon know to be a truth, if ye will but ask the Maronites themselves: for this account he gave, that whilst they were all terrified with so late and fresh a massacre, there durst not one of them open his mouth against him. Appius replied again, and said, that they were not to make an enquiry in this convenient and notorious case, as if it were in any remote & doubtful: but if he would discharge and clear himself as innocent of the action, he should send to Rome Oromastus and Cassander, who were named to have committed the outrage, that the Senat might examine them upon interrogatory: This word at the first so troubled and dashed the King, that his colour went and came in his face, & he knew not how to keep his countenance. But after he was come again to himself, he made answer, That (if they needs would) he cared not much to send Cassander, for that he had dwelt & continued in Macedonia; but as for Oromastus who neither was at Macedonia, nor so much as in any quarter near unto it, how possibly could he be charged or touched with the matter? Now as he spared Onomastus the rather of the twain, and was loath to have him come in question, as being his more dear and honourable friend: so he feared him much more than the other, lest he should bewray and disclose the thing: for that himself had conferred with him thereabout: and besides, he had served his turn divers times as a Minister to execute, and been privy unto him as a complice to plot such like designs. Cassander also, as it is verily thought, was poisoned and made away, by certain that were sent of purpose to accompany him through Epirus to the sea side: and all because the villany should not be detected and come to light. Thus the Legats departed from the parley and conference with Philip, as shewing in their countenance, that they were nothing well pleased: and Philip on the other side went his waies as expeditious to levy war again: but forasmuch as his forces as yet were not sufficient to do any exploit, and because he would delay the time between, he determined to send his younger son Demetrius to Rome, both to purge his father of those matters wherewith he was charged, and also by humble request to appeale the anger of the Senat: supposing, that this young gentleman, who had been left as an hostage at Rome, and there had shewed a good testimony of a Princely nature and royall disposition, might much avail in the cause. In the mean while himself under colour of aiding the Bizantins, but in very truth to strike some terror into the Princes of Thrace, made an expedition against them: and when he had in one battell discomfited them, and taken prisoner their chief Captain Amadorus, he returned into Macedony, having left certain messengers to solicit the barbarous nations, inhabiting near the river Ister, for to enter and invade Italy. In Peloponnesus also the coming of the Roman Legats was expected, who by this commission were enjoyned to pass out of Macedony into Achaia: against whom because the Achaeans would not be to seek what to say, Lycortas their Prator summoned a publique Council aforehand. In which there was parly as touching the Lacedaemonians, namely, how that of enemies they were become informers and accusers, and danger it was, lest when they were vanquished they would be more to be feared, than all the time that they waged war. For during the wars, the Achaeans found the Romans to be their good associates, but now the same Romans are more friendly to the Lacedaemonians, than to the Achaeans, seeing that Arenus and Alcibiades (banished persons both out of Lacedaemon, and by the means of the Achaeans restored again to their place) had undertaken to go in embassage to Rome, against the Achaean nation, which had so well deserved at their hands: and there gave forth hard language against them, as if they had been chased and driven out of their country, and not restored thereto by them. Hereupon arose a great outcry from all parts of the assembly, for to put to question, what should be determined expressly of them by name, and in this fit, where all went by choler, and nothing by counsel, condemned they were to die. Some few daies after, came the Roman Embassadors, for whose sake a Council was holden at Clitorae City in Arcadia. But before any matter was treated on the Achaeans were surprised with exceeding feare, considering and thinking how this deciding of matters was not like to be managed and carried with any indifferency for their behoof: forasmuch as they saw Arenus & Alcibiades (condemned by them in the last Council) to be in the company of the said Embassadors, and no man durst open his lips and speak a word. Appius declared, that the Senat was much displeased at those matters wherof the Lacedaemonians had made complaint, namely, that first in a tumultuary way and conflict, they were murdered, who had been called forth by Philopomen, and came to plead and speak in their own cause: Then, after they had exercised their cruelty thus against their persons, to the end, that in no part their inhumanity should be wanting, they had railed the walls of a right noble and famous City, abolished their most ancient laws, and put down the discipline and government of Lycorgus, so renowned throughout all nations. When Appius had made an end of his speech, then Lycortas, both in regard that he was Prator, and also because he took part with the faction of Philopomen (who was the author of all that had been done at Lacedaemon) made answer in this wise: "More hard it is for us now. O Appius, to speak before you, than of late it was in the presence of the Senat. For then we were to answer the Lacedaemonians, who accused us: but at this present we have you to be our accusers, before whom, as competent judges we should plead in our own defence. Howbeit, we have submitted our selves, and undergone this unequal and hard condition, presuming upon this hope, that you will lay aside that accusatory heart which not long since you used, and put upon you the person of a Judge to hear with indifference and equity. For mine own part, considering that you ere while have but related those matters which the Lacedaemonians both here in place before Q. Cassius of late, and also at Rome afterwards complained of, I would think that I am to answer therefore, not unto you, but unto them in your hearing. You charge us with the murdering of them, who being called out by the Prator Philopomen to plead their cause, were killed. This crime I hold that it ought not to be objected against us by you Romans, no, nor so much by any other in your audience. And why so? because it was expressly specified in your own treaty and accord of covenants, that the Lacedaemonians should have nothing to do with the maritime Cities. At what time as the Lacedaemonians took arms, and seized by force in the night those Cities, which they were precisely forbidden to meddle withall; T. Quintius, if the Roman army had been in Peloponnesus, as aforetime no doubt we must needs think, that being thus surprised and evil entreated, they would have had recourse thither for succour. But since ye were loath to off, whether else should they flee and retire themselves, but to us your allies, whom they had seen before to help and succour Gyrtheum whom

A "whom upon the like cause they knew to have assailed Lacedaemon together with you? It was in your quarrell therefore that we entertained a just and lawfull war. Which being an act of ours, by others commended, and which ought not by the very Lacedaemonians to be condemned, and considering that even the Gods themselves have approved thereof in that they gave us victory, how cometh it then to pass, that you bring those matters into question which are by right of law warranted? And yet a great part thereof in no respect toucheth and concerneth you. That we caused them to come forth to answer their cause, who had railed a commotion of the multitude, who had forced the maritime Cities, who had railed them, who also had massacred the principal citizens, we are to answer therefore, and to us that properly appertaineth. But that they were murdered in the way as they came into our camp, was nothing to us, but your deed O Arenus and Alcibiades, who now (forsooth) are become our accusers. The banish'd Lacedaemonians (of which number those two also are and who at that time were with us) for that they chole the said Towns to retire into their habitations (supposing that their own death was sought, and that there would have been outrage committed upon them, they ran upon those, by whose means they were driven out of their country; even upon an indignation that they might not so much as pass their old age in banishment with safety. They were the Lacedaemonians then and not the Achaeans that slew the Lacedaemonians: whether justly or unjustly, that is not the question, neither knoweth it. But what say ye to this O Achaeans, how can ye deny that ye are, unable, in that ye have abolished the Laws and the most ancient discipline of Lycorgus? and withall railed the walls of Lacedaemon? And how is it possible that both these points should be objected unto us by the same men? considering that those walls were never built by Lycorgus, but contrary-wise (and not many years past) for to overthrow and annul the discipline founded by Lycorgus? For the tyrants of late daies built them to serve as a fortress and bulwark for themselves, and not for a defence unto the City. And if Lycorgus at this day should die again from death to life, he would take joy in their ruins and say that he acknowledged now his own native country and anient Sparta redeemed. You Lacedaemonians should not have expected Philopomen nor the Achaeans, but your selves ought with your own hands to have pulled down and destroyed, all the tokens and memorials of tyranny. Those walls were the very marks and as a man would say, the uniformly and deformed ears of your thraldom and servitude. And you who without walls for the space almost of 800 years had lived in freedom, ye and for a certain time also had been masters of Greece, became slaves during a hundred years, enclosed and restrained within walls, as if ye had been fettered by the feet. Now as touching the laws, which ye pretend to have been taken away by us. I suppose verily that the tyrants they were, who deprived the Lacedaemonians of their ancient laws: and that we have not taken from them theirs (for none they had of their own) but rather have given them ours: neither have we done otherwise than well by them, but regarded much the good of their City and Commonwealth: in that we have united them in our solemn court of Parliament and incorporated them unto us to the end, that in all Peloponnesus, there should be but one body, one State, and one Council. Then (I wot well) they might have justly complained to have been wronged, then they might have grieved and said they had not been well used. In case we our selves had lived under one kind of laws, and put them to be ruled by others, I know full well O Appius, that all my speech hitherto is neither becoming allies to use unto their allies, nor decent and meet for a nation that is free, but rather (to speak more truly) fit for slaves, bringing before their masters. For if that sound of the trumpet (if that voice of the drum) were not in vain, whereby ye ordained and declared, that we Achaeans before all others should be free: if the confederation stand firm and stable: if our alliance and amity be entertained and observed equally and indifferently; why demand not I of you Romans what you did after the winning of Carthage? Seeing you will have us Achaeans to make account unto you, what we did to the Lacedaemonians whom we conquered by war? Set case that we caused some of them to be killed, What of that? Commanded not you (I pray) that the Senators of Carthage should lose their heads? We have demolished the walls indeed, but ye have not only razed down their walls, but wholly razed them out of City and territory. But you will say the confederation in behalf of the Achaeans is equal and indifferent in outward appearance, and in truth and effect their liberty dependeth upon the good will and pleasure of the Romans, who indeed have the pre-eminence of the sovereignty and dominion besides: I know it Appius, as well as you can tell me yet and (although it behoveth me not to be) I am not overmuch offended and discontented theewith. But this I beseech you, let there be as great od and difference as ye will between us Achaeans and you Romans: provide this only, that your enemies and ours be not with you in as good regard and account, nay that they be not in a better degree and condition, than your allies and associates. For that they should be equal to us we have been the cause in that we granted them our own laws, in that we admitted them to be incorporated in the general Diet of the Achaean State and commonalty. But will ye have the truth? the conquered have not sufficient to content and satisfy the conquerors: enemies demerit more than allies have and enjoyeth those things which are confirmed by oath ratified and consecrated by monuments and instruments, or writings, or any engraven in stone, for a perpetual memory to all posterity, they would force and wrest from us even with our perjury. True it is, O Romans we honour and reverence you: yet and if you will needs have it so, we dread and fear you also: but yet so, as we both honour and also fear the im“ mortal Gods more than you. Audiente he had with the accord and consent of the greater part: and all men judged that he had spoken like a Magistrate indeed, and for the dignity and Majesty of his place: in such sort, as it was easily seen, that they were never able to hold their dignity and maintain their authority with the Romans, in case they went coldly to work and proceeded in mild terms with them. Then Appius answered and said, “ That he would gladly advise and persuade them, all that he possibly could, to be reconciled unto the Lacedæmonians, whilst they might do it with full contentment: for fear lest soon after they should be constrained and forced to seek unto them against their wills and maugre their hearts. At this word they all sighed and groined again: but afraid they were and durst not refuse to do that which they were commanded. This petition only they made unto the Romans, that as touching the Lacedæmonians they would change & alter what they thought good and not force the Achæans to sin against their consciences: I in disannulling those things which they had established and ratified with a solemn oath. So the sentence of condemnation only (lately passed against Arctus and Alcibiades) was reversed.

In the beginning of this year (when at Rome they had sitten in consultation about the Provinces of Consuls and Pretors) Liguria was assigned unto the Consuls for their charge and government, because there was no war in any other place, then the Pretors call lots for theirs. To C. Decimius Flavius fell the jurisdiction of the City: and to P. Cornelius Cethegus that of the between citizens and forainers: C. Sempronius had the government of Sicily, and Q. Nevius Mabo of Sardinia with commission also to sit upon the inquisition in case of poisoning. A. Terentius Varro was deputed L. Governor of high Spain, and P. Sempronius Longus of the low. Out of those 2 Provinces it fell out so, that there came much about the same time two Lieutenants, L. Juventius Tolen and K. Quintilius Varus: who having related before the Senat how great a war was now dispatched and finished in Spain, required withal, that there should be rendered praise and thanks to the immortal Gods for the happy success in the wars, and likewise that the Pretors might be permitted to bring away their armies. So there was a solemn procession ordained to be holden two dayes: but as touching the reducing of the armies, they gave order to refer it wholly to be debated at what time as there should be question about the armies of Consuls and Pretors together. Some few dayes after it was ordained that the Consuls should have with them into Liguria two legions a peece, which Ap. Claudius and M. Sempronius had the conduct of. As touching the Spanish forces, great contention there was between the new Pretors and the friends of Calpurnius and Quintus in their absence. Both sides had Tribunes and both had Consuls to take part with them. The Tribunes threatened to cross the act of the Senat: if they ordained that the armies should be brought home. The Consuls again protested, that if the Tribunes thus opposed their negative, they would not suffer any other decree and ordinance to pass. In conclusion, the respect of those that were absent, was of less importance; and an act of the Senat was entered. That the Pretor should enrol 4000 footmen of Romans and 400 horsemen: likewise 5000 foot and as many horse of Latine allies, to conduct with them into Spain. And when they had thus enrolled these four full legions, look what discipline there remained over and above 5000 foot and 300 horse in a legion, they should give them their congies and dismiss them of soldiery: first, as many as had served out their full time, and then those who had born themselves most valiantly in the war under Calpurnius and Quintus.

After this debate and variance was appeased, there arose another in the neck of it, occasioned by the death of P. Decimius the Pretor. Cn. Licinius and L. Poppius (who had been Ædiles the last year before) likewise the Flamin of Jupiter, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus, laboured to be in his room late deceased. As for the list of these rehearsed (because he was Ædile Curule) he shewed not himself in his white robe: but he made more means and laboured above all the rest, having to his adversary and concurrent the Flamin above said. At the first he seemed equal only unto him in the suit, but afterwards when he began to have the better of him, certain Tribunes of the Commons stood upon this point, and alleged, That his name was not to be accepted as eligible: for that one and the self same person might neither take nor exercise at one time, the function of two Magistracies: and namely both Curule or of State. Others again said, that it was meet and reason that he were dispensed with and exempt from the Laws in that behalf, to the end, that the people might be at liberty to elect whom they would for Pretor. L. Porcius the Consul was first of this resolution, not to admit his name: and afterwards, because he would seem to do by warrant and authority of the Senat, he assembled the LL. together and said, that he propounded and put to question before them, That for almost as an Ædile elected, he should be Pretor without all right, or any precedent tolerable in a free State: for his own part he was minded (unless they were of a contrary opinion) to hold the general assembly for the election according to law. Then the LL. gave their advice, that L. Porcius the Consul, should commune and treat with Q. Fulvius, that he would be no hindrance, but that the assembly for the institution of a Pretor, in the room of C. Decimius departed, might be holden by order of law. As the Consul was thus in hand with him according to the act of the Senat, Flaccus made answer, That he would do nothing unbecoming his own person. By this doubtful and indifferent answer of his he kept him in good hope (who expounded and confirmed as they would have it) that he would be content to stand and apply himself to the authority of the LL. of the Senat: but at the time of the election he shed more earnestly than before, complaining of the Consul and Senat, that they wronged and wrested out of his hands the benefit of the people of Rome intended unto him: and to bring him into ill will and obloquy

A obloquy of the people, they made much ado about two offices and a double dignity: as if all the world lay not, that after he were declared and pronounced Pretor, he would incontinently renge up the Ædileship. The Consul perceiving both him fully resolute and set upon a pitch in the elect, and also the favor and affection of the people inclined more and more toward him, brake up the assembly aforesaid, and called a Senat: where, in a frequent session of Senators it was ordained, That for as much as Flaccus was little or nothing moved with the authority of the LL. of that honorable court, he was to be dealt withal in a general assembly before the body of the people. When the people were met together at the summons of the Consul, he propoled the matter unto him before them. Flaccus relented never a jot, but persisted still in his opinion, and gave the people of Rome thanks for their favour, in that they shewed themselves willing to elect him Pretor, so often as they had time and place wherein they might testify and declare their love to him: which affectionate kindness of his fellow citizens, he never meant to reject and abandon. This constant and resolute speech of his, kindled and enflamed to great love and affection in them toward him, that past all peradventure he had been chosen Pretor out of hand, in case the Consul would have received his name. Much strife and debate there was amongst the Tribunes, one against another: yea, and between them and the Consul, until at length the Consul held a Senat, and there a decree passed in this wise. That inasmuch as the willful stubbornness of Q. Flaccus of one side, and the inordinate affection of men on another side, was such, as the solemn assembly for instituting of a Pretor in the place of the deceased, could not be holden according to the laws, the Senat agreed and resolved, that there were already Pretors enough, and P. Corneius should administer and execute both jurisdictions in the City, and exhibit the plays and games in the honour of Apollon.

After this troublesome debate about the election, was by the sage wisdom and valorous courage of the Senat suppressed, there arose another far greater, by how much the thing was of weightier importance, and the persons agents therein more in number, and for quality and place mightier. There stood in election to be Censors (and that with earnest endeavor and exceeding heat of contention) L. Valerius Flaccus, Pand L. both Scipio, Cn. Manlius Volsus, and L. Ennius Pompeius, all Patritii, and of commoners, M. Porcius Cato, M. Fulvius Nobilior, T. and M. C. both Sempronius, the one (named Longus, the other Udianus). But M. Porcius overwent them all by many degrees, as well those of the Patricians as also of the commoners, notwithstanding they were come of most noble houses. This man carried with him so vigorous a spirit and pregnant wit, that howsoever he were born and descended, it seemed he was able to make away of himself to advancement and honour. He wanted no Art and skill meet and requisite for the managing either of private business of his own, or publick affairs of State: cunning he was in country husbandry, as well as in civil policy. Some are advanced to the highest dignities and most honourable places by their deep knowledge in the law: others attain to promotion by eloquence: and there be again, who have risen and become great through martial prowels and feats of arms. But this man was by nature so trainable and pliant to all alike, that whatsoever he added and gave himself unto, a man would have said, he had been born and framed even from his mothers womb to it and to nothing else. In war a most hardy and valiant soldier: and in many foughten fields highly renowned. Being mounted once to high places of honorable calling, a right excellent commander he proved, and General of an army. In peace again, for sound counsel in the civil law, passing well learned: for pleading at the bar and making orations, most eloquent. Neither carried he himself so, that his tongue flourished only whilst he lived, as leaving no monument behind him of his singular eloquence: but it liveth, nay, it flourisheth still, immortalized as it were, and recommended to posterity in all kind of writing. Orations of his there be extant many, which he penned and pronounced as well in his own cause as for the defence of his friends: yea, and invectives also against others: for able he was to put down and weary his adversaries, not only by declining and accusing them, but also by pleading his own cause. Factions quarrels and enmities there were exceeding many, that tormented him: and he plagued others with as many: and hard it is to say or set p down, whether he were urged and pressed upon by the nobility, or himself courted and baited them more. Doubtless by nature he was austere and rigorous, his speech was sharp biting, and beyond measure plain and free: but he carried a mind with him that stooped to no desires and lusts whatsoever: his life so severe and precise, as it was untroubled and without all spot of blame: despising all fawning favours, and contemning earthly riches. In thrift and frugality, in sobriety, in patience, in suffrance of travail and danger, his body was fittest to the very best. And as for his mind and courage, it was such, as very age and time (which abstereth and consumeth all things else) was not able to break and damme: when he was fourscore years old and six, he pleaded at the bar for others: he made orations for his own defence, and wrote books: and in the ninetieth year of his age he convened Servius Galba before the people to receive his judgment by them. As all his life time before the nobility was set against him so when he stood now to be Censor, they pressed hard upon him: inasmuch as all his competitors (excepting L. Flaccus, who had been his colleague in the Consulship) conspired together, how they might give him the rebulle and put him besides the Consulship: not only for that their own teeth watered and they were desirous themselves rather of that honor: nor because they repined to see a new risen Gentleman, and one of the first held to be a Censor: but also because they looked for no other but that his Censorship would be rigorous and prejudicial to the name and reputation of divers men; considering how he had been crossed and hurt by very many, and was desirous himself to wait them a shrewd turn, and be meet with them again. For even then, whilst he laboured and sued for the place, he used minatory speeches, and gave out, that they only were opposed against him, who feared they should have a Censorship sharply exercised without partiality and respect of persons. And herewith he maintained and upheld the suit of L. Valerius with him, saying that if he had but him of all others to be his colleague, he should be able to repress the wicked enormities newly come up and rise in the City, and to bring in request again the ancient manners and fashions of the old world. Men were much moved in their respects and considerations; and so taught the heads of the nobility, they not only created him Censor, but also adjoynd unto him L. Valerius for his companion in that government.

After the election of Censors was ended, the Consuls and Pretors took their journeys into their several Provinces. all save Q. Naevius; who before that he could go into Sardinia, was staid behind no less than four months, about certain inquisitions of poisoning; whereof, he late upon many without the City of Rome, in corporate burroughs, market Towns and places of great resort, for that he thought that manner of proceeding more convenient. And if we list to believe P. Antias, he condemned two thousand persons.

Sensibly, L. Posthumius the Pretor, (unto whom the government of Tarentum by lot fell) did good justice upon great conspiracies made by certain grassiers; and with great care and diligence followed the enquiry of the Bacchanals, and dispatched the reliques thereof quite and clean. Many of them who were adjourned and made not appearance, but gave the slip and left in the lurch their families bound body and goods for them, and lurked in that quarter of Italy; he either judged and condemned as guilty and convicted, or caused them to be apprehended and sent to Rome unto the Senat; who were all cast in prison by P. Cornelius.

In the latter part of Spain all was quiet, by reason that the Lusitans were in the last war subdued; but in the hither part, A. Terentius reduced Corbis a Town of the Suetetans, which he assaulted with mantles and other fabrics of war, and sold all the prisoners: which done, he passed the winter peaceably in that higher part of Spain also.

The old Pretors, C. Calpurnius Piso and L. Quinctius returned to Rome; and both of them were with great accord and content of the LL. of the Senat allowed to triumph. And first C. Calpurnius triumphed over the Portugals and Celtiberians. In which triumph, he carried in shew 83 coronets of gold, and 12000 pound of silver. Within few dayes after, L. Quinctius triumphed over the same Portugals and Celtiberians, in which solemnity, there was represented in shew, as much gold and silver as in the former.

The Censors, M. Porcius and L. Valerius, whilst men hung in suspense between fear and hope what they would do, held a review and a new choice of the Senat. Seven Senators they displaced and deposed from that dignity: amongst whom, there was one of mark, for his nobility of birth and honorable offices which he had born, namely L. Quinctius Flaminius who had been Consul. An ancient order (they say) it was in time of our fore-fathers, That when the Censors had put any out of the Senat, they should note them directly for those faults which they had committed: and at this day, extant there be divers sharp orations of Cato, against them whom either he called and displaced out of Senat, or from whom he took away honours of service: but of all others, the fourest and bitterest is that of his, against this L. Quinctius; which if he had pronounced as an accuser before he had noted him with that disgrace, and not as Censor after the said note, his very own brother T. Quinctius (if he had been then Censor) could not possibly have kept L. Quinctius in the state of a Senator. Among other grievous matters he articulated against him, That he had trained with him from Rome into his Province of Francia (in hope of many great rewards) one  Philipus Pannus* notorious and costly Gaiymede. This boyas he was fooling and playing away from Rome, against the very time that the shew of sword-players at utterance was to be exhibited: and this he said, to shew how ready he was to satisfy the pleasure of him his lover. Now it chanced as they were making good cheer together, and having taken their wine liberally were well heat therewith, newscame and reported it was in the banquet time, That a certain noble man of the Boians was arrived, with his children as a renegat from the adverse party: and was desirous to speak with the Consul for to have assurance from his mouth of safe conduct: who being brought into the pavilion began to parly with the Consul by a truchman or interpreter. And in the midst of his speech, How fain thou (quoth Quinctius to that wanton dandy, his Catamite) because thou hast mislead and lost the sight of those sword-players at Rome, wilt thou see presently here this Frenchman die in the place before? He made not any great semblance unto him in good earnest of his desire that way: but the Consul at the first beck of that beauly filth and baggage, caught the naked sword which hung over his head, and first gave the poor Gaul a wound in his scorne as he was speaking unto him, and afterwards as he made shift to flee from him, and called upon the protection of the people of Rome, and the assistance of those that were present, Quinctius ran him quite through the sides, Valerius Antias, who never had read the oration of Cato, but gave credit to a flying tale only, without any head or authority, lest the tale with some other circumstance howbeit much like in substance of matter, as touching his lecherous lust and bloody cruelty. He writeth, that Quinctius whilst he abode at Plaisance, sent for a famous courtesan (upon whom he was enamored) to a banquet, and as he courted and made love to this strumpet, vanishing himself unto her, among other discourses he recounted with what rigor he had followed certain inquisitions; what a number of prisoners he had in irons condemned to death; and how many of their heads he minded to chop off. Then this harloty sitting next beneath him, said, That she had never in all her life seen any man to cut ones head off, and it was a sight that of all other she would faint fee. Whereupon, this kind amorous knight, to gratify the queen, caused one of those poor souls condemned to die, to be let out of prison into the banquetting room, and presently to be beheaded before her face. A cruel fact it was & inhuman, whether it were committed as Cato hath objected in his Oration, or as Valerius hath written in his story, that any human creature should be thus massacred like a sacrifice, and the table besprinkled with his blood, amid the cups standing full of wine and the dishes furnished with viands, where and when the manner and custom was to talk and take the first essay in the honor of the Gods, and that devoutly with grace and good prayers; and all to content and feed the eye of a wanton and shameless Harlot, lying in the bosome of the Consul. In the end of Cato his Oration, this condition was offered unto Quinctius. That if he would plead guilty, and deny this fact and others which he charged him with, then he should put in a real caution, and stand to his defence and trial: but if he confessed himself guilty then he would him to consider whether he thought any man would grieve and be sorry at the ignominy which he was to receive, who being transported beside his understanding with wine and women, made but a sport and pastime to shed mens blood at a very banker. In taking a review of the Cavalry or Gentlemen of Rome, L. Scipio Africanus had a great horde of service taken from him. This Censorship was likewise executed with severity and rigor to all sorts and degrees, and namely, in

C the pricing and valuation of their goods. For Cato commanded the Sergeants to take a note of all the ornaments, jewels, and apparel of women, also of their chariots and coaches: as if they amounted to the sum of 15000 asses, and to enrol the same in the Censors book. Item all bondslaves under twenty years of age, sold after the last tax or assessment for 10000 Asses or upward; that they should be valued at an higher price by ten fold than they were esteemed worth: and that for all these things they should pay and contribute to the City chamber after three in the thousand. These Censors cut off all water either running out of any common stream into a privat house, or derived into particular fields and grounds. And all houses either built by private persons upon common ground, or any wayes encroaching and leaning to publicke places they caused to be demolished and pulled down within thirty dayes. After this, they set out divers peeces of work to

D be wrought at a price, of that money which was ordained to that purpose, namely, to pave certain pools with stone, to scour the draughts and links where need was: and in the mount Aventine and other parts where none were already to make new. And particularly of themselves Flaccus caused the cautley or wharfe to be made against the waters called Nepesinae, that the people might pass to and fro that way: and also a street-way through Formianum, and Custitor his part built two galleries, Matinum and Tatium, in the Mines; and bought four shops for the City: he built there also the stately Hall or Palace called Poreia. As for the City revenues, they did let and let them forth to farmers, at an exceeding raked rent: but all the City works they put out to undertakers by the great, at as low a reckoning as they could. These leases and bargains, alreafaid being once cancelled by order from the Senat, and new made in the important suit and that with

E outcries and tears of the Publicans, as well farmers as undertakers: then the Censors, by proclamation commanded those to avoid far from the substation, who had dismilled the former leases and bargains, and with some little abatement and easing of the former rents, they denied the same profits and revenues again to others. This was a censorship of great note, full of rapine, ill will, and heart-burning, which troubled and molested M. Porcius as long as he had a day to live, for that he was reputed and held to be the author of that severity and rigor exercised therein.

The same year two Colonies were erected and inhabitants sent from Rome, to wit, Pollentia into the Picene territory, and Psaurum into the Gauls country. Six acres of land were assigned to every one of the coloners. And the same Triumphs, namely, Q. Fabius Labco, M. Fulvius Flaccus, and Q. Fulvius Nobilior, were they that both parted the said lands, and also had the leading and planting of the foresaid Colonies.

The Consuls that year achieved no memorable exploit at all, neither at home in City, nor abroad in war. Against they year following they created Consuls M. Claudius Marcellus and Q. Fabius, who upon the fifteenth of March, on which day they entered into their government, put to question as concerning the Provinces, as well their own as the Pretors. For there had been chosen Pretors C. Valerius the Flamin of Jupiter (who also the year before was in election for the place) Sp. Posthumius Albinus and P. Cornelius Silius, also L. Pappus, L. Iulius, and Cn. Sestius. Unto the Consuls was assigned the province Liguria, together with the charge of the same armies which P. Claudius and M. Porcius had conducted. As for both the Provinces in Spain [as we] beyond as on this side Iberus they were reserved with their ordinary forces, for the Pretors of the former year by special commission without casting any lots at all therefore. The new Pretors were enjoined for to dispose and part their governments, that C. Valerius the Flamin of Jupiter might exercise one of the jurisdictions of Rome. So he was L. chief justice for the forainers, and Silius Cornelius over the citizens, unto Sp. Posthumius fell Sicily, to L. Pappus Apulia, to L. Iulius Gallia, and to Cn. Sestius Sardinia. As for L. Iulius he was enjoined to make halt and let forward on his journey for the Transalpin Gauls (beyond the mountains) had passed over by the streights of the forrests and waies unknown beforetime, into Italy, as hath been before said, and were building them a Town in that territory, which at this day is called Aquileia. This Pretor had in charge to impeach them in that enterprise, so far forth as he might possibly without war and force of arms: and it there were no other remedy but that they must of necessity use violence, then to certify the Consuls thereof: for agreed it was that one of them should lead the Legions against the Gauls. In the end of the former year there was a general assembly holden for the choosing of an Angur: wherein Sp. Posthumus Albinus was created in the room of Cn. Cornelius Lentulus late deceased. But in the beginning of this present year P. Licinius Crassus the arch-Pontific departed out of this world, in whose place M. Sempronius Tuditanus was invested for the Bishop. But C. Servilius Geminus was created the arch-priest or high-priest aforesaid. In the honor of P. Licinius at his funerals, there was given a dole of flesh and a show exhibited of 130 sword-bearers fighting at sharp: likewise there were represented funeral plaies and games, which continued three days: and after that solemnity, a feast was holden during which, when the tables were set and spread accordingly all over the grand-place of the City, suddenly there arose a tempest with great storms, which forced most men to erect tents and booths there: but after a while when the weather was fair again, they were taken down and had away: and men commonly gave out and said, That whereas the Prophets & wizards had foretold among other their fatal prelates, that they should be forced to quarter & pitch tents in the market place of Rome: now that prophesie was fulfilled, and they were freed and excused from farther danger. And no sooner were they ealed and delivered of that tempest, but they were troubled with another; for that it had rained blood two daies in the court-yard of Vulcan: and the Decemvirs published a solemn supplication for the expiation of that prodigious sign.

Before that the Consuls departed into their provinces, they brought into the Senat for to have audience, the embassages come from beyond Sea. And never before that day were so many men of those foreign parts seen at Rome. For from the time that the bruit was blown abroad among the nations bordering upon Macedony, that the Romans gave no deaf ear to the complaints and accusations commened against Philip, and that many had sped well by complaining; every City and State in their own behalf, yea, and many privat persons in particular (for an ill neighbour he was to them all) repaired to Rome, in hope either to be righted and ealed of their wrongs, or to discharge their stomachs and be muned and comforted for their miseries. Likewise from King Enmenes there arrived an embassage accompanied with his own brother Athenaus to make complaint: as finding themselves grieved that the garillons were not withdrawn out of Thracia as also to inform that Phil had sent certain aids into Bithynia to Prusias who made war upon L. Enmenes. Now Demetrius (Philip his son) at that time a very young Gentleman, was to answer to all these challenges: and anealy peece of worke it was not, either to bear in mind all the matters objected, or to think upon the points of every answer accordingly. For over and besides, that the articles were many in number, most of them were of very small consequence and importance: namely, strife about limits and land-marks, about carrying away men and ravishing women: of dividing of carrel of mismitting justice partially and with affection, or else of none mismitting at all: of sentences given and judgments passed in causes either by force or for favour. The Senat perceiving that neither Demetrius could speak to these points and give them good evidence, nor themselves be well informed and clealy instructed by him; being moved also and grieved to see the youth to row a skholer in the e affairs, and therewith much troubled in spirit, gave order to enquire and demand of him, Whether he had received any notes in writing from his father as touching the premises? And when he answered and said, Yea, they thought the first and principal thing for them to do was, to see and hear what were the answers of the King to every specialty and particular. And thereupon they presently called for that book of his fathers, and then permitted him to read the contents thereof. Now therein were set down certain brief abstracts of pleas and defenses, to each severall point: shewing, In primis, that some things he had done according to the decrees & awards of the Roman Delegates and commissioners. Item, Whereas he had left some war undone, the default was not in him but in the very parties that accused him. He had interlaced between, certain grievances and complaints, as touching the iniquity and hard penning of those decrees; and how matters were not scanned and debated before Caelius with that indifferency and equity as was meet and requisite: and namely that without desert of his part, all men were set against him and insulted over him. The Senat collected hereby good arguments, how the heart of Philip was wounded and galled against the Romans. But when the young Prince excused some of these matters, and for the rest promised and undertook, that all should be done to the uttermost as it pleased the Senat to order and set down: then it was thought good to deliver this answer unto him. That his father had in nothing done better nor more to the contentment of the Senat than that he seemed willing (howsoever matters were passed already) to make satisfaction to the Romans by the means of his son Demetrius. As for the Senat, they could dissemble, forget put up and enquire many things done and pass: yea, and were persuaded verily in their hearts, that they might believe and trust Demetrius: as knowing assuredly, that although they sent his body again to his father Philip, yet they had his heart and affection with them still, as a sure pledge and hostage: and that he was a friend to the people of Rome, so far forth as his reverent duty to his father would permit and give him leave letting him withal to understand, that for to do him honor, they would send Embassadors into Macedony to the end that if ought had not been so fully effectuated as it should have been, it might be done yet in good time, without imputation of fault and blame, or perval satisfaction to be made by any thing hitherto omitted: yea, and desirous they were, that Philip should understand, that by

A the mediation of Demetrius and for his sake, he stood yet in good terms of peace and friendship with the people of Rome. These things intended and done for the increate of credit and reputation, presently turned to the displeasure of the young Gentleman, and in the end to his utter ruin and overthrow.

Then were the Lacedæmonians admitted to audience in the Senat. They moved many petty matters and trifling controversies: but those that principally touched the main point were these, to wit, Whether they should be restored again whom the Achæans had condemned, or no? Item, Whether they were justly or unjustly killed, whom they murdered? Moreover they put to question, Whether the Lacedæmonians were to be comprised within the general assembly and Council of Achæa: or, that this State (as before-time) should have their rights and franchises apart by themselves from all others in Peloponnesus? The Senat ordained and awarded, In primis, That they should be restored. Item, That the sentences pronounced against them, should be reverted. Item, That Lacedæmon should do service to that high court and public Diet of Achæa: and finally, that this accord and award should be engroffed, subscribed, and signed as well by the Lacedæmonians as Achæans.

Q. Martius was sent Embassador into Macedony: who also had direction and order given him by the same commission, to visit the State of the allies in Peloponnesus: for there also remained some troubles after the old quarrels and variances yea, and the Mælians refused to appear at the general council of Achæa. Now if I would set in hand to record the causes and circumstances of that war, I should forget my purpose in the beginning of my work, wherein I resolved not to touch at all any discourse of foreign histories, no farther than they were linked to the Roman affairs. Howbeit one memorable occurrence there happened, which I cannot pass by, namely, that albeit the Achæans had the better hand in war, yet it chanced that Philopomen their Pretor was taken prisoner by the Mælians, as he made an expedition to leize upon Oron by prevention, which the enemies were desirous to be matters of. Surprised he was in a valley of great disadvantage, and some few horsemen with him. It is reported, that by the help of the Thracians and Candiots, he might have fled and escaped: but for very shame to abandon those men of arms, which were the noblest Gentlemen of that nation, & whom he lately had made choice of, and not the power to do otherwise, but stay to see the last. For whilst he gave himself behind in the rearward, because he was desirous to make means for their evasion through the straits of that pass, and to that purpose valiantly received the charge of the enemies, his horse fell and cast him at once: so as with his own fall and his horse lying upon him he had like to have gone away in a swoon: a man now three or four years old and ten; and withal, newly crept abroad and recovered of a long and lingering disease, which had mightily wasted and consumed the strength of his body. Well, thus lay he along, and the enemies ran over him: and so soon as they knew who he was, they reared him upon his feet from under his horse, no less respectful than if he had been their own General: in regard of a reverence they bare unto the man, and in remembrance of his noble exploits: they brought him again to himself, and forth of that by valley standing out of the pass, they carried him into the high way: and were so far possessed and overcome with joy to unexpected that they could not well believe their own eyes that they had gotten him. Some dispatched van-couriers to Messene with the news hereof: namely, that the war was brought to an end, considering that Philopomen was taken and was their prisoner. At first the tidings seemed so incredible, that the former messenger was held not only for a vain liar, but also for one not well in his wits: but after that there came one after another, and all with one voice verified and affirmed the same at length it was believed. And then, see what they did! before they knew for certain that he approached near unto the City: they all ran forth of the gates by heaps to see the man: all (I say) bond as well as free, women and children one with another. In so much, as the gates were choaked up with the thrust and throng of the press: for no man could believe assuredly it was true, the thing was so strange unless he might see him with his own eyes. They that had the charge of bringing him, found much ado to put by the multitude whom they encountered, and to enter in at the gate: and so thick they stood in the press, that they took up all the wayes besides, so as he could not be brought forth to be seen. Now because the most part of the people might not possibly have a sight of him, they gat up all at once into the Theatre, which stood near unto the way, and pelted it full: and with one voice they cried aloud, That he might be brought thither and presented unto the view of the whole people. The Magistrates and principal citizens, fearing lest the compassion that might arise in mens hearts upon the beholding of so worthy a personage would raise some trouble and commotion: whilst some comparing the reverence of his former authority and Majesty with his present condition and calamity: and others calling to remembrance his manifold dejects and passing good turns, might haply be touched with pity: let him a far off in the open sight of them all, and then at once took him hastily out of their view: for their Pretor Dinocrates gave out openly and said, That the Magistrates were to enquire and demand certain points of him as touching the main issue of the civil war. Then he was brought into their Council-Chamber where their Senat assembled and began to consult about him. It was now well toward evening; and so far off they were from resolving in other matters, that they could not bethink themselves and agree in what place they might keep him that one night in safeguard. Attoned they were and amazed, to consider and think upon the greatness of his estate past, and of his noble vertue and valour: and no man durst receive the charge and custody of him in his own house, nor trust any one besides with:

his keeping. At length some there were, that put them in mind of the publick treasury of the City, vaulted under the ground like a dungeon, and walled all about with strong square stone. Into it was he let down bound as he was, and a mighty huge stone (being the cover of the vault) was by an engine laid over, to enclose him sure. Thus reposing more trust for his safe custody in that place than in any person, they waited and attended the next morning. When morrow day was come, the whole entire multitude in general, recommending the benefits and good turns done of old by him to their City, were of mind to pardon and spare him, and by his means and mediation, to seek for remedies and redress of their present distresses and calamities. But those persons by whose motive and inducement the Messenians had revolted (and such were they as ruled all the common-weal) consulted apart in secret, and concluded with one consent to put him to death: only the doubt and question was, whether they should do the thing with speed, or by I delay. But those prevailed in the end, who were more greedy of present revenge, and so they sent one unto him with a draught of poison. When he had taken the cup in his hand (by report) he gave not a word, but only asked, whether Lycurus (the other General of the Achæans) were escaped alive, and the foresaid horrid men safe? When answer was made, that they were in safety: That is happy, (quoth he) and therewith drunk off every drop in the cup right heartily, and a while after yielded up his vital breath. But long joyed they not of his death who were the bloody authors of this cruelty: for the City of Messene being conquered by force of arms, among other captivities, delivered these malefactors into the hands of the Achæans, who demanded presently to have them. The bones and reliques of Philopomen were likewise rendred unto them, and interred he was by the general Council of all Achæans, in such solemn wife, that in heaping upon him all honours that could be devised for an earthly man, they forbore not also to adore him as a God-immortal. The Historiographers, as well Greek as Latine, attribute so much unto this man, that some of them have recommended to posterity (as a memorable thing of all others that hapned this year) to wit, that in this one year there died three renowned Captains, Philopomen, Antibal, and P. Scipio. See how they have matched him in equality with the greatest warriors and noblest Generals of the two most puissant nations in the whole world!

Then came T. Quintus Flaminius in embassy to King Prusias, whom the Romans had in suspicion and jealousy, both for that he had received Agathus after the flight of Antiochus, and also because he made war upon Fumeve. Now, were it that among other matters Flaminius charged Prusias, that he entertained in his court the most implacable enemy of all men living, unto the people of Rome: who first solicited his own native country to take arms against the Romans, and after the force and power thereof was abated and defeated, persuaded King Antiochus to do the like: or rather that Prusias of his own accord to gratify Flaminius there present, and to do the Romans a pleasure, had not a meaning and intent either to kill Antibal, or to deliver him alive into their hands. I wot not how it came about, but upon the first communication and conference between them, there were soldiers sent incontinently to belet and guard his house. Antibal evermore forsook in mind some such issue and end of his life, seeing the deadly and insupportable hatred that the Romans bare unto him: reposing besides no confidence at all in the fidelity of these Kings, and having withal some experience already of the inconstancy and levity of King Prusias. Moreover, he had in horrore this coming of Flaminius, as fatal unto him, and a mean to M work his final destruction. To the end therefore he might be ever provided aforehand against those inconveniences and dangers, wherewith on all sides he was encumbered, and have a ready way of evasion to save himself, he had devised and caused to be made seven doores for egress out of his house, wherof some were very privy and secret vaults, because they should not be environed with guards. But Kings commandments are of that force, that whatsoever they would have to be leached out and discovered, cannot long be hidden. For the guards so compassed and enclosed the whole circuit of the house, that it was impossible for any to get forth and make an escape. Antibal being advertised that the Kings soldiers were at the gate, assailed to steal away at a postern, which stood furthest out of the way, and wherof the conveyance was most secret, but perceiving that the soldiers had beset it too, and lay for to encounter and receive him that way, N since that they think it so long to stay for the death of one old man, Flaminius shall obtain no great nor memorable victory of me, disarmed thus as I am, and betrayed into his hands. But this very day shall prove and testify, how far the people of Rome are degenerate and changed from their ancient manners. Their forefathers (quoth he) advertised King Pyrrhus their enemy armed in field, and lying with an host of men against them in Italy, they gave him warning I say to take heed of poison: but these living at this day, have sent their Ambassador, even one that hath the bourn dignity of a Consul, to advise and counsel Prusias wickedly to take the life away of his own guest. Then after he had cursed the person of Prusias and his whole realm, and called upon the Gods protectors of the law of hospitality, to bear witness how he had violated his faith and broken promise with him, he set up of poison to his mouth, and drank it off. This was the end of Antibal, Polixenus, and Rutilius write, that Scipio also died this year. But I accord neither with them nor with Valerius. From them I square, because I find that when M. Porcius and L. Valerius were Censors, the same L. Valerius being Censor, was elected President of the Senat, where-

A as Africanus had been President for ten years space together, during the time of two reviews by Censors next before. And so long as the said Africanus lived, there would have been no other chosen President in his room, unless himself were to have been called and deprived of the Senators dignity, of which disgrace and note of infamy, there is not one that maketh any mention. And as for P. Servius Autus, he is sufficiently rebuted by M. Nevius a Tribune of the Commons, against whom there is an Oration extant, and the same penned by P. Africanus, and bearing his name. This Nevius is recorded in the rolls and registers of Magistrates, by the title of Tribune of the Commons in that year when P. Claudius and L. Porcius were Consuls, but he entered into his office during the Consulship of App. Claudius and L. Sempronius, the tenth of December. From which time to the fifteenth of March are three months, upon which day Pub. Claudius and L. Porcius began their Consulship. So it seemeth that he was living during the Tribuneship of Nevius, and that he might well commence an action against him, and call him to his answer, but he departed this life before that L. Cato and M. Porcius were Censors. But in my conceit the death of these three (the most renowned personages each one of their own nation) are not to be compared one with the other in this regard, that they hapned all just at one time more than for this, that none of them all had an end correspondent and answerable to the pious state and glorious lustre of his life. For first and foremost in this they all jumped together, that they neither did nor were entered in their native country. Again, Antibal and Philopomen were both poisoned, Antibal was banished and betrayed by his own friend and host Phisopomen was taken prisoner and left his life in prison and irons. As for Scipio, although he was neither exiled nor condemned, yet making default of appearance at the day assigned unto him and being cited to his answer in his absence, willingly bannished not himself only for his life time, but his corps and funerals also after his death.

Whiles these affairs passed in P. Servius (from whence our pen hath a little diverted and digressed) the return of Demetrius and the Embassadors into Macedony, diversly wrought in mens minds, and amused them some in one thing, and some in another. The common people of Macedony, who were mightily afraid that the Romans would make war upon them, highly affected Demetrius, and cast a favourable aspect upon him as the author of peace and which they destined him without all doubt to the Kingdom, after the decease of his father. For albeit he were younger than his brother Perseus, yet men thought and spake, that he was begotten in matrimony by Philip of his lawful wife, whereas he had Perseus by a concubine, who carried no token and mark of D a certain father, as having to his mother a woman that was nought of her body and common. Whereas Demetrius resembled his father Philip, and was as like him as might be, Moreover, men said, that the Romans would place and establish Demetrius in the Royal throne of his father, but Perseus was in no credit and reputation among them. Thus folk stuck not to give out abroad in their common talk. Whereupon not only Perseus was in care and doubt, that the preeminence of age only would little boot and advantage him, considering in all respects else he was inferior to his brother, but Philip also himself, supposing verily that it would hardly lie in his power to leave the inheritance of the crown to whom he pleased, thought that his younger son was more in his eye, and troubled him more than was for his ease. Ordered otherwise he was, that the Macedonians resorted unto him so much as they did, and highly displeased that there should be E any more royal courts than one in his realm, during his life. And to speak a truth, the young Prince himself returned from Rome more puffed up, no doubt with pride than with becoming: as who presumed and grounded much upon the opinion that the Senat had of him, perceiving that they had granted those things to him which had been denied unto his father before: but look how much favour and honor (in respect of the Romans) he won among the rest of the Macedonians, so much envy and ill will he procured himself thereby not only with his father, but with his father also: and especially after that other Roman Embassadors were arrived, and that Philip was forced to part with Thrace and withdraw his garisons, and to do other things either by virtue of the old award of the first commissioners, or by a new ordinance of the Senat. We have performed all but with an heavy heart and many a deep sigh and groan, and so much the rather, because he observed and saw how his son Demetrius converted more with the Embassadors, and frequented their company oftner than his. Howbeit he obeyed, and did whatsoever was enjoined him by the Romans, because he would minister unto them no occasion of giving war against him out of hand. And supposing it was good policy to avert their minds from all suspicion that he minded any such designs tending that way, he led his army into the midst of Thrace against the Odryans, Dantheites, and Bessians. He won the City Philippopolis, abandoned by the inhabitants who were fled, and had retired themselves with their whole families to the high mountains next adjoining: and after he had wasted the Lands and territories of the Berberians that inhabited the champain country, he received them under his subjection by composition. Afterwards, having left a garisson at Philippopolis, which soon after was chased and expelled by the Odryans, he determined to build a Town in Demetria, a region of Thrace near the river Evrosus, which issueth out of Thrace, and keeping his course through Thrace did he himself, and led into the river Avius, Not far from Scribe the old City he built a new, and called it to be called Polystra thereby to do honour to his eldest son Perseus.

During the train of these affairs in Macedony the Consuls took their journey into their several Provinces. Mucellus sent a messenger before him to L. Porcius the Proconsul, to give him to understand that he should present his legions before the new Town of the Gauls. But at the first approach his keeping. At length some there were, that put them in mind of the publick treasury of the City, vaulted under the ground like a duggoon, and walked all about with strong square stone. Into it was he let down bound as he was; and a mighty huge stone (being the cover of the vault) was by an engine laid over, to enclose him sure. Thus reposing more truit for his safe custody in that place than in any person, they waited and attended the next morning. Then came T. Quintus Flaminius in embassy to King Prusias, whom the Romans had in suspicion and jealousy, both for that he had received Agathas after the flight of Antiochus, and also because he made war upon Fumece. Now, were it that among other matters Flaminius charged Prusias, that he entertained in his court the most spitefull enemy of all men living, unto the people of Rome: who first solicited his own native country to take arms against the Romans, and after the force and power thereof was abated and defeated, persuaded King Antiochus to do the like: or rather that Prusias of his own accord to gratify Flaminius thus present, and to do the Romans a pleasure, had a meaning and intent either to kill Antibal, or to deliver him alive into their hands. I wot not how it came about, but upon the first communication and conference between them, there were soldiers sent inconspicuously to belea and guard his house. Antibal evermore forsook in mind some such issue and end of his life, seeing the deadly and execrable hatred that the Romans bare unto him; reposing besides no confidence at all in the fidelity of these Kings, and having withal some experience already of the inconstancy and levity of King Prusias. Moreover, he had in horror this coming of Flaminius, as fatal unto him, and a mean to work his final destruction. To the end therefore he might be ever provided aforehand against those inconveniences and dangers, wherewith on all sides he was encumbered, and have a ready way of evasion to save himself, he had devised and caused to be made seven doores for egress out of his house. wherof some were very privy and secret vaults, because they should not be environed with guards. But Kings commandments are of that force, that whatsoever they would have to be searched out and discovered, cannot lie long hidden. For the guards so compassed and enclosed the whole circuit of the house, that it was impossible for any to get forth and make an escape. Antibal being diverted that the Kings soldiers were at the gate, assailed to steal away at a postern, which stood furthest out of the way, and wherof the conveyance was most secret, but perceiving that the soldiers had beset it too, and lay for to encounter and receive him that way, N and that every place was invested with a few guard, he called for the poison which he had of long time before ready prepared for all such occurrent occasions: and uttered these words withal. "Let us bid these Romans of this their continual fear and pain wherein they have been all this while, since that they think it so long to stay for the death of one old man, Flaminius shall obtain no great nor memorable victory of me, disarmed thus as I am, and betrayed into his hands. But this very day shall prove and testify, how far the people of Rome are degenerate and changed from their ancient manners. Their forefathers (quoth he) advertised King Pyrrhus their enemy armed in field, and lying with an host of men against them in Italy, they gave him warning I say to take heed of poison: but these living at this day, have sent their Embassadors, even one that hath the born dignity of a Consul, to advise and counsel Prusias wickedly to take the life away of his own guest. Then after he had cursed the perion of Prusias and his whole realm, and called upon the Gods protectors of him, he let the cup of poison to his mouth, and drank it off. This was the end of Antibal, Polixenus and Rutilius write that Scipio also died this year. But I accord neither with them nor with Valerius. From them I square, because I find that when M. Porcius and L. Valerius were Censors, the same L. Valerius being Censor, was elected President of the Senat, where-

Antibal.

A as Africanus had been President for ten years space together, during the time of two reviews by Censors next before. And so long as the said Africanus lived, there would have been no other chosen President in his room, unless himself were to have been called and deprived of the Senators dignity, of which disgrace and note of infamy, there is not one that maketh any mention. And as for P. Valerius Antibal, he is sufficiently rebuted by M. Nevius a Tribune of the Commons, against whom there is an Oration extant, and the same penned by P. Africanus, and bearing his name. This Nevius is recorded in the rolls and registers of Magistrates, by the title of Tribune of the Commons in that year when P. Claudius and L. Porcius were Consuls, but he entered into his office during the Consulship of App. Claudius and J. Sempronius, the tenth or Decemvir. From which time to the fifteenth of March are three months, upon which day Pub. Claudius and L. Porcius began their Consulship. So it seemeth that he was living during the Tribuneship of Nevius, and that he might well commend an action against him, and call him to his answer, but he departed this life before that L. Cato and M. Porcius were Censors. But in my conceit the death of these three (the most renowned personages each one of their own nation) are not to be compared one with the other in this regard, that they hapned all just at one time more than for this, that none of them all had an end correspondent and answerable to the portly state and glorious lustre of his life. For first and foremost in this they all jumped together, that they neither did nor were entered in their native country. Again, Antibal and Philopomen were both poisoned, Antibal was banished and betrayed by his own friend and host Philopomen was taken prisoner, and left his life in prison and irons. As for Scipio, although he was neither cited nor condemned, yet making default of appearance at the day assigned unto him and being cited to his answer in his absence, willingly banished not himself only for his lifetime, but his corps and funerals also after his death.

Whiles those affairs passed in P. Valerius (from whence our pen hath a little diverted and digressed) the return of Demetrius and the Embassadors into Macedonia, diversly wrought in mens minds, and amused them some in one thing, and some in another. The common people of Macedonia, who were mightily afraid that the Romans would make war upon them, highly affected Demetrius, and cast a favourable aspect upon him as the author of peace and which they desired him without all doubt to the Kingdom after the decease of his father. For albeit he were younger than his brother Perseus, yet men thought and spake, that he was begotten in matrimony by Philip of this lawfull wife, whereas he had Perseus by a concubine, who carried no token and mark of a certain father, as having to his mother a woman that was nought of her body and common. Whereas Demetrius resembled his father Philip, and was as like him as might be, Moreover, men said, that the Romans would place and establish Demetrius in the Royal throne of his father, but Perseus was in no credit and reputation among them. Thus folk stuck not to give out abroad in their common talk. Whereupon not only Perseus was in care and doubt, that the preeminence of age only would little boot and advantage him, considering in all respects else he was inferior to his brother, but Philip also himself, supposing verily that it would hardly lie in his power to leave the inheritance of the crown to whom he pleased, thought that his younger son was more in his eye, and troubled him more than was for his ease. Offended otherwhiles he was, that the Macedonians resorted unto him so much as they did, and highly displeased that there should be any more royal courts than one in his realm, during his life. And to speak a truth, the young Prince himself returned from Rome more puffed up, no doubt with pride than was becoming; as who presumed and grounded much upon the opinion that the Senat had of him, perceiving that they had granted those things to him which had been denied unto his father before: but look how much envy and honor (in respect of the Romans) he won among the rest of the Macedonians, so much envy and ill will he procured himself thereby, not only with his father, but with his father also: and especially after that other Roman Embassadors were arrived, and that Paul was forced to part with Thrace and withdraw his garisons, and to do other things either by virtue of the old award of the first commissioners, or by a new ordinance of the Senat. We have performed all but with an heavy heart and many a deep sigh and groan, and so much the rather, because he observed and saw how his son Demetrius conversed more with the Embassadors, and frequented their company oftner than his. Howbeit he obeyed, and did whatsoever was enjoined him by the Romans; because he would minister unto them no occasion of laying war against him out of hand. And supposing it was good policy to convert their minds from all suspicion that he minded any such designs tending that way, he led his army into the midst of Thrace against the Odryans, Dantheles, and Bessians. He won the City Philippopolis, abandoned by the inhabitants who were fled, and had retired themselves with their whole families to the high mountains next adjoining: and after he had wasted the Lands and territories of the Bessians that inhabited the champaign country, he received them under his subjection by composition. Afterwards, having left a garrison at Philippopolis, which soon after was chased and expelled by the Odryans, he determined to build a Town in Demetrius, a region of Thrace near the river Evros, which disseth out of Thrace, and keeping his course through Thrace, cut a large hill itself, and rideth into the river Avius. Not far from Strabe the old City he built a new and named it to be called Persopolis, thereby to do honour to his eldest son Perseus.

During the train of these affairs in Macedonia the Consul took their journey into their several Provinces. Mucellus sent a messenger before him to L. Porcius the Proconsul, to give him to understand that he should present his legions before the new Town of the Gauls. But at the first approach approach of the Consul, the Frenchmen yielded the place. Twelve thousand men and their country villages, which was taken from them maugre their hearts, with all things else, that either they had gotten out of the country by pilling and robbing, or brought with them of their own. Whereupon they addressed their Embassadors to Rome, for to make complaint of these abuses and wrongs: who having audience given in the Senat by C. Valerius the Pretor, declared, how by occasion that C. M. was discharged with a multitude of people, they were constrained as well for want of ground and possessions, as also for need and poverty, to pass over the Alps and seek themselves some place of habitation. And where they saw any quarters forlet, desart, and unpeopled, there they had planted themselves, without offering injury to any person: where also they had begun to build a Town, which might be a good proof and argument, that they came not to do violence upon any City or Country Village. And now of late M. Claudius had sent unto them a message, that unless they submitted and yielded, he would war upon them: whereupon they preferring certain peace (although it were less honorable) before the doubtful hazard & adventures of war, surrendered, rather to be in the protection and safeguard, than under the subjection of the people of Rome. But a few daies after, they were commanded to quit both City and Country. And thereupon resolved in their mind to depart in silence and saying never a word, into what place soever they could, there to seek their fortune: but then they were disarmed, yea, and spoiled and stript of all that ever they had, and nothing left, that either they drove before them, or carried about them. In regard whereof, they were humble suppliants to the Senat and people of Rome, that they would not proceed in more rigour and cruelty against them, harmless persons as they were, and submitting themselves unto them, than against professed enemies. To this Oration of complaint the Senat caused this answer to be returned: That neither they had done well in coming into Italy, and presuming to build them a City upon other men's territories, without permission of the foreign Roman Magistrat, who had the government of those parts: nor yet the Senat was well pleased, that they should be thus deplored, considering they had yielded. And therefore minded they were to send with them their Embassadors to the Consuls, to command them in their name, to see that all their own goods should be restored again unto them, so that they made return thither from whence they came: who also should go forward immediately over the Alps, to give the States of France warning to keep in their people with them, and hold them in their native country: forasmuch as the Alps were the faghter limits standing in the mids to confine between them, and therefore those mountains neither ought nor might be passed of one side or the other: and to make account of this, that they should speed no better now in transgressing their bounds, than at what time as they first made a way, and passage over them into Italy. The Embassadors employed about this rebuines, were L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Mutinus, and L. Manlius Acidinus. Thus the French, after restitution made unto them of all that was their own by good right, and without wrong of others, departed out of Italy. Now when these Roman Legats were come, they had good words and courteous answer from the Transalpine Nations. And those amongst them that were more ancient go, who without warrant from the whole State, durst be so bold as to take a voyage to settle upon any lands belonging to the Signory of Rome, and were so hardy as thereon to build a Town, for surely they deserved not less than to abide grievous smart for their rash demeanor. Moreover, as besides, whereas the Romans have given them their own goods again, they feared much that so great indulgency of theirs, would induce and encourage others to enterprise the like. So they friendly entertained and as kindly accompanied the Embassadors yea, and liberally presented them with rewards.

M. Claudius the Consul having thus expelled the Gauls out of his Province, began to lay the ground of the Illyrick war, and for this purpose wrote his letters unto the Senat, for a warrant and commission to pass with his legions into Illyria. The Senat was therewith contented, but whereas they were in question and consultation about conducting a Colony to inhabit Aquileia, they could not agree whom to send, whether Latins or Roman citizens. But in conclusion the Senat thought it better to plant there a Colony of Latins. The Triumvirs for to effect this, were created P. Scipio Nasica, C. Flaminius, and L. Manlius Acidinus.

The same year were two Colonies of Roman citizens erected at Mutina and Parma: and two thousand persons were either place translated out of the territory which lately was occupied by the Boians, and before time had been in the tenure of the Tuscans. They of Parma were endowed with eight acres of land, and those of Mutina with five a peece. The Triumvir-Commissioners who had the disposing and managing of the busines, were M. Aemilius Lepidus, T. Eburnius Carus, and L. Quintus Crispinus. Likewise the colony Saturnia consisting of Roman citizens, was brought into the territory of Calabria, by the conduct of Q. Fabius Labeco, C. Afranius Sello, and T. Semp. Gracchus, deputed Triumvirs therefore: who set out for every man ten acres of ground.

The same year A. Terentius the Pro-petor, not far from the River Iberus in the Aulestans country, fought fortunately against the Celibrians, and forced certain Towns which they had fortified. Bese Spain beyond Iberus was quiet this year, because both P. Sempronius the Propetor lay sick of a long disease, and also the Lusitanians (as good hap was) rested still and quiet, as being by nor man provoked to stir. Neither was there any memorable exploit achieved in Liguria by Q. Fabius the Consul, M. Marcellus was called home out of Illyria: and after he had discharged his army,

A army, returned to Rome for to hold the election of the Magistrats. For Consuls he created Cn. Baebus Tamphilus and L. Aemilius Paulus. This man had been Aedile Curule together with M. Aemilius Lepidus, who was Consul five years before: and yet the same Lepidus suffered in a republic twice he was created Consul. Then were Pretors chosen, to wit, Q. Fabius Flaccus, M. Fulvius, L. Aemilius, L. Manlius the second time, M. Q. Fulvius Gellius, L. Caelius Denton, & C. Terentius. In the very end of the year there was a totemplification holden by occasion of certain prodigiosomen believed very that in the court yard of the goddick Concordia it rained blood for the space of two daies: and reported it was not far from Sicily that a new land was discovered out of the Sea, where never any was before seen. V. Iustus Aulus writeth that Aemilius did over this year: and that to compals and work his death, there were sent in embassage to Praefatus, Scipio Africanus, and P. Scipio Nasica, besides L. Quintus M. Manlius, who in that action is named moit.

The fortieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the fortieth Book.

When Philip had given commandment to make straight search for the children of those whom he kept in prison, and persecuted they were of most noble birth: for to put them to death: Theosena fearing the King's malicious intent and wicked lust in the behalf as well of her own children, as of her sisters little ones (God wot) and very young infants brought forth and offered unto the said children, a naked kees sword, and a cup of deadly poison, persuading with them to avoid the torment, shame and dishonour, by self death: which offer she both obtained and effected, the kees sword being her own part, and flew her own self. Moreover in this book are related the debate and variance between Pericles and A. Demetrius the two sons of Philip King of Macedony: and how Demetrius came to his death by poison, through the malicious practise of his brother Pericles who devised false crimes and crafty slanders against him: and principally among the rest, charged him that he intended to kill his own father, and meant to usurp the Kingdom. It is of all because he was a friend to the people of Rome: by which means after the death of Philip Pericles obtained the crown. All in continuance the happy exploits achieved by many and diverse commanders in Liguria, and in Spain against the Celibrians. The books of Numa Pompilius were by cert. unauthentic as they I shoud in the ground of L. Peltius a Notary, under the Janiculum, found himself within a coffer of stone, and written both in Latine and Greeke. And when the Phetor of the Christo whom the books were brought, he deciphered them, and found therein many points tending to overthrow religion and the divine service of the Gods, he swore before the Senat that it was dangerous for the State and Common-wealth that they should be read and preserved: in such sort that by an Act of the Senat, they were burned within the Comitium or Hall of publick assembly. The C. Lucius Aquilius was now erected. Philip exceedingly distressed with himself and prickt with remorse of conscience, for that he had caused his son Demetrius to be poisoned, upon the selfe suggestion and accusations of his other son: and against him, devised to punish Pericles, and rather to confer the Kingdom upon Anigonius his friend, than that his son should succeed him: but in this designment and purpose of his he suddenly died: and so Pericles took the crown and Kingdom upon him.

The fortieth book of T. Livius.

In the beginning of the year next ensuing, the Consuls and Pretors cast lots for their severall governments. For the Consuls there was no other Province to employ them in but Liguria. The first jurisdiction among citizens fell to M. Q. Fulvius Gellius and C. Terentius. The other to P. Volterius. High Spain was assigned unto Q. Fabius Flaccus and the Nether-land thereof to L. Manlius, L. Caelius Denton had the governance of Sicily, and C. Terentius of Sardinia. The Consuls were employed to take matters: for Q. Fabius had written out of Camp a paper the Appians in line of rebellion, and greatly to be feared it was, that they would break out and make trade into the territory of Pisa. And well they knew already, that of the two Provinces of Spain, the higher parts were in arms and the war with the Celibrians was still in progress: as for the lower the military discipline there was clean corrupt and gone by reason of great punishments and fines: where unto the soldier were wholly given, by occasion was the Pleo of Italy long ask. For these causes thought good it was that new armies should be created and collected to wit four legions for Liguria, and every one of them to containe 5200 foot and 400 horse: unto which there was an addition of 15000 footmen, and 900 men of armie sent out of the Lombarlies. And these two armies were to serve the Consuls. But over and besides they were commanded to enrol 7000 foot and 600 horse men of Latine allies, and to send into France to M. Metellus, who was to continue still in pacification, after the term of his Consulship expired. Likewise they had in charge to levy of Roman Citizens 4000 footmen and 200 horse, and of Latins 7000 of the one and 300 of the other to be conducted into both Provinces of Spain. And Q. Fabius Flaccus had his commission of government renewed for one year longer, with the charge of that army which he had in Liguria.

Ths

* 19 of April: for the feast unto the goddels Pales was solemnized in
ex. caland. Ma.
when as Nan-tala dies within Rome; the birth day (as it were) of Rome.
* Luna.

The spring season that year was very stormy and tempestuous. On the 7th even of the feast Pallia about noon-tide, suddenly there arose a mighty blustering wind, which overthrow many edifices as well-towered as poriane. It cast down the brazen statues and images in the Capitol: it caught up the wicket of the door belonging to the Temple of the * Alcon, (which is in the Aventine) carried it away and set it fast to the back wall of the Temple of Ceres. It overthrew and laid along other statues in the great cirque or shew-placed called Circus Maximus, together with the pillars upon which they stood. The lanterns and pinnacles it rent and tare after a strange sort from the roof and top of certain Churches, and carried them clean away. And therefore this tempest was held for a prodigious token, and the Atrupices gave order for the expiation and satisfaction thereof. Likewise the same provision was made in regard of a report from Rate, that a mule was foled with three feet: and from Formia, that the Chappell of Apollo (and namely at C. Jera) was stricken I with lightning. For these prodigies, there were twenty greater beasts killed for sacrifice: and a supplication holden one whole day. And about the same time, intelligence was given by letters from A. Terentius the Pretor, that P. Sempson having continued above a year in Spain was departed this life, in the farther Province of Spain: which was the cause that the Pretors were wilded to make more halt, and so much the sooner to pass into Spain.

After this, the embassages from beyond the Sea had audience given them in the Senat. The first was that of the two KK. Eumenes and Pharnaces, and also of the Rhodians, who complained for the great loss and overthrow by the Sinopians received. And about the same instant arrived also Embassadors from Philip from the Achans and Lacedaemonians, who had their answer and dispatch, after a speech made by Martius, who had been sent to visit the estate and affairs of Greece and Macedony. But as touching the forehead Kings of Asia and the Rhodians this flood for their answers namely, that the Senat would send their Embassadors and Commissioners to take knowledge and see to all things there in place. But as concerning Philip, Martius had so told his tale, that he put the L.L. of the Senat in more fear and peevishness: for in his declaration he confessed, that Philip indeed had accomplished the will and pleasure of the Senat. But in such sort, as it was evident to be seen, that he would do so no longer than he were held thereto and compelled of necessity: for apparent it was, that he minded to make war again, considering that whatsoever he either did or said, tended to no other end. For first and foremost he caused all the multitude to be removed and translated (with their whole families) out of the cities by the Sea-coast, into that quarter which now is called * Emathia; and in times past was named Taonia, and gave those I Cities aforesaid to the Thracians and other barbarous nations to inhabit: supposing that this kind of people would be more faith and faithful unto him in his wars against the Romans. And verily this deed of his bred a great discontentment and murmuring throughout all Macedonia: inmouch, as few there were of them, who thus left their native habitations together with their wives and children, that could bite in and contain their fester grief and heart-burning, and say nothing: but being prickd and nettled more to anger than curbed and bridled with fear, they brake out, and were heard to curse and cry out upon the King as they went along the way in troops and companies. Hereupon his fell stomach by nature was foggall that he had all men in jealousy, and no time nor place there was but he suspected. In the end he began to give it out openly, that he could not make account to be in safety and security unless he apprehended and kept in prison the children of those persons whom he had before-time killed, for to dispatch and make away them also (in time) one of or another. This cruelty in itself hainous enough and enormous, the calamity and woful misery of one house made more odious and detestable. Murdered he had many years before: Herodotus a noble man and a Prince of the Thessalians: and sometime after, he slew also his own in-law who had married his daughters. These Gentlewomen being left Widows, had each of them by their Husbands a little Son: and the names of these women were Theoxena and Archo. As for Theoxena: she would in no wise marry again, albeit she had many suitors: that woed her. But Archo was wedded to one Poris, the very principal and noblest personage of the Aenean Nation: and when she had born him many children he died, and left them all very young.
Thereafterwards Theoxena likewise was married to the forehead Poris, to the end, that she might have the bringing up of those her sisters children with her own hands: and in truth she was not more kind to her own pretty son than to those her sisters children: but so tenderly regarded them all alike, as if she had born them of her own body. Now when she heard one of the Kings edict and proclamation which was gone forth, for the apprehension of all those infants whose fathers before had been put to death: supposing that these children should be exposed not only to the abuse and scornful mockery of the King, but also to the lust and villany of his guard she conceived in her mind an horrible designment: yea, and she flew not to say. That with her own hand she would rid them of their lives, rather than they should come within the clutches of Phi- lip. But Poris her husband (who abhorred the very naming of so abominable a fact) said that he would convey them out of the way as far as Athens, to certain truly friends of his there, and would himself in proper person accompany them all the way thither, and take part with them of that exile and banishment. So they put themselves in their journey all together (he and his wife and children) from Thessalonica toward Acha, unto a solemn sacrifice and feast which yearly they use to celebrate with much ceremonies pomp in the honor of Evros their first founder.
Now when they had spent that day in feasting full solemnly, about the third watch of the night (when all others were found asleep) they were embarked in a ship prepared aforehand by Poris's making

* Pellotisida.

A making semblance, as if they would return to Thessalonica: but indeed purposing to cut over to Euboea. But when they had laboured and wrought to no purpose upon the wind which was full against them, they were overtaken and prevented by the day-light before they were far from the Land, and past light. And being discovered by the Kings officers who had the charge and keeping of the haven, there was a pinnacle or foil (well appointed with armed men) let out to catch in that vessel, with express commandment (as they would answer to the contrary at their utter peril) not to come again without it. Now as they approached neerer, Poris verily for his part was very earnest with the rowers, mariners, and sailors, to ply their business and make way from them: otherwhiles stretching out his hands up to heaven, calling and praying unto the Gods to help them in this their hard distress. But the couragious lady his wife all the while (turning again B to execute that designment of hers long before purposed) tempered and mixed a potion of poison, and brought forth certain swords withal. Now when she had let the poisoned cup before the children in their very eye, and drawn the words naked: Death (quoth she) is the only mean we have to save our liberty: lo here the wayes that lead to death: now as every ones heart standeth to this or that, take thereto, and avoid the cruelty and pride of the King. Come on, and jolly striplings, lead you the way first that are the bigger and elder: take sword in hand, fall thereupon and work the feat at once: or if ye list rather to be long a dying, drink here of this cup. What should they do? the enemies were fast upon them ready to board their vessel, their mother on the other side, encouraging them instantly to take their death, in whichwise, that to enlende, some dying the one way and some the other, were all cast headlong over shipboard, when they C were but half dead. Then the for her part embracing her husband about the middle (because she would dye with him for company) threw her self and him both together into the Sea. Thus the Kings men leized upon the ship, when the matters thereof were gone.

The horrible example of this sad kindled more coals, and set the malice and hatred kindled against the King as it were on a light and flaming fire anew, inasmuch as now commonly in all places they fell to open cursing of him and his children. Which maledictions and execrations it was not long but all the Gods listened and gave ear unto, and caused that he likewise exercised cruelty even upon his own flesh and blood. For Perseus seeing his brother Demetrius to arise every day more than other in favour, greatness, and reputation with the whole Macedonian people, and to grow also in credit and grace among the Romans, supposing with himself how he had D no other hope left him of attaining to the crown, but by the means of some wicked practice bent all his thoughts and studies that way, and aimed only at that mark. But believing verily that he was not strong enough and sufficient alone, to execute and bring forth so much only, as within that unmanly and womanish mind of his he had devised and conceived, he practised with his fathers friends, and citizens founded their hearts one by one apart, calling out ambiguous and doubtful speeches. And at the first verily some of them flew out countenance as if they could not abide to hear of any such thing, because they repaid more hope in Demetrius. But afterwards, as the hatred of Philip grew daily greater against the Romans, which Perseus still fostered and maintained, whereas Demetrius with all his might laboured against it: they fore-making in their mind the unhappie end of Demetrius, who lay too open and was not heedful enough to guard himself E against the fraudulent and mischievous plots of his brother, sided with Perseus: making this account in policy, to for that agoing and help it forward, which in the end would take effect, and namely to enter in and advance the hope of the mightier. For the execution of the rest they reserved every thing to a meet and convenient time therefore. As for the present, the best counsell they thought upon, was this, to incense the King all that ever possibly they could against the Romans, to induce and put him forward still to think of nothing but war: whereas of his own accord his mind stood well enough and was enclined, And withal (to the end that Demetrius might be from day to day more and more suspected) they entered of purpose (as before they were agreed) into speech, as touching the hope and great part of the Romans: whereas when some of them would seem again in scornful wise to debate their manners and fashions; others to de-prave their deeds and acts, some scoffing in general at the very form and making of their City, how it was not yet embellished & beautified either with stately edifices in publick places, or with fair houses of private men: others mocking and having in derision the principal and chief personages of the City in particular: the inconsiderate young Gentlemen, carried away as well with an af-fectional love to the Romans, as with a desire to cross his brother, would answer to these points in the defence and maintenance of the Romans: by which means he brought him self both into more jealousy with his father, and also to be suspected & exposed to slanderous imputations. Whereupon his father acquainted him no more with any counsel as touching the Roman affairs, but wholly relied upon Perseus and with him conferred thereabout, imparting unto him both day and night all his projects and designs whatsoever. By this time were they returned whom he charged G to send to the Bithynians for to levy succors and aid-souldiers, and brought they had with them from thence certain noble young Gentlemen, and some amount of royal blood. One of them promised to give his sister in marriage to one of Philip's sons, inasmuch as the affection by way of affinity with that nation, set the Kings heart also aloft. But Perseus brake out into these words: "What serves all this for (quod he) since we have not to much help and aidery by aids from abroad, as harm and dagger by a mischief and malady at home. We keep here and foster in our bosoms, I dare not say
"a traitor, but I assure you a very dangerous spie and no better: whose body verily the Romans gaint me so as you do, for discovering the ambush set for me, and complaining thereof; but a-gaint him rather, that laid in wait to surpris me; neither would you let so light and make to small account of my life, as to be moved neither for the danger past, wherein I was, nor at the peril to come, if such wait-layers may escape unpunished. Now, if there be no remedy, but that we must die and lay nothing left us hold our tongues and be mute: let us only pray to the Gods before that this intended mischief begun in me, may also take an end in me alone, and that you be satisfied, he who is to be wounded and pierced through my body. But in case (like as by the very infinit and suggestion of nature, they that are assailed and set upon in a desert wilderness, be taught to implore and call for mens help and succour, although they neither saw nor knew of any before) in case (I say) it be lawful for me likewise to open my mouth and speak. When I see the naked sword drawn upon me: then I beseech you for your own love, even for the love of I your good self, and the name of a father (which whether of us twain have more esteemed and regarded, you have still well known long ago) to give me audience, and to hear me, as if you had been awakened at my cry and piteous lamentation in the last nights riot, and came in the way where I was forced to call, Help, Help: and as if you had taken Demetrius in the manner, within my gate, in the very entry of my dore, accompanied with armed men, at an undecent and undue hour of this night past. Thole plaints and moans which then I would have uttered by way of disordered and confused cries, in that suddain affright of mine upon the deed doing the same of I now make the morrow after. Ah brother, we have lived now a good while, nor (I wot) as brethren that should banquet and make merry one with another. It is the crown that you look after, that is certain and past peradventure: but your hope to attain unto it, is crossed divers waies. My birthright and mine eldership is a block in your way, between you and it: the law of nations is against it: the ancient custome of the Macedonians checketh it: and finally, the will, pleasure, and judgment of our father is opposite unto it. Mount you cannot possibly so high, but by the effusion of my heart blood. You go to work, you assay all means, you leave no stone unrolled and nothing unattempted to effect that: but to this day, either mine own way diligence or happy fortune hath guarded me and withstood your wicked parricide. Even yesterday, during the time of the solemn review and purging of the army, during the time of running at tilt and jousting, in time of the shew and pastime resembling a skirmish, you missed very little of making a bloody battail of it and a deadly conflict indeed: and nothing else saved me from death, but this, that I suffered my self and my men to go by the worse and be overcome. From this martial combat, as if it had been no more but a game and sport among brethren, you would needs have trained and drawn me to a supper. Why? think you father, that I should have supped among those guests unarmed, who came in arms to banquet with me? Do you believe, that I should have been in no danger of their naked swords of steel at night? who in the day time and without your fight, laid on such load with wooden swords and batons, that they had like to have killed me? To what end else came you, brother, at that time of the night? why came you as an enemy, considering I was in choler and my blood was up? wherefore came you accompanied with tail followers privily armed and with short swords under their garments? I durst not venture to sit at supper with you: should I have received you then, coming as you did with armed men to banquet with me? Father, if the dore had been opened: wheras you hear me now to make my complaints, you should have been by this time busied about my winding-sheet, herfe, and funerals.

I lay not forth and urge matters in slanderous manner, alter the fashion of these accusers at bar: neither collect I bare conjectural presumptions to enforce & conclude any doubtful points: for what need I so do? Denieth he that he approached my dore with a troop of men? or that he had in his train a company, such as wore weapons covertly under their apparel? Do but send for them whom I shall name. But in faith, what will not they dare to do, that can do this? and yet I trow, they will never be so hardy and shameless as to deny it. If I had taken them in the manner with their weapons about them with my mine entry, and so brought them before you, then you would say it were a plain case and out of all doubt. If then, they confesse as much with their mouths, hold them as culpable as if they had been surpris'd in the act doing. Now curse (and spare not) the greedy appetite and thirst after a Kingdom: now fall to raise and call up the furies out of hell to set brethren together by the ears: but good father, let not your curses and execrations thus flie at blind random: make some distinction yet and difference, between him that lyeth in await, and the party who is forelaid. Let him be holden guilty that sought to kill his brother, let him feel withal the gods of his father to be his enemies and angry against him.
But as for him who was in danger to lose his life through his brothers mischievous practice, let him have his refuge and recourse to the mercy and justice of his father. For alas, whither else should I flie for succour? seeing that neither the solemn review and purging of your army, nor the running and jousting of the men at arms, neither mine own house nor my table, nor yet the very night season (which nature hath given to mankind for covert & repose) affordeth me safety and security? If I go to my brother (being bidden to supper), die I shall: if I receive my brother within my dore (coming to banquet) die I must. So that whether I go or stay all is one: I cannot avoid but fall into trains and ambushes, laid for to take away my life. To what place shall I retire and be safe myself? None have I regarded nothing have I relied upon, but the gods & your good self, father, as for the Romans, I stand in no such terms with them of grace and favour as to trust upon their account: nay, they all wish me changed, because I take the wrongs done unto you by them,

A "them, to the heart; because I shew my self discontented and touched with the indignity that to many Cities, so many nations are plucked from you and namely, that of late they have depopulated and bereaved you of all the maritime parts and sea coasts of Illyria: and so long as either you or I live, they never look to enjoy Macedonia. But if by the mischiefous practice of my brother, I might once be rid out of the way and without ill, I could have made an end of you, yea, and per-venture before that day came, (which they would never say to long for) then they know well and make still account, that both the King and Kingdom of Macedonia, will be theirs ere long enough.
Indeed if the Romans had spared any piece at all without Macedonia, I should have thought and made reckoning, that it had been a place of retreat and refuge left for me. But what need that, so long as I have strength enough among the very Macedonians. You saw your self yesterday how violently the soldiers charged upon me: what wanted they but the disparagement and edged weapons? well, that which they failed and missed of in the day time my brothers haubaquets met with in the night. For what should I speak of the greater part of the nobility they have promised and built all their hopes of dignity, promotion, and advancement, in the Romans, and namely, in him who now can do all in all with them and is a greatest reputation. And surely, to speak a truth, him they prefer not only before me his elder brother, but also they go within a very little to let him before your self, his liege King and natural father. For this is he, for whose love and in favour of whom, the Senat hath remitted and pardoned you that penalty which you had incurred. This is he, who now protecteth you from the force of Roman armies: who demeth it meet and reason that your old age should be obliged and beholden to his youth. For him stand all the Romans with him take part all those Cities which are delivered and free from your subjection: of him hold the Macedonians that wish for peace with the Romans, and take contentment therein. Now for me, father, what hope or help can I have elsewhere, but in you alone?
Wherefore think you send those letters of Quintus lately unto you: wherein he writeth, That you did passing well for your own estate, in sending Demetrius to Rome: and exhorteth you with-all, to send him again the second time, accompanied with more Embassadors and thole the very principal and best of all the Macedonians? This Quintus (if you will needs know the reason) is the man, who leadeth, induceth and directeth him at this present in all things: he is his counsellor and school-master. And Demetrius hath rejected and cast you off his own father, & hath put him in your stead. There it is, where all these privy plots have heretofore been first contrived and set a hatching: and at this present in willing you to send more in embassage, and thole the chief personages of the Macedonians with him, he seeketh nought else but helpers and assistants to put thole designs in execution. As many as go from hence to Rome, be they never so sound & uncorrupt at their setting out, be they loyal subjects and acknowledging no other but Philip for their King, return from thence tainted and infected with the alluring enticements of the Romans. Demetrius alone is altogether in their books. They are all for him, and pais for none else.
Him they call their King, during the life of his own father. Now, if I seem to be touched, offended and grieved herewith by and by I am sure to have it charged reproachfully on both sides of mine ears, not only from others, but also from your mouth father. That I aspire and seek to be King. For mine own part, I would both they and you knew, that if the diadem and crown were here let between us both, I would none of it. For who is he, that I should need to underrime & supplant, for to step into his place and succeed? None there is at all but my father before me, and long may he be so. I pray God, and I wish to survive him no otherwise, but if I be worthy and deserve that he should likewise desire the same. If my father will make me his heir and inheritor of the Kingdom, I will accept thereof. He indeed coveteth to be a King, yea, and ungraciously co-veteth it, who hath need to make pace forward, and to step before the course of nature, the order of age, the custome of the Macedonians, and the law of nations. But what imagineth Demetrius, suppose ye? Mine elder brother (thinketh he) stands in my way between me and hope: to him appertaineth the Kingdom by right and by my fathers will: Let us rid him out of the World, What? I am not the first that sought to be a King by murder of a brother. As for my father he is aged, he is desolate, and bereaved of a son: he will have more care to look to his own person, than mind to revenge the death of his son. The Romans, they will rejoice, they will approve and maintain my bid. These be nice points, and these be ticklish and doubtful hopes, but believe me father, they are not altogether vain and frivolous. For this stands the case, and this is the sum of all: Well may you preserve me out of danger, now whilst I am alive, by inflicting punishment upon thole who take weapon in hand to kill me: but let their enterprise speed once, and take either you or I shall never be able to pursue them to the purpose and revenge my death.
When Perseus had made an end of his speech, they that were present in place cast their eyes wist-ly upon Demetrius: as if he would have made answer immediately, and so were all silent a long time, and said not a word: for they perceived evidently that he could not for weeping open his mouth:
but in the end he was urged by them to speak, and then after that necessity had furnished his grief, thus he began. "My father, all thole means of help which were ever wont to serve the defenddant in good head, I am prevented and disappointed of, by the plaintive my accuser. By thole false and fained tears of his, wrung out and shed to work the ruin and undoing of another, he hath made my true tears suspected, which gushing out of mine eyes, proceed from a melting & wounded heart within. And whereas himself hath not ceased (ever since that I returned from Rome) to practise secretly with his consorts and complices both night and day to lay wait for my life,

"now he begins first with me, and will needs put upon me the visor, and have the world believe "that I play the part not only of a secret and cunning wait-laiër, but of an open thief and a noto"rious murderer and cut-throat. He seemeth to fright you with his own danger, that he might "make even you the very means and instrument to hasten forward the death of his innocent bro"ther. He saith that he hath no place of refuge in the whole world: to the end that I might have "no parcel at all of hope left so much as in you. This circumvented as I am, left alone, forlorn, de"stitute and void of all income he chargeth me with being in favour and grace with forrain stran"gers: a thing I wis that doth me more harm than good. Moreover, see how he proceedeth like a "practiced and cunning barrister, in that he interteth and minglet the last nights work together "with the blame of my former life: to the end that he might make more suspicious by the course "of mine other years passed, this criminal matter also (the simple truth whereof you shall know I
 "anon) and withal confirm and maintain this vain surmise and slander, of my hopes, will, and
 "intended designs, by this subtle invention of his, by the fained & forged fable I say of that which "was pretended the night that was. He hath not failed moreover to make you believe that this "acculation of his was not premeditated and studied upon beforehand, but framed extempore, and "occasioned only upon the suddain fright and trouble overnight. But in good faith, Perseus, if I "had been a traitor to the King my father & the realm, if I had conspired with the Romans and
 "other of my fathers enemies, me thinks you should not have waited for this nights devised fable,
 "but you ought to have accused me before this time, of treason. And if that imputation were vain
 "and frivolous without this surmise, and served to discover and bewray your envy & spite which "you bear against me, more than it detecteth any crime which is in me; yet you should have let "me alone and forborn this day, or put it off until another time; that it might have been clearly "seen whether of us twain laid wait for the other, you or I, upon a strange & extraordinary man"ner of hatred. As for me (so far forth as is possible can in this suddain trouble of my spirits) I will "endeavour to speak severally of each point, which you have heaped up together so disorderly,
 "and reveal I will the ambushes and trains of this night, yours or mine, fall out as it shall. He "would have it thought that I practised to kill him, for this intent forsooth, that when mine elder
 "brother were once made away, unto whom the inheritance of the crown appertained by the law
 "of nations, by the custom of the Macedonians, and also, as he saith, by your judgment; I the yon-"ger might step into his place, and succeed him whom I had killed. What meaneth then, and
 "wherefore seereth that other part of his Oration, wherein he saith, that I have been to respective to "the Romans, and that upon the affiance that I have in them, I hoped to be King? For if I were
 "perswaded thus of the Romans, that they could set up whom they pleased to be King of Mace- "donia, & if which I presumed so much of their good grace and favor to me, what need had
 "I then to commit a parricide? Was it because I had a mind to wear a diadem embowed with my "brothers blood by me murdered? and was I desirous to make my self odious & execrable among "them, with whom either for mine honesty indeed, or at least waies for a counterfeit shew ther-
 "of I have won some credit, such as it is, if haply it be any at all? Unless perhaps, you think that "I, Quintus (by whose virtue and counsel, you reproach me that I am ruled) advised me to kill
 "my brother: Quintus, I say, who is so kind unto his own brother, and liveth with him so loving"ly. This plaintif & accuser of mine, hath collected not only the affection of the Romans which "they bear unto me, but also the opinion which the Macedonians have of me, yea, and in manner
 "the content of all Gods and men in my behalf: in which regards all, he took himself not able to "match me in this quarrel and difference about the Kingdom: and yet see, how the same man
 "saith to my charge, that as if I were in all other respects, inferior unto him, I was faine to have "recourse to this last shift of practising mischief and wickedness. Will you have this to be the cause?
 "Will you be content to join issue in this point? That whether of us twain feared the other to be
 "reputed worther of the Kingdom, he should be judged & condemned to have fought and con"quered the death of his brother? But let us discuss and examine in some sort or other, the order "and manner of this pretended and devised crime. He hath burdened me, that I have laid for him
 "many and sundry waies; yet hath he knit up all these means and conched them together in one
 "daies work. I purposed to kill him (saith he) in the open day-light, after the solemn review and "affoiling of the army even when we jousted together, and seemed to charge one another in bat-
 "tel: wile yea upon the very day (God he knoweth) of the said solemnity. I intended twis (be"lieve him if you will) when I invited him to supper, to make him away with a cup of poison. I "would have stabbed him (what else?) or run him through with my sword, when I came to ban"quet with him & was accompanied with some of my train armed and having weapon about them.
 "You see, father, what proper and choice opportunities I had picked out to commit this preten"ded murder: namely the very day of sports, the time of supper, of banquet and collation. As for "the day, let us examine it and the manner thereof: was it any other than that, wherein the army
 "was forced and solemnly purged? when between a sacrifice cut in twain, the royal coats of all
 "the arms of Macedonian Kings that ever had been, were carried aloft in a stately shew; and we "alone, your two sons (saith he) marched on either side of you before the rest, and the whole Ma"cedonian army followed after. When I was thus cleansed and purified by this expiatory sacrifice
 "(if haply I had committed any sin before that deserved expiation) and especially at the very "same instant when I beheld before mine eyes (on either side of the way) the parcels of the beast "sacrificed entertained I then in my thoughts the practise of poison, & the handling of swords pre"pared

A "pared aforehand against the banquet, to perform a parricide? that afterwards I might with some "other sacrifices expiate and cleanse my conscience thus stained & defiled with all kind of wicked"ness? A likely matter surely. But a spirit corrupt & blinded with the humour of slandering ano"ther, upon a desire to gather matter and make it suspicious, careth not to huddle one thing upon "another confusedly. For if I meant to have poisoned you at supper, what was there more unfit "to let forward that designment than to provoke you to anger, by running so eagerly upon you &
 "fighting with you so roughly, that thereby you might take good and just occasion to refuse be"ing requested, for to come to supper? And when in your choler you had once denied to sup with "me, was it not the next way for me then, to endeavour how to appease you and seek some other "opportunity, since I had prepared the poison for that present only? But I must leap from that de"signment to another, even to the killing of you by the sword, and that upon the very same day,
 "under a pretence of banquetting with you: if I thought that for fear of death you forbore my ta"ble at supper time, how comes it that I imagined not fensibly that for the laid reason you would "avoid my company at banquet after supper? There is no cause why I should be ashamed, father,
 "if upon such a festival day as it was I drank wine liberally, and took perhaps a cup too much as "among my companions. Nay, I would it might please your majesty to enquire with what mirth, "and merriment I feasted yesterday at home in my house, and this joy let us the farther out, be"cause in that warlike pastime of lully youths, our side went not by the worse. But this misery &
 "unhappy fear upon that our mirth, hath well delayed and cooled the wine I spent it hath the "strength thereof turning up into our heads: which if it had not come between we as great laiers
 "as wait as we were, had to this hour lien sound asleep in our beds. Well, if I had minded to assail
 "and force your house, and that done to murder you the master thereof, would I not think you,
 "have for born for my part one day to bib and quaff wine so freely and likewise kept my soldiers
 "from drinking drunk? But because I should not alone plead my simplicity and make my excuse "thereby, this my good brother also, whom God wot is none of these naughty and suspicious crea"tures, comes in with his vie and faith, I know nothing, I charge nobody, neither wot I what to "say else, but that they came armed to banquet with me. If I might be so bold as to ask, how you "came to that knowledge, you cannot chuse but confess that either my house was full of your
 "spies, or those armed men of my train took their weapons for openly, that every one law them.
 "And because he would have you believe, that neither himself made any enquiry before, nor at "this time persueeth the matter with any accusatory spirit, he willed you to demand of them whom "he named, whether they had not their swords about them? to the end that after you had sought
 "into it as a matter doubtful, and found them to confess it, they might thereby be held convicted.
 "But why rather will you not, that examination should be taken in this manner: whether they "took their swords with them to kill you or no? And whether they did by my warrant direct"ly, or privily? For this is it that your (brother) would make the world believe, this is it which "you would have to appear, and not that which my men confess. But the case is plain yea, & they "will be known no other, than that they were armed in their own defence. Whether it were well "or ill done, they are of age to make account and render a reason of their doings. Do not you "mingle my cause with that action of theirs, which in respect it nothing at all. But rather de"clare, whether we meant to assail you openly or secretly? If openly, why were we not all armed?
 "why was there none of us besides those persons that did bear your spite? If secretly, what was the "train and order of the execution of that design? After the banquet ended, and I the lesser of the "banquet retired from thence, should those four have staid behind to fall upon you when you "were asleep? How could they have carried it so close as not to be spied, for that a life before them "had been seen in a brawl? And say, they had killed you: by what means could they escape them"selves? Was it possible that your house should be forced and kept with four swords? Fie, fie
 "Perseus speak no more for shame of this night, but come again to that rather which galleth you
 "at the heart, which kindlyeth your envy and setteth you on fire. How cometh it to pass, O Deme- "trius that men speak abroad that you shall be King? why should you be deemed of some more "worthy than my self, to succeed the royal estate of my father? How is it that I am in doubt of my "hope, which but for you, were sure & certain? There are the secret thoughts of Perseus, although "he saith nothing: these make him of a brother to become an enemy: these cause him to be mine
 "accuser: these conceits they be that fill your palace your court and your realm, with surmises slan"ders and suspicions. But for mine own part, father, like as I taught neither to hope for your royal
 "crown, nor at any time peradventure, to make words and dispute about it; because I am the "younger, and because it is your will and pleasure, that I should give place unto mine elder bro"ther: so it became me not heretofore, neither doth it become me yet, to demean my self so in any "action that I should seem unworthy to have you for my father, but to be capable of all dignities "whatsoever. The one point I should attain unto by indirect courses and wicked vices, in not "yielding unto him, as right and reason would: but the other by my good carriage and sober be"haviour. You reproach me with the Romans, brothers, and those things which in right ought to "turn to my praise and glory, you blame and reprove me for. It was no seeking of mine, that I was "delivered to the Romans as an hostage, or sent to Rome as Ambassador: but when I was ap"pointed by you, father I refused not to go. At both times such was my demeanor, that I had an "eye still and good regard, not to discredit either your highness, or your Kingdom, or the Mace"donian nation. And therefore you were the cause, father, of that friendship which I have with the "Romans.

"Romans. As long as you and they are at peace, I shall be well affected to them: begin war once: I that was an hostage and Ambassador among them, and (though I say it) not unprofitable for you my father, even I, will become a most spiteful and mortal enemy unto them. Neither do I at this day require, that the favour I have among the Romans might stand me any way: only I beseech you, that it may not prejudice and harm me. It began not by occasion of war, neither is it referred for the time of war. For assurance of peace, I was a pledge and hostage: for maintenance of peace, I was employed in embassy. Content will I be, by the one and the other, in case I neither purchase fame nor incur blame. If I have committed any impiety against you father, if I have done or designed any wicked part against my brother, I refuse no punishment. I crave no pardon or favor. If I be innocent, I desire only and humbly beseech your grace, that I be not overweighed with the heavy load of envy and ill will, since I can be overthrown by no crime justly objected unto me. This is not the first day, that my brother hath accused me: but this is the first day, that he is seen to be my accuser: and full little have I deserved it at his hands. If my father had been displeased and angry with me, I would have thought that you of all others, being the elder brother, should have been a mediator and intercessor for me (the younger) to my father, and a means to purchase a pardon for my folly and the error of tender youth: but see! where my succour and refuge should have been, there contrary-wisely is my ruin and overthrow. From my feasting and banqueting, from my mirth and good cheer, by his means have I been haled hither not half waked, but with mine eyes full of sleep, to answer in the case of parricide: and forced I am to plead mine own cause without my counsel, without my proctor or advocate. If I had been to speak in the defence of another, I would have taken time to study, premeditate and frame an oration. And yet, what was I to hazard there, but the reputation of wit and learning. In stead thereof I not knowing for what cause I was sent for, heard your Majesty first (wroth and angry as you were) to command us to plead our causes: and then my brother, who hath stood up to accuse me, as for him, he hath pronounced an Oration (studied for, and devised long before hand: but by I was allowed no longer time (than whiles I heard my self accused) to be think me what to plead: or to examine and take knowledge of the matter that he hath laid forth against me. In that present moment of time, could I, think you (so suddenly taken as I was) either give ear to my accuser, or consider and think duly of mine own plea? (onied so I was, with that sudden trouble and unexpected occurrence, that much ado I had to understand what I was charged with: so far was I from devising what to speak in mine own defence. What hope should I have now and in the what case were I, if I had not my father for my judge? at whose hands (albeit I am not so well beloved as mine elder brother is, yet since I am the party defendant, I ought at leastwise to find as much pity and compassion. For I beseech you (O father) to save me, in regard of my self and you: but he requirith you to take away my life, only for his own assurance and better security. And what will he do against me think you, after you have made over the crown and scepter into his hands: who now already thinketh it meet and reason, to dispose of my blood at his good pleasure? In uttering of these words, the tears gushed forth so abundantly, that they stopped his mouth so, that he could neither speak or draw his breath. Then Philopater after he had commanded them to go apart, and communed a while with his friends, spake and said, That he would not decide their cause upon these words of theirs, nor upon one hours debating, but by enquiry into both their lives, and observing their behaviour in deed and word, as well in great matters as in small. Hereby they all saw well enough, that the accusation of the precedent nights act, was sufficiently refused and evicted & the only thing in Demetrius to be suspected, was the over-great favour that the Romans bare toward him. This was the very seed of the Macedonian war, fowled as one would say, during the life of Philip, but the war was after to be waged most of all against Perseus.

The two Consuls took their journey into Liguria, the sole consular Province of them both; and because they had achieved their exploits fortunately there, ordained there was a solemn procession for one day, it fortuned that there came two thousand Ligurians or thereabout, to the utmost frontier of the Province of Gaul, where Marcellus lay in leaguery, requesting to be received under his protection. Marcellus after he had commanded the said Ligurians to give attendance upon him in the same place, required by his letters the advice of the Senat. The Senat gave order to M. Ogulnius the Lord chief justice of the City, to write back again unto Marcellus to this effect. That it was more meet that the Consuls, unto whom that government appertained, should give order and determine (as touching the Ligurians who yielded and submitted) what was expedient for the common-weal in that behalf, than the Senat. As for them, if they were to give their opinion, they thought it not good to accept of the Ligurians (surrender: and being once received then to be disarmed: but they were of this mind and advice, that it was requisite they should be sent and referred over to the Consuls.

The Pretors at the same time arrived in their Provinces, to wit P. Manlius in base Spain, where he had been Governor before during his former Pretorship; and Q. Fulvius Flaccus in the higher: where he received the army of Tarentum: for that other side of Spain beyond Iberus, had been left without a Lord Deputy, by occasion of the death of P. Sempronius the Pro-pretor. Whiles Fulvius Flaccus assaulted a Town in Spain named Mibicula, the Celtiberians made head and came upon him; where many and sundry shot skirmishes passed, and wherein many Roman soldiers were both hurt and slain. Howbeit Fulvius held still his resolution, and by no forcible

A cable means whatsoever, could be brought to levy the siege. The Celtiberians coiled out of heat with divers combats, retired and departed. The City then seeing their favours dislodged and gone, within few daies was forced and ransacked: and the Pretor gave the pillage thereof to his soldiers. Thus Fulvius after he had gained this Town, and P. Manlius, when he had retired and rallied his forces into one place, which had been dispersed: without any other memorable act performed, brought their armies within the wintering harbours. And there were the exploits in Spain, during that summer season, Tarentum who was departed out of that Province before, entered the City of Rome in a petty triumph, by way of ovation. He carried before him in show, eight thousand three hundred and twenty pound weight of silver, and fourscore of gold: besides two golden coronets weighing 67 pound.

B The same year the Romans were chosen Arbitrators between the people of Carthage and King Masiniassa as touching their territories: and came personally to see the place in controversy. And thus stood the case: Gala the father of this Masiniassa, had won the ground in question from the Carthaginians, Siphax afterward dispossessed Gala thereof: and consequently to gratify Asdrubel, his wives father, freely gave the same to the Carthaginians, and let them in possession again. Now last of all, even this very year, Masiniassa had dispossessed the Carthaginians of the same. This matter was debated by the parties of both sides in the presence of the Romans, with no less courage and fervency of spirit than at other times when they tried the issue by dint of sword in open field. The Carthaginians laid claim and put in their plea. For that first it appertained to their ancestors in right of inheritance, and afterwards was conveyed to them by the free gift and donation of Siphax. Masiniassa counterpleaded again and a ledged, that he had both recovered the said territory, as parcel of his fathers realm, and also held it by the law of nations: and that the case was clear on his side. In regard as well of the just title as also of the present possession wherein he was: saying, that in his cause he doubted nothing else but that the modesty of the Romans should prejudice him, for fear lest they might be thought to be partial in the cause and respective to him, a King their ally and good friend, and in favour of him to give up their award against the common enemies both to him and them. The Commissioners and arbitrators would not infringe and alienate the right of possession, but left all as they found it, and referred the entire decision of the matter to the Senat of Rome.

Nothing was there done after this in Liguria: for first, the enemies were retired for safety into their wilds and forests out of the way: and afterwards they called their army, and slipped away every man to their own villages and castles. The Consuls likewise were willing to break up and dimiss their forces: and thereupon sent to the LL. of the Senat to know their pleasure in that point: who advised the one of them to discharge his own regiments, and repair to Rome for the election of Magistrats the next year: and the other, with his legions, to winter at Pise. A rumour there ran, that the Transalpine French put their youth and serviceable men in arms: but it was not known what quarter of Italy this multitude thus levied, would invade. But the Consuls thus agreed together, that Cn. Baburn should be present at the general assembly at Rome, for the election aforesaid, because M. Baburn his brother lived to be Consul. Then was the assembly holden for the creation of Consuls, and elected there were, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and M. Baburn Tamphilus. This done, the Pretors also were chosen, namely, the two Quintus Fabius, the one Maximus, and the other Brutus: T. Claudius Nero, Q. Petilius Sproitus, M. Pinarius Pansa and L. Daronius. When these were entered into their magistracy, the Provinces were by lot after this manner disposed. The Ligurians fell to the Consuls: as for the Pretors, Q. Petilius was Lord chief Justice for the citizens pleas, and C. Fabius Maximus for the strangers: C. Fabius Brutus had the government of Gaul, T. Claudius Nero of Sicilia, M. Pinarius of Sardinia, L. Daronius of Apulia together with the Iliarians: for that the Tarentins and Brundusins had given intelligence, that the sea-coasts were much troubled and annoyed by the robberies of pirates and men of war from beyond Sea: and the like complaints were made by the Messinians of the Ligurian navy. For these causes order was given, and warrants went out for to levy armies: that the Consuls should have four legions between them, containing in every one 5200 Roman footmen and 300 horse: also to enrol 15000 footmen and 300 horsemen of Latine allies. In the Provinces of Spain (both the one and the other) the old Pretors continued still in their government, with the charge of those armies which they had already: and for a supplement to reinforce and make up their broken companies, there were appointed 3000 foot and 200 horse of Roman citizens together with 6000 of the one and 300 of the other, from out of the Latine nation. All this while they forgot not their navy at Sea. And the Consuls had in charge to hire for that purpose, two wardens called Dumvires, who after they had out of the Aetolian fleet into the Sea twenty ships, and set them afloat, should furnish them with mariners, and those Roman citizens, such as had been slaves and were enfranchised: and that natural Romans free born should only be Captains and have the conduct of the said vessels. These two Dumvires were parted and ordered betwix them the defence of the maritime coasts, with ten ships apiece: that the Cape of Minerva should be as it were the middle point and mark between them: so that one should guard that part on the right hand as far as to Messilia: and the other the left side even to Brundum.

This year were seen at Rome and reported from forraign parts many uncouth and strange prodigies. In the Church-vaults belonging to Vulcan and Concordia, it rained sheer blood: and the Bishops made relation, that the Spears [of Mars] shook and moved of their own accord. Also of Paonia) returned into Macedony. This Didas (as hath been said before) sent to conduct Demetrius home, abused the simplicity of the young Gentleman, who was nothing circumspect and wary; but seemed discontented and complained to him (as good cause he had) of those that were nearest in nature and blood unto him: he, I say, by flattering, by soothing him up, and seeming withal to be offended and grieved for his part at such hard usage, laid snares and grins, and set traps for him: and in conclusion, by his double diligence and offering his voluntary service to do him pleasure, protesting also to be true and fast unto him, yea, and to keep his counsel, fetched out of him the very secrets of his heart. Now had Demetrius a purpose with himself to flee to Rome, and to effectuate this designment of his, he was perswaded, that of a special grace and favour the Gods had sent and offered unto him this Didas the Pretor of Paonia to be his helper and assistant: for through his Province he conceived some hope to pass and escape with security. This intent and plot of his was both immediately disclosed to his brother Perseus, and also by him declared to his father. And first were letters hertof brought unto him, whiles he lay at the siege of Petra. Afterwards Herodorus (the principal friend that Demetrius had) was committed to ward, and withal, order was taken to watch and observe Demetrius that he started not aside; but all underhand and close, without semblance of any such matter. These occurrences above all others, caused the King to have a dolorous and heavy return into Macedony. These new accusations thus presented; troubled him much: howbeit he thought good to expect the return of those whom he had sent to Rome as spies to hear all and find out the truth. In the anguish and agony of these cares and perplexities, when the King had continued certain months, in the end those Embassadors came home: who at first ere they set foot out of Macedony, had devised and framed before hand what reports they would make from Rome. These messengers, to make up a false and forged letter, (sealed with a counterfeit signet of T. Quintius). The said letter was indited to this tenor and effect, That Quintius should seem for his own excuse to say, that albeit young Demetrius, carried away with an inordinant desire to be King, had slipped a little, and treated with him about some such matter, yet would he do nothing to prejudice any one about C. Philipp, neither would he be thought or found a man to give any unadvised and ungracious counsel. These letters struck it dead sure, and made the King believe, that all the former imputations fastned upon Demetrius were true and past all peradventure. Whereupon Herodorus presently was put to the rack and examined; but after he had endured intolerable pains a long time, and confessed nothing, he died in the end under the tormentors hand. Perseus accused Demetrius again before his father, for that he intended and provided to take his flight through Paonia. And there came forth certain to testify against him, saying, that he had corrupted, inveigled, and induced them to accompany him in that journey. But that which made most of all against him, was that same devised letter of T. Quintius. Howbeit there was no grievous sentence pronounced openly against him, to the end, that rather by some covert and cautious pretence, he might come to his death: and this, not for any fear that he had of him, but doubting, lest some open punishment executed upon him, might reveal and discover his secret designment, of making war upon the Romans.

murdered.

Philipp himself taking his journey from Thessalonica to come to Demetrius, sent Demetrius his son to Aspron, a City in Paonia, and the same Didas still to accompany him: but Perseus he addressed to Amphipolis, for to receive the hostages of the Thracians. Now it is reported, that when Didas took his leave of him and departed, the King gave him in charge to kill his son Demetrius. Didas then, either purposing indeed or making semblance to sacrifice, invited Demetrius to the celebration and feast thereof; where upon he came from Aspron to Heraclea. And (as men say) at this supper he met with a cup of poison. He had no sooner drunk it, but immediately he felt that he was lapped: for within a while he began to work extremely, and for very dolorous pain, he was forced to rise from the Table and retire into his bed-chamber: where he piously complained of the hard heart and cruelty of his father. Of the murderous mind of the parricide his brother, and of the treacherous villany of Didas: and all this while endured deadly wrongs and torments in his belly. But afterwards there were sent into the chamber, one Thyrus a Staberean, and Alexander of Berkhas, who entwined his head and throat with the bed-cloaths, carpets and cornerpieces of caparoty, and held them so hard, that they throaked and smothered him, and in the end stopped his breath that he died. Thus was this poor innocent young man piteously made away: whose enemies, one single kind of death could not content and satisfy, but needs they must kill and murder them twice.

While these things happened in Macedony, L. Emilius Paulus, who continued still in government after his Consulship expired, marched with his army against the Ligurians in games in the beginning of the spring. So soon as he was entered into the confines of his enemies country, and there encamped, there came Embassadors unto him under colour of seeking peace, but indeed only to effout and spy. Paulus made them answer, That he could contract no accord with them, unless they yielded first: which they seemed not so much to refuse, but said, That they needed some time to perswade their nation into it, being a rude and uncivil kind of people. And when they had ten daies truce allowed to effect this, they requested moreover, that the Roman soldiers might not pass over the next hills adjoining either for fowel or forage, forasmuch as those lands were the only tilled and well manured grounds of their appurtenances and territory. When they had obtained so much, they assembled all their forces on that side of the hills, from whence they

A had averted the enemies, and suddenly with a mighty multitude charged upon the Roman camp, and assaulted all the avenues and gates thereof at once. With all forcible means they continued the assault in such sort, as the Romans had not so much as either time enough to let forth and display their engines, or room sufficient to put their army in order of battell: but were compelled to defend their camp more by standing thick thronged together against the enemies in the very gates than otherwise by hardy fighting. But about the going down of the sun, when the enemies were retired, Paulus dispatched two light horsemen with letters to M. Babius the Consul, as far as Pisa, that he should come away with all speed to succour him, being in time of truce besieged. But Babius had delivered up his army before to M. Vinarius, the Pretor, he went into Sardinia. Howbeit he both certified the Senat by his letters, that L. Emilius was invellied by the Ligurians, and he wrote also to M. C. Marcellus, whose province was next adjoining, to bring over his forces (if he thought it good) out of Gaul in to Liguria, and deliver L. Emilius from siege. But alas, these succours should have come all too late; for the Ligurians the very next day returned and advanced against the camp. Emilius, albeit he not only knew that they would come, but also might have brought his power forth into the field and ranged them in array, yet he kept himself to close within the strength of his rampart, minding to hold off and not to fight, until Babius might with his army come from Pisa. Now the letters of Babius came great fear at Rome: and to mance the more, for that Marcellus being returned to the City, some few daies after he had made over his army unto Fabius, put them out of all hope, that the army which was in France could not possibly passe into Liguria, by reason of the war with the Istrians, who impeached the planting of the colony at Aquileia; against whom Fabius was gone, and might not possibly retire from thence, now that the war was once begun. The only hope they had therefore of aiding Emilius was this, (and yet the same seemed to be with the latest, considering the urgent necessity of the time) in case the Consuls made halt to go into their provinces: which to do, all the L. of the Senat called aloud and earnestly unto them. But the Consuls denied hardly to stir one foot before the levy of soldiers was fully finished; alleging that it was not their slackness, but the violence of the plague, which caused it to be so late ere it were performed. Yet for all this, such was the general accord and consent of the Senat, that they could neither will nor chuse but go forth of the City in their rich coats of arms, and by proclamation to assigne a certain day, upon which all the soldiers whom they had enrolled should shew at Pisa: and commission they had to take up D subitary soldiers; all the country over as they went, to press them forth presently and have them away. Moreover, the Pretors, Q. Petilius and Q. Fabius were both of them commanded, the one, namely, Petilius, to enrol in halt two tumularily legions of Roman citizens, and tender the military oath to all that were not above fifty years old: and Fabius, to levy of the Latine allies fifteen thousand foot, and eight hundred horsemen. The two Duumvirs or Wardens for the navy and the ports were created, namely, C. Matienus and C. Lucretius, who were soon provided of ships ready rigged, trimmed and furnished to their hands. And Matienus, who had the charge of the coasts upon the gulf of Gaul, was commanded to bring his fleet with all speed possible along, to the tract of the Ligurians, if haply he might any way tread L. Emilius and his army. Emilius after he perceived that no aid appeared from any place, supposing verily that the two horse men above said, were intercepted and staid by the way, thought good to put off no longer, but alone with his own forces to trie the fortune of a fight. And thereupon before the enemies came (who now already began more coldly and heavily to assail them thencefore) he put his men in battell array at the four gates of the camp, to the end that upon the signal given they should at once from all parts rally forth. To the four extraordinary cohorts, he assigned two others, under the conduct of M. Valerius a Lieutenant, and commanded them to break forth at the false postern gate called Extradiuaria: within the gate Principalis on the right hand, he embattelled the Hastati, Iaveliniers of the first legion, and the principes of the same legion in the rearward to second them, commanded both by M. Servilius and L. Salpinx, Knights or Tribunes military. The third legion he marshalled full against the other gate Principalis on the left hand. This change only was here, for that the Principes were let in the front, and the Hastati behind in the tail of the line. Sex, Julius Caesar and L. Aurelius Cotta, two military Tribunes had the leading of this legion. Q. Fulvius Flaccus a Lieutenant, having the conduct of the right wing, was placed at the gate Quaestoria. Two cohorts and the Triarii of two legions had commandment to stay behind for the defence of the camp. The General himself in person rode all about from gate to gate, exhorting and encouraging his men: using all the forcible means he possibly could devise, to provoke and whet the stomachs of his soldiers, and to give a point edge to their courage and choler: one while reproaching his enemies for their falsehood and treachery, who having craved peace and obtained truce; during the time of the said truce, against all law of nations were come to assail the camp: another while shewing and declaring unto them what shame and indignity it was for the Roman army to be besieged by the Ligurians, who more truly may be accounted thieves and robbers, then go for warlike enemies. If (quoth he) you should escape from hence, not by your own virtue and valour, but through the help and succour of others, with what ease shall any of you be able to meet, I say, not those soldiers who have vanquished Antioch, defeated Philip, and subdued Archelaus, the mightiest King, and greatest commander of our age: but even them who many a time have hurried and chased the very same Ligurians like brute beasts, over the wilds and forests as they fled, and hewed them in peeces in the end?

doubtful what to do : but afterwards, perceiving they had no place of retreat, it upon their discretion they should fall to running away. They saw no other hope but in fighting out, and to they began to renew the skirmish afresh, with more resolution than before. Fiercely they were encountered and charged in the midst of their battle ranged (who came to aid the Romans) wing, where they saw the soldiers of their own nation ranged (who came to aid the Romans) they made head, and advanced their ensignes with more boldness and confidence. And verily that left wing of the Romans was at the point to have retreated, but that the eleventh legion seconded and succoured them : and withal they that were left within Eburacum garrison, came from the town in the very midst and hottest of the conflict ; and Acilius from another part plied on their backs. Down went the Celibierians along time, and were cut in pieces between. As many as remained, made shift to flee and escape on all hands into every quarter. The Cavalry was sent out after them two ways in several bands : who also committed great slaughter and execution. That day were slain of the enemies about 23000, 4000 taken prisoners, with five hundred horse and above ; besides 88 military engines gotten from them and carried away. A great victory this was, but not without bloodshed of the Romans part : for of two legions there died somewhat more than two hundred, but of Latine allies 830, of foreign aids, much about 2400 lost their lives in the field. The Pretor then retired with his victorious army into his own camp. Acilius was commanded to abide still in that of their enemies, which he had forced and won. The next morning they tell to gather up the spoils of their enemies ; and those who had born themselves valiantly in that service among the rest, were rewarded with gifts in a full and frequent assembly of the whole army. After this, when the burnt and maimed were brought back into the town Eburacum, the legions were led through the country Carpetania, towards Contrebia. This City when it was once besieged sent to the Celibierians for succour ; but they came not in time : not for any slackness of their part, but because after they were departed from home, and had entered on their journey, the foul waies hindered and staid them, which they were not able to pass for the continual rain that fell over and besides, the waters were out and the rivers swelled so high, that possibly they could not come forward : whereupon the besieged inhabitants being in despair of help, from their friends, rendered the town. Flaccus likewise was forced by the storm and tempestuous weather to put his army into the same City. Now the Celibierians, who were on foot in their journey, and not aware that their friends had surrendered, at length having passed over the rivers (when the rain gave over and the weather took up) came to Contrebia ; but seeing no camp without the walls, and supposing that it was either removed to the other side, or the enemies dilloided and gone, they approached the town, and marched loosely and retchlessly forward in disorder. The Romans sallied out upon them at two gates, fell upon them (disbanded as they were) and put them to the rout. But see what happened : that thing which hindered them that they could not make head, resist, and settle themselves to begin fight (namely, because they came not together in one entire band, nor yet by great companies about their colours) the same flood them in good stead to save many of their lives that fled. For they ran for scattering, and were so spread all over the plains, that in no place could the enemy meet with them in any number thick together, to compass them about on every side. Howbeit 12000 of them were killed, & above 3000 taken prisoners, besides 400 horse, 62 engines of war won from them. Those who after their struggling flight retired homeward, met with another troop of Celibierians coming forward, unto whom they retired, and the yielding up of Contrebia and their own misfortune : by which means they caused them to turn and goe back againe, who immediately flit away in their villages and forts. Then Flaccus departed from Contrebia, and conducted his legions through Celiberia wailling and spoiling as he went : where he forced many castles until the greater part of that country was reduced under his obedience. These affairs passed in high Spain that year. As for the lower province, Manlius the Pretor fought fortunately in certain battells against the Portugals.

The same year a Colony of Latins was planted in Aguilina, within the territory of the Gauls, and thither were conducted three thousand footmen, and every one of them were endowed with fifty acres of land. The Centurions received had a hundred, and the horsemen a hundred and forty acres apiece given unto them. And the Commissioners for this conduct and distribution were P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, C. Flaminius, and L. Manlius Acidinus. In which year also two Temples were dedicated, the one to Venus Erycina near the gate Colina (which L. Porcius Licinus the son of Lucius dedicated, being a Duumvir deputed for that purpose, and had been vowed before by L. Porcius the Consul in the Ligurian war) the other to the goddess Pity, in the herb market : and of this chappell M. Acilius Glabrio the other Duumvir, had the dedication ; where, he erected and set up in the honor of his father Glabrio, a gilt statue, which was the first gilded image that ever was made in Italy. This Glabrio the father was he, who had vowed to edifie the said Temple that very day on which he fought the battell against K. Antiochus at Thermopylae, and by warrant from the Senat, had bargained for the building thereof at a price. In those daies wherein these holy houses were consecrated, L. Emilius Paulus the Proconul, triumphed over the Ligurians Irgaures. He had born before him in these five and twenty golden Coronets, and dresses them there was no gold or silver else carried in that triumph. But many principal Ligurians, men of mark, whom he took captive, were led before his chair. He dealt among his soldiers, 300 Asles apiece. The fame of this triumph of his, was much more renowned by this at this occasion, that the Ligurian Embassadors craved to have a perpetual peace with the Romans (saying, That their whole nation were relieved, never to take arms again, but by commandment and licence of the people of Rome. Q. Fabius the Pretor, returned his answer unto them by the advice of the Senat, That it was no news to hear this language from the Ligurians ; but as for them upon and was befitting rather, to carry a new mind, and the same agreeable to their speech ; and therefore they should go to the Consuls, and by them which they were enjoined to forsake much as the Senat would believe none but the word only of the Consuls in the behalf of the Ligurians, as touching their true and sincere meaning to obieve peace. Thus was peace concluded with the Ligurians : but there was a battell fought in Corfica with the Islanders there ; in which M. Titinius the Pretor slew 1000 of them in the field ; which defeat compelled them to give hostages and besides 100000 pound weight of wax, 10000 thence the army was conducted into Sardania, where passed some fortuitous battells against the Romans. A season at this day not fully quieted & appeased. In this very year also were the hundred hostages led back again to the Carthaginians ; with whom the people of Rome made and maintained peace, as well for their own part, as in the behalf of K. Masinissa, who at that time with an armed garison, held the possession of that territory which had been in question. The Consuls in their province sat still and had nothing to do. M. Bibulus was sent for to Rome, against the general assembly for the election of magistrates : who elected Consuls, A. Posthumus Albinus and C. Calpurnius Piso. After this, were elected Pretors Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, A. Posthumus Albinus, P. Cornel. Mancinus, T. Minucius Molliculus, A. Hostilius Mancinus, and C. Mancinus ; and they all retired into their magistracy upon the 15 day of March.

In the beginning of that year wherein A. Posthumus Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Piso were Consuls : A. Posthumus the Consul brought into the Senat twelve persons who were come from Q. Fulvius Flaccus out of the hither province of Spain : to wit L. Minutius his Lieutenant general, and the two colonels, T. Manius and L. Massilius. These men after they had made report of two fields fortuitously fought against the Celibierians, of their country yielded and brought under their subjection ; and that the term of government in that province was expired, and no more left to be done there ; so as there was no need either of the ordinary money which was wont to be sent for soldiers pay, or of corn to be carried unto the army for that year : requested of the Senat first to regard of their happy successe, to yield honor and praise to the immortal gods : and then, that Q. Fulvius might depart and come his waies out of the province, and bring with him that army of his from thence, whole valie in service, both himself and also many Pretors before him had used : which (say they) was not only meet and convenient, but also requisite and needfull in a manner to be done : forasmuch as the soldiers were so distressed and obliat, that it seemed impossible to hold them any longer in that province, but that they would be gone and depart without licence, if they were not dimissed : or else break out into some dangerous fire of a mutiny, if a man should go about to keep and hold them back by strong hand. The Senat gave order that Liguria should be the province for both Consuls : which done, the Pretors also cast lots for theirs. To A. Hostilius fell the civill jurisdiction over the citizens : and to Minutius over the forrainers ; P. Cornelius had the government of Sicily : C. Mancinus of Sardania. Unto L. Posthumus was allotted the farther part of Spain, and to Tib. Sempronius the hither. This Sempronius (because he was to succeed Q. Fulvius) fearing his province should be left naked and disinforced of the old soldiers, I demand (qu. he) of you, O L. Minutius, since you bring word that there is no more trouble behind of that province, whether you think that the Celibierians will continue still in their allegiance for ever, so as that province may be protected and held in obedience without any army at all ? And if you cannot undertake to assure us of the faith and loyalty of these Barbarians & do advise us in any hand to maintain an army in those parts, whether you will give counsel to the Senat, for to send a supply into Spain : for they only should be called and discharged, who have served out their full years required by law, and so that new and raw soldiers be mingled with the rest of the old : or that the old Ligurians should full and whole be removed out of the province, and new legions enrolled, and sent thither in their stead ? Considering that the small account that usually is made of such faith and untrained soldiers, were enough to induce and move even the more quiet and peaceable sort of Barbarians to rebel and make war again ? Soon said it is, but not so easily done, to have made an end of all troubles in such a province, especially where the people are naturally inclined to wars, and prone ever and anon to make insurrections. Some few Cities, as far as I can hear, and namely, those which being near unto the soldiers lying in winter garrison, were by them held in awe and kept down, have yielded and are become subject : but they that were further off, be in arms still and have weapon in hand. Which being so, I tell you (my LL) even now before hand, that I will perform my service to the Commonwealth, with the help of that army which is there already at this present ; but in case Flaccus bring away those legions with him, will submit that question which is in peace, to winter in, and not hazard my young and new soldiers among them, to be presented to the devotion and mercy of most fierce and warlike enemies. The Lieutenant answered to these demands in this manner, That neither himself nor any man else was able for his life, to divine and foretell what was in the heart of the Celibierians now, and what they would mind and intend to do hereafter : and therefore he could not deny, but the better policy it was, to send an army among these Barbarians (peaceable though they seemed to be at this present) be-

"cause as yet they are inured to government, and cannot well skill of being subjects. But whether it be more expedient to employ new forces, as the old, it is for him to speak and fer down, upon his knowledge can say, how loyalty the Celtiberians will carry themselves in time of peace, and is withal assured, that the soldiery will hold them content and quiet, if they be detained any longer in the province. But if a man may conjecture and give a guess what they think in their heart, either by their grumbling words secretly one to another; or their speeches uttered in the presence and hearing of their General, when he maketh orations to them in publick audience: I tell you truly they have eyed out with open mouth, that either they will keep their General with them in the province, or home they will with him into Italy. This debate between the Pretor and the Lieutenant, was interrupted and broken off, by a new matter propounded before the Senat by the Consuls, who thought it meet and reasonable, that order should be taken for their own furniture and setting forth with men, money, and munition to their provinces, before any thing were spoken or treat of as touching the Pretor his army. So, ordained it was, that the Consuls should have their entire army of new soldiery, to wit, each of them two legions of Roman citizens with their cavalry, together with the usual and accustomed number at all other times of Latine allies, namely, 15000 foot and 800 horse. And with this power they had in charge to make war against the Ligurian Apuans. As for P. Cornelius and M. Baebius, they continued still in place of command: and were willing to hold their provinces, until the Consuls were thither come. Then they were commanded to discharge the army which they had, and to return to Rome. After this, speech there was concerning the army of Tib. Sempronius; and the Consuls had warrant to enroll one new legion, consisting of five thousand and two hundred foot and 400 horse: over and besides, 1000 footmen, and 50 horse of Roman citizens. Likewise the Latine nation was charged with a levy of 7000 foot and 300 horse. With which army it was thought good, that T. Sempronius should go into the higher province of Spain. As for Q. Fulvius, he was permitted to bring back with him (if he thought well thereof) all those soldiery, as well Romans as allies, which had been transported over into Spain before the Consulship of Sp. Posthumus and Q. Martius: and more than that (after a new supply was come) the supplement in two legions above 1400 foot, and 600 horse, and the over-plus of 12000 footmen of Latins, and six hundred horsemen; and namely, those whose valorous service C. Fulvius had tried and found in two battles against the Celtiberians. Moreover, solemn processions and thanksgiving were by authority ordained for his happy managing of the affairs of the Common-wealth: & then the rest of the Legions were sent into their provinces, Q. Fabius being had his commission renewed to govern Gallia still. Thus it was agreed in the Senat, that there should be eight legions maintained and kept in pay this year, over and above the old army in Liguria, which was in good hope shortly to be dismissed. Howbeit even these forces (being no greater than they were) hardly could be made full and complete by reason of the pestilence which now three years had reigned, and dispeopled the City of Rome and all Italy. During which plague the Pretor T. Minutius, and not long after him, the Consul C. Calpurnius died: with many other brave and famous persons of each degree and quality. So, at length these men began to hold this depopulation and calamity for a prodigious token and strange wonder. Whereupon C. Servilius the Arch-bishop was charged, to search out means for to appease the wrath and anger of the gods; and the Decemvirs likewise to perseute the books of Sibylla: the Consuls to vow certain presents and oblations, to Dian Apollo, Essestapins and Lady Salus, and to set up their images garnished with gold: which he vowed and erected accordingly. The Decemvirs proclaimed supplications & prayers two daies together for the health of the people, throughout the City, and in all market towns and places of frequent resort and assembly. Above twelve years of age, wore chaplets & garlands of flowers upon their heads, & bare branches of lawre in their hands, while they were at their prayers & devotion. Moreover, there was crept into mens heads a suspicion that some devilish and wicked hand might be the cause of all this. Whereupon by an act of the Senat, a commission was granted out unto C. Claudius the Pretor (who was substituted and chosen in the room of T. Minutius) to make search and diligent inquisition after all contentions of poison, & the practices thereof, within the City & for the compass of ten miles about it every way: In like manner, to C. Manlius for to fit in the enquiry thereof before he crossed over-sea into his province of Sardinia in all the mart-towns and places of assembly which were more than ten miles off from Rome. Of all others, the Consul his death was most suspected. For given out it was, that Quarta Hostilia his wife, had murdered him: but when he was seen once, that her own son Q. Fulvius Flaccus, was declared Consul in place of his father in law and mother's husband, the death of Piso the Consul began to be more infamous and suspicious: a great deal then before. And witnesses there came forth ready to depose, that after Albinus and Piso were pronounced Consuls (in which election the said Flaccus was rejected and suffered a repulse) his mother reproached him therewith, and laid it in his dish, that this was the third time that he had for the Consulship and gone without: adding moreover, and willing him to be ready to stand for it again, for that the world would and bring it about, that within two months he should be Consul. Among other testimonies and depositions making for the cause and tending to the same, that speech of hers also, taking effect too truly and to just within the time, was thought sufficient to condemn Hostilia.

In the beginning of this spring, while the levy of soldiery raised the new Consul at Rome, whilst the death of the one and the choosing of the other into their place, caused all thing there

A to go more slowly forward; in the mean time P. Cornelius, and M. Baebius who had done nothing worthy of the remembrance during the Consulship, led their armies against the Ligurian Apuans. These Ligurians, who before the coming of the Consuls into the province looked for no war, were surprized at unawares, and to the number of 12000 of them yielded: whom Cornelius and Baebius resolved, upon advice had first with the Senat by letters) to transport from the mountains, into plains and champion country from their own home; to the end they should have no more hope to return; for otherwise they supposed the Ligurian war would never have an end. Now there was in the Samnitis country a certain territory belonging in common to the people of Rome, which sometimes had been in the tenure and possession of the Taurians. In which place they being desirous to plant the Ligurian Apuans, published an edict, that they should descend down the mountains Andros, together with their wives and children, and bring away with them all that ever they had. But the Ligurians sent their Embassadors oftentimes to intreat, that they might not be forced to abandon their domesticall gods, the place of their nativity, and the sepulchres of their ancestors; and therewith promised to deliver up their armor, and to put in hostages. Howbeit, seeing they could not prevail, and having not strength and power enough to wage war again, they obeyed the edict and proclamation. So there was transfarled from thence at the publick charges of the City, to the number of four thousand persons free born, together with their women and children: and unto them was allowance made of 15000 Sesterces, toward the building of new houses. And for to distribute and divide land among them the same men to wit, Cornelius and Baebius had commission, who also removed them into their parts. Howbeit at the request of these twain, there were Quinquagars or five commissioners assistants granted unto them by the Senat, by whose advice they might manage all their affairs being finished, after they had brought with them to Rome their old army, they obtained of the Senat a grant to triumph. And these were the first that ever triumphed & made no war before. Only the enemies were led in shew before their chariot; for nothing had they gained and won for to be carried or led in pomp; neither was there ought to be seen in their triumphs, which might bedekt and given among the soldiery.

The same year Fulvius Flaccus the Pretor in Spain, by occasion that his successor stayed long ere he came into the province, brought forth his army into the field out of his wintering camp, and began to waite and spoil the farther parts and territories of Celiberia: from whence the inhabitants came not in to submit and do their homage and fealty. By which deed of his, he rather provoked and angered the barbarous people, then persuaded them: for when they had secretly gathered together certain forces and companies, they beleaguered and barred the passage Manlianum, by which they were assured that the Roman army would passe. As Sp. Posthumus Albinus was upon his journey into the nether province of Spain, Gracchus his colleague charged him to advertise Quintus Fabius for to bring his army to Tarraco, for that he propoised there to discharge his old soldiery, to distribute the supply which he brought, & to range in order all his army by companies. Notice also was given to Flaccus of the very day (which was neerer at hand) upon which his successor would come. This new occurrence caused Flaccus to lay aside those enterprises which he intended, and in all haste to withdraw his forces out of Celiberia. The barbarous people knowing not the cause hereof, but supposing that he had some inkling of their revolt, and now they had in secret taken arms, and that thereupon he was sore afraid, guarded and stepped the passage so much more streightly. Now to soon as the Roman army was entered into the pass one morning betimes at the break of day, the enemies arose suddenly at once out of two parts, and charged the Romans which when Flaccus perceived, he gave commandment by the ministry of the Centurions, that every man should keep his place and stand on his ground, to have his arms and weapons in readiness; by which means he appeased the tumult and affright in his host. Then after he had brought all his labouring beasts with the baggage, unto one place, he embattelled and put in array all his bands and companies, partly by himself in person, and partly by his Lieutenants and colonels: according as the ground and the time required, shewing no sign at all of fear, but putting his men in mind of the enemies, in these terms: "Ye have (quoth he) to do with those that twice already yielded have yielded unto us, who are inured and practised still in wickedness & perjury, not bettered in virtue and courage: those I say who are like to make our return home honorable and glorious, which otherwise would have been obscure and nothing memorable: so as we shall carry to Rome for a triumph, our iwards all bloody and newly bathed in the green wounds and flesh massacre of our enemies; and bear away the spoils of their bodies, all embued and still dropping with their blood. Time would not permit him to say any more, for now the enemies advanced forward, and the charge was already given in the utmost skirts of the army, and anon the main battels encountered and joyned conflict. The fight was hot and cruel alike in all parts, but the fortune divers: for the Roman legions in the main battell fought valiantly, and the two wings of either hand did their devoir as bravely. The auxiliary strangers had to deal with enemies armed in deed at all points like to themselves, but better soldiery by odds than they were; in such sort, as they were over-charged by them, and could not make good their ground. The Celtiberians perceiving they were not able to match the legions in ranged battell and close hand-fight, call their companies into a pointed and coin-femmed battalion for to pierce perforce and enter upon their enemies in which manner of fight they are so strong, that it is not possible to withstand them, wherefore they give their violent charge. And then the legions also were put in disarray,

and the whole main battel after a fort, was disbanded and broken. Which disorder and fear-H full trouble when Flaccus perceived he rode a gallop to the legionary men of arms: What? (qd. he unto them) is there no help at all in you? and shall this army here be thus defeated utterly and come to nought? Whereat they cryed on all hands to him to give direction and speak only the word what he would have done, & he should see how they would belitt themselves in the execution of his command. "Marry (quoth he) double your troops, you that are the horsemen of two legions, and run your horses with full carrier against that wedge-formed battalion of the enemies, where with they press upon our men; and this shall you perform with the more violence of your horses, if you disburden them and let them have full head, and to let spurs and rush in among them: which we have read in stories, that the Romans many a time have practised to their great praise and honour. No sooner said, but done it was; plucked were the hides over their horse heads; twice they ran through the mids of them and fro from one side to another, brake all their lances upon the enemies, overthrow them, and made foul work and slaughter among them. When this pointed battalion of the Celtiberians was once broken, (even the whole and only hope they had;) then they began to fear and tremble, then were they at the point to quit the fight, and to look about them which way to take their flight. The extraordinary Cavalry in the out-wings (seeing to brave a service performed by the Roman horsemen) were enkindled: by their valorous example, and of their own accord without attendance of any mans commandments, charged upon their enemies, thus disordered and in disarray already. Then the Celtiberians ran away and fled on all hands. The Roman General seeing them once turn back and shew their hin-parts, vowed to build a chappell to Fortuna equitum, and to exhibit games in the honor of Imp. Opt. Max. The Celtiberians, thus disbanded and scattered in the rout all over the length of the freight passage, were killed and cut in peeces. It is recorded that there died that day seventeen thousand enemies, and were taken prisoners alive more than three thousand, together with 27 field ensigns, and well near eleven hundred horses. For that day, the victorious army lodged within no camp at all: yet was not this victory so clear, but it cost them the losse of some souldiers: for of the Romans were slain four hundred seventy and two; of allies, and namely of Latins: 1019; and together with them, and souldiers three thousand. Thus the army having by this good hand recovered their ancient honor and glory, was conducted to Tarracoon. Tib. Sempronius the Pretor, (who was arrived two daies before) went out to meet Fulvius. Tib. Sempronius the Pretor, (who was arrived two daies before) went out to meet Fulvius. In the way as he came, and showed how he rejoiced on his behalf, for this good man-ning and happy achieving the affairs of the commonweal: whom done, they agreed together with great accord as touching the souldiers, namely, which to exile and lend away, and whom to retain in their service. Then Fulvius having shipped the souldiers that were discharged, took his journey to Rome: and Sempronius conducted the legions into Celtiberia.

Both the Consuls led their forces into Liguria, and entered the countrey in two divers quarters, Posthumius with the first legion and the third, belet and invetted the two mountains, Baifia and Suisfontanus, and so freighly he kept the narrow passes of those parts with his garisons, that he cut them off from all victuals, and tamed them with extreame scarcity and want of all things. Fulvius with the second legion and the fourth, after he had assailed the Apuan Ligurians from the coast of Pisa, received submission and homage of as many of them as inhabited about the river Maera; and when he had embarked upon seven thousand of them, he sent them over to Naples, coasting along the Tuiscan sea. From whence they were brought into the Samnit countrey, and a certain territory assigned them to inhabit amongst the rest of their countrymen. As for A. Posthumius, he cut down the vineyards, and burnt the corn of the Ligurian mountaineers, so long untill they were driven by all manner of calamities following war, to come in and submit; yea, and to deliver up their armor and weapons. From thence Posthumius departed and took the sea, because he would visit the coasts of the Ligurian Ingunes and Intemelians. Now, before that these Consuls came to the army which was appointed to meet at Pisa; it chanced A. Posthumius & M. Fulvius Nobilior, the brother of Q. Fulvius, were the commanders, and had the conduct thereof. This Fulvius was a Colonnell of the second legion, who during the time of those months, wherein he turn he had the command and charge thereof, diminished that legion, having bound the Centurions by an oath, that they should make payment back of their wage-money well and truly to the Quæstors in the chamber and treasury of Rome. Notice hereof being given to M. Posthumius at Placentia, (for thither it hapned that he was gone) he rode after those called souldiers, and pursued them with a company of light horsemen. As many of them as he could overtake, after he had checked and rebuked them for their fault, he brought to Pisa; of the rest he gave information to the Consul, who put the matter to question, and after it had been debated in council, an act of the Senat passed against the said M. Fulvius, that he should be confined and sent into Spain beyond the farthest province of Spain. As for the souldiers, they were commanded to return again to their colours, and for an ignominious disgrace of that legion, ordained it was, that for a full years pay they should be content and take up with fix months wages. And look what souldiers repined not to the army accordingly, the Consul had warrant and commission to make sale of him and all that he had.

The same year L. Davonius, who was returned with ten ships to Brundisium from out of Ilyriam (where he sat as Pretor the former year) leaving his ships there in the rode, came to Rome; where

A where, in discoursing of the acts by him done, he laid the whole fault of all the recovery and peace at sea upon Geminus the King of the Illyrians, saying, that all the ships which had lien upon the coast of the Adriatick sea, came out of his realm. For which he had sent Embassadors to complain, but they could never find means to speak with the King about it. Now they were Embassadors arrived at Rome from Geminus, who avouched, that when the Romans came for to parlie with the King, he hapned to be sick in the most remote parts of his kingdom: and therefore Geminus their King and master requested the Senat, who was to give credit to those false accusations and forged slanders which his enemies had raised and informed against him. But Ennius alleged moreover, that divers and sundry persons, as well citizens of Rome as Latine allies within his dominion, had received many wrongs: yea, and by report certain Roman citizens were slain and detained at Coreyra. Whereupon it was in council thought good that they should be brought to Rome, and that C. Claudius the Pretor should have the hearing of the matter, before such time no answer would be given unto King Geminus or his Embassadors.

Among many others that the plague this year consumed, certain priests and prelates also died, and namely, L. Valerius Flaccus, a bishop, in whose room was chosen Q. Fabius Labeo. Also P. Manlius one of three Triumvirs for the celebration of the holy feasts. In whole head Q. Fulvius the son of Marcus was elected Triumvir. He was at that time very young, and not out of his em-brodered Prætexta. But as touching the King of sacrificers, who was to be chosen in place of C. Prætextatus Cornelius Dolabella, there was debate between C. Servilius the Archibishop, and Cornelius Dolabella one of the Duumvirs for the navy. For when the bishop would have had him to resign that under years office, that he might consecrate and inaugurate him the King sacrificer, he refused to do so, for this cause the bishop set a round fine on the Duumvir his head. Then Dolabella appealed to the people; and before them it was to be tried, whether the said fine should be taken off or paid? Now the end of it when mock of the tribes called into the rails for to give their voices, advised the Duumvir to obey the bishop, and awarded the fine to be pardoned and remitted, in case he would give over that office which he had, behold it lightened at the very instant from heaven, which is the only ominous sign that interrupteth the assemblies of the people. Whereupon the Colledge of the bishops made scruple of conscience to inaugurate Dolabella, but they consecrated P. Cladius Scutulus, who had this been in the second place. In the end of the year C. Servilius Geminus likewise the Archibishop himself departed this world, who also was one of the ten Decemvirs deputed for the holy ceremonies. And Q. Fulvius Flaccus, was by the colledge of the bishops, deputed for the holy D. room. But M. Aemilius Lepidus was created the lower sign Pontifice, notwithstanding many noble persons made suit therefore. Likewise Q. Marcius Philop a Decemvir for the holy mysteries, Scipio the son of Africannus was elected by the Augurs. The same year granted it was to the inhabitants of Cume, at their own request and petition, that they might commonly speak Latine: as also to the publick criers, to make portale of goods in the Latine tongue. The Senat gave thanks to the Pisans for the offer they made of lands, wherein to plant a Colony of Latins. And three Triumvirs or Commissioners for that business were created, namely, Q. Fabius Dente, Marcus and Publius, both named Popilius, and both surnamed Lanus. Letters were brought from M. Marius the Pretor (who having the government allotted unto him of Sardinia, had commission also to enquire after the practise of pyloning in all places, not within ten miles of the City of Rome) importing thus much, that he had condemned already 3000 persons, and that the informations and presentments multiplied daily, by reason of new matters discovered still, and therefore either he was to give over that inquisition, or to resign up his province Sardinia.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus returned out of Spain to Rome with great honour for his acts there achieved. Who remaining yet without the City, because of his triumph, was created Consul with L. Manlius Acidinus, and within few daies after, rode triumphally into Rome, accompanied with his souldiers, whom he had brought home with him. He carried in triumph a 1200 golden coronets. Moreover in gold 31 pound weight, besides 173.00 peeces of coin in Olean silver. He dealt to his souldiers fifty Denarii peeces out of the booty and pillage which he had gotten. To every Centurion he gave it double, and to the gentlemen of Rome that served on horseback, triple. The like he did by the Latin allies, and to all the general he paid double wages. This year was the law first propoted by L. Julius a Trib. of the Com. as touching the year of the age requisite and meet for to sue for any publick office, or to exercise the same. And hereupon it came, that the whole race of that family was surnamed Annalis. Many yeas after there were created four Pretors according to the law Babin, which provided that there should be each other year four chieftains. And there were they who were first elected, namely, Cn. Cornелиus Scipio, L. Valerius Lavinius, Q. Fabius Dente, and M. both named Mutius, and both surnamed Scævola.

Unto the Consuls Q. Fulvius and L. Manlius the government of the same provinces was ordained, which to those of the former yeas, with like numbers of horse and foot, as well citizens as allies. In both provinces of Spain, Tib. Sempronius and L. Posthumius continued still to have the command and conduct of the same armies which they had. And for to furnish them out, the Consul was enjoined to enroll three thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen of Roman civill jurisdiction within the City of Rome, and commission to enquire into the devilish art of self calling pyloning both within the City, and within the compass of ten miles, Cn. Cornelius Scipio was lord chief justice in forrain pleas and causes, Q. M. Scævola was lord deputy of Sicily.

and C. Fulvius in Sardinia. Q. Fulvius the Consul, before that he went in hand with any attairs of State, said he would both discharge himself and also the City of the duty to Godward, in performing the vows which he had made. He declared that on that very day wherein he fought his last battell with the Celiberians, he had made a vow to exhibit games to the honour of that most mighty and gracious god Jupiter, and likewise to build a temple to Fortuna Augusta; and how thereto the Spaniards had contributed certain sums of money. So a decree passed, that those plates should be set forth: and two Duumvirs chosen, to give order and bargain for the edification of the same temple. Likewise there was set down a certain list of money to be disbursed for the delaying of the charges; so wit, not exceeding that sum in the solemnity of the plays, which was allowed unto Fulvius Nobilior, when he exhibited the like sports after the end of the Aetoli- an war, Item, that for these games he should not seek or fend for, gather and raise, receive or do any thing, contrary to the Act of the Senat, which in the time of L. Aemilius and Cn. Babius the Consuls was made as touching such pastimes. This decree the Senat ordeined, by occasion of the superfluous and excessive expences employed about the plaies of T. Sempronius the Aedile; which were very chargeable not only to Rome and the Latine allies, but also to forraign provinces. The winter this year was very sharp, by reason of snow, and all manner of tempestuous weather. The streets that were tender and subject to frost and cold, were all blasted and killed; besides the winter season continued much longer then ordinary in other years. And therupon the festivall solemnity of the Latine holidays were troubled and disordered by a suddain and insupportable storm and tempest upon the hill Capitol that by an ordinance of the Bishops, it was celebrated again the second time. The same tempest cast down certain ages in the Capitol, and disfigured very many places with thunderbolts and flashes of lightning. It overthrew the temple of Ju- piter in Tarracina, the white temple at Capua; Item, the gate there called Romana, and the battlemens of the walls in divers places. Among these wondrous prodigies it was reported also elements of the walls in divers places. For this cause the Decemvirs were commanded to go to the books of Sibylla: and out of that learning, they shewed to what gods sacrifice should be made, & what number of beasts was to be killed. And because many places were with lightning defaced, they obtained that a solemn supplication should be holden one whole day in the temple of Jupiter. This done, the foresaid games and plaies which Q. Fulvius the Consul had owed, were with great magnificence exhibited for ten daies together. After this followed the election of the Censors, wherein M. Aemilius Lepidus the Arch-bishop, and M. Fulvius Nu- bilio, who had triumphed over the Aetolians, were created. Now between these two men, there had been notorious enmity, oftentimes testified and shewed in many sharp and bitter debates, between the Senat, and also before the people. When this election was ended, the two Censors according to the ancient use and custome, (as upon their ivory chairs of estate in Mars field, near the altar of Mars. To whom there soon repaired thither the principal Senators, accompanied with a troop besides of citizens: and among the rest, Q. Cassius Metellus made a speech to this effect.
“My matters, you that are Censors, we have not forgotten that you ere while were chosen by the universal body of the people of Rome, to be superintendents and wardens over us for our manners and behavior; and that it becometh us to be taught, admonished, & directed by you, and not you by us. Howbeit we ought to tell and declare, what therein in you, that either is offensive to all good men; or at leastwise which they wish were amended. When we behold and consider you severally put, either you, O M. Aemilius, or you M. Fulvius, we have not this day in the City of Rome any men, whom if we were called to a new testimony for to passe our voices again, we would prefer before you to this office and place of dignity. But when we see you both together, we cannot chuse but much doubt and fear that ye are very badly matched and coupled as com-pansions in government; & that the common-weal shall not receive so much good by this. That ye plague and like us all so well, as is usual harm in this. That you dispute and dislike one another. These many yeers together, there hath been great heart-burning and much malice between you and the same must needs be grievous and hurtfull unto your selves: but now it is become that from this day forward, that rancor will be more prejudiciall to us & the commonweal, then unto you. Upon what motives and cause we are thus fearful, much we could say, well, then unto you. Upon what motives and cause we are thus fearful, much we could say, but that peradventure your irreconcilable anger is such, as hath incensed and possessed wholly your spirits and minds already. These quarrels, jars, and grudges of yours, we all in generall would request you heartily to end this day, and in this very temple wherein we are assembled: and since the people of Rome by their voices have conjoined you in one office; suffer your selves by us to be linked & reconciled in perfect atonement. With one mind and accord, with one heart & without chafe the Senat; review the Cavalry and Knight-hood of Rome; number the citizens; afflict their goods; purge and cleanse the City; & finally commendate the solemnity of the censo with a sacrifice. And whereas in all your praies well-need, ye shall use this ordinary form of words, That this thing, or that, may fall out in the end well and happily, to my self and to my col- leagues. See that you with the same truly, sincerely and from the very heart, that whatsoever ye shall pray unto the gods for, we then may believe and all the world see, that you desire the same to be effected indeed. T. Tullius and Romulus in this very City reigned together with great unity & concord, in the midst whereof even in the very market place, they had encountered and joined battell together as mortal enemies with their cruell armies. What! not enemies only have an end, but wars also. And many a time most venomous and pitiful foes become faithful allies, yes,

The Orator
of Metellus, to the Censors,

- A “yes, and otherwhiles neer neighbors and fellow citizens. The Albans after their subjection and “and utter ruin of their City, were brought over to inhabit Rome. The Latins & Sabins both, were “ennidened Romans. An old saying it is, and not to old as true, and for the truth become a “common proverb, that enmities ought to be transitory and soon die, whereas friendship should “continue & live for ever. At these words, there arose a confused bust, among them there assembled, in token of their content and approbation: and anon were heard the distinct voices of them all in general, craving and requesting of the Censors the same: which making one entire found, brake off the speech of Metellus. Then Aemilius among other matters complained, that M. Fulvius had twice put him besides the Consulship, which otherwhile he was ture of. And Fulvius on the other side found himself grieved, that he evermore by Aemilius had been provoked, and that he B had waged law by stipulation against him to his dishonor and disgrace. Yet both of them made fair and lawed, that if the one were as willing as the other, they would relent and be over-ruled by so many honorable personages of the City. So, at the instant request of all them that were present, they shook hands and thereby assured one another to forgive and forget all matters past, and truly to make an end of malice, and be perfect friends again: whereupon they were much commended by the whole assembly, and conducted by them into the Capitell. Where the Senat approved and highly praised, as well the careful industry of the principal citizens, in effecting this weighty matter, as also the good nature and flexibility of the two Censors. Who afterwards when they required to have a certain sum of money assigned unto them for to employ in the publick edifices and other works of the City, were allowed by their decree, the full rent and revenues of one whole yeer.
- C The same yeer L. Posthumus and Tib. Sempronius the Pro-Pretors in Spain agreed to together that Albanus should make an expedition again the Pacceti through Lusitania, and to return from thence into Celiberia. But Gracchus went as far as the utmost quarter of Celiberia, for that in those parts there was the greater war. And first he forced the City Munda, which he surprised suddenly in the night at unawares. Then, after he had received hostages, and put a garrison there, he went forward assaulting forts and burning the villages, until he came to another City of exceeding strength, which the Celiberians call Cerisma: where, as he was about to approach the walls with his engines of batterry, there came unto him orators out of the City; who like good plain men of the old world, made a speech unto him, nothing dissembling but that they would war and be revenged, if their strength and forces were sufficient. For they requested leave to passe D to the Celiberian camp, there to receive aid and succour: but if they could not speed, then they would consult: part by themselves what to do. Good leave they had of Gracchus; and some few daies after, they brought with them ten Orators more. About noone-tide it was of the day, and the first thing that they craved at the Pretor his hand was this, That he would make them to drink before they parted. When they had once quaffed and carowed round, they called again for more: whereas, all that were present stood about them, laughed heartily, to see them so rude and uncivil, and altogether without good manners. But afterwards, the eldest man of the company began in this wise: We are sent (quoth he) unto you from our nation, to know what affur-E means hath induced you to levy war against us? To this demand Gracchus answered, That he came with the confidence that he had in a brave and valiant army; which if they were so defi-F rous he would do them the favour to see, that they might be able to make more certain report to their countrymen upon their own knowledge. And with that, he commanded the colonels and knight marshalls to put in arms and embattle all the bands and companies, as well foot as horse; and then armed as they were to charge one upon another in manner of a battell. These Embassadors after they had once seen this sight, were sent away: who went directly to the Celiberians their neighbors, and frighted them for sending any succour to the City besieged. The townsmen within having in vain set fire-lights in the night time aloft upon their towers (which was the signal agreed upon between them) and seeing themselves destitute of the only hope they had of aid, yielded by composition. So they were enjoined to make payment of four and twenty hundred thousand Sesterces; and to deliver forty of their noblest gentlemen and best men of arms: not by way of hostages (for commanded they were to serve in the wars); and yet in truth, they stood for a pawn of assurance for their fealty. From thence anon he marched to the City Alba, where the C Celiberians lay encamped, and from whom of late the Embassadors afore said came: whom, for certain daies he provoked to fight, making small skirmishes, by sending out against their corps de guard his light-armed vanguardiers, to the end that scuffling together every day more then other he might train them all forth of their camp at length. And when he perceived once that his design had taken effect, he commanded the captains of the auxiliary souldiers, that after some short skirmish, they should make semblant as if they were overcharged with numbers, and as if once turn their backs, and flee as fast as they could to their own camp: himself in the mean while G put his men in battell array within the rampier at every gate. Long it was not, but he might see his own bands and companies retiring back on foot purpose, and running a way, and after them the barbarous enemies following as hard as they could in chace. Now had he his army embattel-led for the purpose, and ready to receive them: and therefore he made no longer stay then only to suffer his friends and allies to enter at liberty into the camp, but he set up a loud cry, and at one instant joined forth at all the gates. The enemies were not able to endure this unexpected violent charge: and to they that were come to assail the camp of others, could not so much as defend

Curvius, Titus Claudius Nero, and T. Pontius Capito. The Roman games were exhibited again the second time, by the two Aediles of the Chair. Cn. Servilius Capito, and Ap. Claudius Ceno, by occasion of certain prodigies that hapned: for there was an earthquake: and in the publick pavilions and tabernacles, where the sacred beds of the gods were solemnly spread, the heads of the gods which were laid in those beds, turned away of their own accord, and the wool together with the other coverlets which were laid before Jupiter fell down. It was taken also for a prodigious wonder, that the mice and rats had gnawn and tasted before of the olives upon the table [of Jupiter]: for the satisfaction and expiation of which prodigies, nothing else was done, but the solemnizing of those games and plaies again, as is afore said.

The one and fortieth Book Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the one and fortieth Book.

The fire in the Temple of Vesta went out. Tib. Sempronius Gracchus the Pro-Consul, vanquished the Celtiberians, and received their submission for a memoriall of the worth by deeds by him achieved. he built a town in Spain called Gracchuris. Posthumus Albinus the Pro-Consul, subdued the Perseans and Lusitans: and both of them triumphed. Antiochus the son of King Antiochus, whom his father had given in hostage to the Romans, after the death of his brother Seleucus, who succeeded his father late decease, was sent from Rome into the Realm of Syria. The Consors held a review and numbering of the Citizens: and solemnly purged the City. There were enrolled in their books, of Roman Citizens 273,244. Q. Voconius Saxa, a Tribune of the Commons, published a Law. That no man should make a woman to be his full heir. M. Cato was the man that perswaded and spoke for this Law, and his Oracion is extant. Moreover, this book containeth the wars and exploits of many Captains against the Ligurians, Strians, Sardians, and Celtiberians: also the occasions and causes of the Macedonian war. L. Julius Peneus the son of Philip began: for he had sent an embassage to the Carthaginians, which they gave audience unto in the night sleaze. Other States also, and Cities of Greece he solicited. This Perseus setting religion aside (for man, strictly and magnificient Temples he built in divers places, and namely, at Athens, Jupiter Olympius: and at Antiochia, Jup. Capitolinus) was otherwise a King of most base demeanour and carriage.

The one and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

The beginning of this book, and the greater part thereof immediately ensuing, is lost. Imprimis, As touching the disposition of the Provinces by lot, as well of Consuls as Prators: and namely, how the government of Gaullell to A. Maclius, and of Liguria to M. Junius: and how of the Prators M. Titinius was assigned to the hither Province of Spain, and T. Pontius to the further; Nero to Etruria, T. Ebutius to Sardinia. Item, as concerning the fire of Vesta, the exploits of T. Gracchus and L. Albinus in Bisica and Portugal: the survey and taxing of the City of Rome holden by the Consors; the Law Voconia, as touching the inheritance of women, mentioned in Ulpian: in S. Aurelianus de Civitate Dei, and other: finally, of the acts achieved by M. Junius about Genova. And thus it sheweth a prupt and broken front as ye see.

To have armed the same, which in peace he had received of his father: and for that cause it is said, That he was passing well beloved of the youth and lusty gallants, who desired nothing more than to spoil and raine booties.

Now when the Consul was in deliberation with his counsell, as touching war in Isfria, some were of opinion, to proceed thereunto incontinently: before that the enemies could assemble their forces; others advised to consult first with the Senate: but their counsell importuned, who were for speedy expedition. So the Consul dislodged from Aquila: and encamped near the Lake Timavus, which lieth hard by the sea. Thither came Aius Firmus (one of the navall Dumnivirs) with ten ships: for two full Dumnivirs or wardens had been chosen to make head against the Ilyrian fleet: who with twenty ships in all, keeping the upper sea, were to guard the sea-coasts: so as they had Aeneas (as it were) the middle center between: for L. Cornelius took the charge of all that lay on the right hand thereof as far as to Tarentum; and C. Furius of the left, unto Aquila. These ten vessels (I say) were sent to the next port, against the marches of Isfria, with other ships of burden fraught with store of victuals and provision. The Consul followed after with his legions, and pitched his camp five miles from the sea. And within a short time there was a good and frequent market kept in the port: from whence there was conveyed all manner of provision into the camp. And to the end that this might hold in more security, good guards were set about the camp.

A on every side. Toward Isfria there was one standing frontier garrison, consisting of a cohort of Placentins, levied on a sudden, opposed and lodged between the sea and the camp. And to the end the same might serve for a guard to defend them that watered at the river, M. Ebutius (a Colonel of the two legions) was commanded to adjoin two squadrons of souldiers out of the second legion. T. and C. both Alis (Colonels likewise) had led the third legion, by the way that goeth to Aquila, which should guard the forragers and fowellers. From which quarter about a mile distant was the camp of the French. And a certain petty King there was among them, one Carmeninus, having the conduct of three thousand armed souldiers, or somewhat more. So soon as the Romans were approached, the lake Timavus with their camp, the Ilyrians set them down secretly in a close place behind a little hill; and from thence followed the Roman army as it marched, by croise and crooked waies, eysing and lying for all advantages that might be preferred: for intelligence they had of all that was done either at sea, or by land. And when they perceived upon a time the corps de guard before the campe feeble and weak, and that there was a great number of unarmed Merchants between the camp and the sea, without any defence at all either from land or water, they ran at once upon the forelaid guards, to wit, the Placentine cohort: and also the squadrons of the second legion. Now their enterprise at the beginning was covered and hidden by occasion of a morning mist, which at the first warmth of the sun brake and scattered away, and then began somewhat to appear through it: but the light was not yet clear and come to the full: by reason whereof every thing (as commonly in such a case) shewed far bigger than it was. And this at that time mightily deceived the Romans, causing the army of the enemies to seem the greater by many degrees. At which sight, the souldiers of the one guard as well as the other being affrighted, fled into the camp with a great tumult and alarm, and there caused far more fear than they brought with them: for neither were they able to tell why they fled thus as they did, nor give a ready answer to those that asked them the question. Over and besides, a great noise they heard from the camp gates, as where there was no sufficient guard to sustain the first assault. Besides, their running thus in a throng together in the dark, while one tumbled upon another, made such a confusion, that they knew not whether the enemy was within the rampier or no. No other cry was heard but this: To sea. To sea. For by occasion that one souldier at adventure began to set up that note, all the camp presently rung again therewith, from one end to the other. Whereupon at first, (as if they had been commanded so to do) to the sea they ran, some few armed, but the most part without any armor or weapons: afterwards more, and consequently at last in manner all; yea, and the Consul himself, seeing that he laboured in vain to reclaim them, back he fled, and could prevail neither by command nor authority, nor yet with pri-ers in the end: only M. Lucius Strabo (a Tribune or Colonel of the third legion, abandoned of his own legions) remained behind with three ensignes and no more. The Ilyrians finding him alone (for no man else was seen in arms to make resistance) entered joyntly into the camp ran upon him (as he was embattelling his souldiers and encouraging them in the quarter about the Prator's lodging) surprised, and with numbers over-charged him. The skirmish and fight was more cruel, than for proportion of so few defendants: and not ended, before that the Tribune himself and those about him, were slain every man. The Generall his pavilion and all about it, was overthrowen: which when the enemy had ransacked and rifled of all that was there, they went as far as the treasurers lodging, the market place, and to the gate Quinana: where they found abundance of all things set out ready for their hands, and within the treasurers pavilion the tables spread and covered with good eates and meat upon them. Then their chief Lord & Leader (the petty King afore said) made no more ado but late him down, fell to his victuals and made good cheer; and anon all the rest following his example, did likewise, and never once thought of arms, or of enemies; and like to those who were not wont to fare so well and feed liberally, they greedily overcharged their bellies with wine and viands: but the Romans all the while stood in far other terms. They trembled, they went halting to their bulinels both on land and sea. Down went the shipmen and sailors with their tiles and booths; and look what provision of victuals or other things were set forth to sale upon the strand and shore, they harried and hurried a shipboard: the souldiers all affrighted ran again to the sea-side, for to be embarked. The mariners fearing lest their vessels should be overcharged, some put back the prets and wightood them for coming in, others shove off from the wharf, and lanced into the deep. Hereupon began a brawl and broil, and from that they fell together by the ears, souldiers and mariners, one with another: some went away with knocks and wounds, and others left their lives behind them: untill at length, by the Consul's commandment the fleet was retired far from the land. Which done, he began to sort the armed and unarmed apart. And hardly were there (of so great a multitude) twelve hundred found with armor about them, and very few horsemen that had brought their horses with them. All the rest were a confused and disordered company, resembling the rascall sort of camp-followers, as victuallers, launders, scullions, and lackies: who had been a ready booty to have preyed upon in case the enemies could have thought upon any feats of arms. Then at last came a messenger to recall the third legion and to surpise the guard of the Gauls: and with that, from all parts they began to return again toward their own camp, for to recover it, and wipe away and blot out the shameful stain and dishonour which they had received. The Colonels of the third legion commanded the souldiers to throw down upon the ground their forrage and fowell, they charged the Centurions to let the elder and unweildy souldiers two and two upon the horses and labouring beasts which they had discharged of their load : and willed the horsemen to take up behind them every one a young lusty footman ; shewing what an honour it would be to the third legion for to regain by their valour the camp , which had been lost by the cowardice and fear of those in the second : and easily (say they) may it be won again , if the Barbarians , whilst they are encumbered with the pillage , might be surprised at unawares , and be taken themselves , like as they overtook others before . This exhortation was received with great alacrity and contentment of the souldiers . Aloft were the ensigns born and advanced apace , neither staid the post-ensigns one whit for the souldiers . Howbeit the Cohort and those companies which were brought from the sea , came first to the rampier . L. Atius a principall Centurion of the second legion , not only encouraged the souldiers , but made remonstrance unto them , That if the Itrians these victories , had ever meant to guard and keep the camp with the same force of arms by which they had won it , they would at the first have pursued the enemies to the sea , so soon as they had turned them out of their tents : and afterwards have let a good corps de guard at leastwise before the rampier and the avenues thereof ; but like enough it is (saith he) that with guzzling wine they were dead asleepe like beasts . And herewith he commanded A. Bacchonus his own ensign-bearer , a man of approved valour and singular prowess , to advance his banner forward . Mary , that I shall (quoth he) full soon , if you will follow me alone that the thing may be done more quickly . With that he forced his whole strength and having flung the ensign over the trench into the camp , he was the first himself that entered at the camp gate . On another part likewise T. and C. both A. Elii , and Colonels of the third legion , were come with their Cavalry : then presently followed those also whom they had horsed two by two upon the labouring jades and wagons of carriage , and after them the Cohort with his whole army . But of the Itrians some few there were (such as were not stark drunk) whose wits and memory served them to run away : the rest were dead asleepe indeed , and never awoke again . So the Romans recovered all their goods , save only the wine and victuals which was devoured and consumed . The Roman souldiers who were crazy and sick and had been left in the camp , after they perceived their own fellows within the rampier , found their hands again caught up weapons , and made a great slaughter and execution . But above all others C. Popilius , furnished Sabellus a Gentleman and Cavalier of Rome , bare himself most bravely that day , who being left in the camp (because he was hurt and maimed in one of his feet) slew the greatest number of the enemies by far . Eight thousand Itrians fell upon the edge of the sword , and not one taken prisoner alive : for the choleric and desperate indignation of the souldiers was such , as they had no mind at all of prizes and booties . Howbeit , the Cohort of the Itrians , drunk as he was , had no good fortune as to be taken from the very boord where he sat , and hastily mounted on horseback by his men , and so fled away and escaped . Of the winners there perished in all two hundred thirty seven souldiers : and of them , more died in their morning fight than in the recovery of their camp . Now it chanced , that C. and L. both named Gaulis , new Coloners and inhabitants of Aquila , as they came with victuals , had like to have tumbled ignorantly upon the camp , when it was taken & possessed by the Itrians . They being retired back in great haste to Aquila , leaving their carriage behind them , set all on a fright & uproar not only at Aquila , but also at Rome within five daies after : for thither was the rumour run . That not only the camp was lost , and the army utterly defeated . Whereupon , as the manner was in all sudden tumults and alarms , writs went forth for musters and levies of souldiers extraordinarily , not in the City only , but also throughout all Italy . Two legions of Roman Citizens were enrolled , and the Latine allies were commanded to set out 10000 foot with 200 horse . M. Junius the Cohort had commandment to pass over into Gallia , and to levy of the Cities and States of that Province , as many as they were able to make and furnish . It was ordained withal , that T. Clodius the Prætor should make proclamation , that the souldiers of the fourth legion , and of the Latine allies five thousand foot and two hundred and fifty horse , should meet together at Pisa , and that in the absence of the Cohort he should defend that Province : also that M. Titinius the Prætor should appoint the Rendezvous at Ariminum : that the first legion and the like number of allies , as well foot as horse , should there assemble . Then Nerva took his journey , clad in his rich coat of arms toward Pisa his Province . And Titinius having to Ariminum C. C. C. C. a Colonel , to take the conduct of the legion there , took musters at Rome . M. Junius the Cohort , passed out of Liguria into Gaul , and arrived at Aquila , having levied aid-souldiers as he went of all the Cities of Gaul and the Colonies , to be in readiness out of hand . There he was certified that the army was safe and sound : whereupon he dispatched his letters to Rome to advertise them that they should not trouble themselves any more in this false alarm , and himself after he had discharged the Gauls of those aids which he had imposed upon them , went to his companion in government . Great was the joy at Rome , coming thus as it did unlooked for . The musters were laid aside , the souldiers discharged who were enrolled and had taken their military oath , and the army visited with the plague at Ariminum was dismissed and sent home . The Itrians albeit they were encamped with a great strength of armed men , not far from the Cohort's camp , after they heard once that the Consul was come with a new army , disbanded and slipt every man away on all sides to their severall Cities , and the Consuls retired with their legions to Aquila , there to winter .

When their troubles of Istria were thus at length appeared , there went forth an act of the Senat , That the Cohort should agree between themselves , whether of them twain was to return to Rome for

A for to hold the assembly for election of Magistrats . At what time as A. Licinius Nerva , and C. Papirius Turrani , two Tribunes of the Commons , in all their Orations to the people inveighed bitterly against M. Junius in his absence , and promulged a Law to this effect , That after the Ides of March (for the Cohort had their governments already prorogued for one whole year) he should continue no longer in place , to the end that so soon as he was out of his office , he might presently be called to his answer judicially . Quintus Elius , one of their Collegues , withstood this bill by them propoled , and after much debate and contention prevailed so much that it passed not . About the same time Tib. Sempronius Gracchus and L. Posthumus Albius being returned out of Spain to Rome , had audience given them by the Prætor M. Titinius in the Temple of Delona , there to discourse of the acts by them achieved , to demand their deserved honours . To the end that praise and thanksgiving also should be rendered to the immortal gods . Moreover at the very same time intelligence was given by letters from T. Eburnus the Prætor , which his lion brought and strength of the Balvris had invaded the province standing in peaceable terms : neither was he able to make head against them with so feeble an army as he had ; & the same walked and continued in his humble suit to the Senat to relieve and succour their Cities at leastwise , for that their villages and country towns were already past help . This embassage , with all other matters concerning Sardinia , was put over to the new Magistrats : as pitiful an embassage also was presented unto them from the Lycians , who complained grievously of the Rhodians , unto whom they had been annexed and made subjects by L. Cornelius Scipio . Indeed (say they) we lived some time under the censure of K. Antiochus , but the servitude of ours under the Cohort , comprised to this present state and condition wherein we now are seemed unto us an excellent liberty : for not only are we now yoked and kept under publike authority in generally , by taxes , levies , and impositions : but every one in particular endureth meer bondage and slavery . Our selves are abused , yea , and our wives and children suffer villanies before our eyes : upon our bodies , our backs and sides they work upon and discharge their humour of cruelty : in our good name (an indignity unupportable) we are detained , depraved , and deamed : yea , openly in the face of the world , they caley not to commit outrages against us , even to wrap and extend their authority over us , and to try matters upon us with extremity : to the end that we Lycians might be put of all doubt , that there is no difference between us and slaves bought and sold for filer in open market . The Senat moved with these remonstrances by the Lycians , addressed their letters to the Rhodians to this effect , that it was no part of their meaning and intent , that the Lycians should be slaves to the Rhodians : or that any other born free , should be enthralled by any person : but their will was , that the Lycians should in such terms live under the government and protection of the Rhodians , that both States the one as well as the other might range and frame themselves like good subjects under the Dominion and Empire of Rome .

After this followed two triumphs over Spain , one immediately upon another : first Sempronius Gracchus over the Celtiberians : and the morrow after L. Posthumus Albius over the Lusitanians and other Spaniards of those parts . Tib. Gracchus carried in slew 40000 pound weight of silver : and Albius twenty thousand . Both of them divided among their souldiers twenty five Denarii apiece , to each Centurion the same double , and trebble to every horseman . Thus did they also by allies as well as by Romans .

It followed about that time , that M. Junius the Consul , came out of Istria to Rome , by occasion of the election which was to be holden : and when the two Tribunes of the Commons , Papirius and Licinius , had in the presence of the Senat baited and wearied him with interrogatories , as touching the affairs passed in Istria , they brought him forth also before the body of the people . To which questions after that the Consul had answered , how he had not been above 11 daies in the Province : and as for the things that hapned in his absence , he knew no otherwise than they did , only by the common bruit and report : then they went on urging him still , and asking how it came to pass , that A. Mælius rather came not to Rome , to give account unto the State , why he passed out of Gaul (which was his allotted Province) into Istria : and to shew , when it was that either the Senat decreed , or the people of Rome granted by their voices to enterprize that war ? But happily it may be said (quoth he) that albeit the war was undertaken only upon his own head alone , yet no doubt , executed it was right worthily with policy and valour . Nay , I was , but far contented with it and hard it is to say , whether it were begun more lewdly than managed incon siderately . Two entire corps de gard were on a sudden at unawares surprised by the Itrians : the Roman camp was forced & taken with all the strength of horse and foot that was therein : the rest scattered without arms , and the Cohort himself was the foremost man that ran away to the sea side unto the ships : and surely he should render an account of all these matters , when he is a private person again since that he should not do it being Cohort . This storm past , the generall assembly for the Magistrats election was holden : wherein were created Cohort , C. Claudius Pulcher , and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus . The next day following were the Prætors chosen to wit , P. Aelius Tubero the second time , C. Quinctius , L. Lucinius , C. Nummius , C. Mæmilius , C. Cornelius Scipio , and C. Valerius Laevinus . The civil jurisdiction of the City fell to Tubero , the soverain to Quintus , and the government of Sicily was allotted to Nummius of Sardinia to Mummius . Howbeit , this Province by reason of the great war therein became the charge of the Cohort , And by lot it fell to Gracchus :

but Istriato Claudius his Collegue. Gaul was divided into two Provinces; whereof Scipio by lot H obtained one and Laevinus the other.

Upon the Ides of March, on which day Sempronius and Claudius entered their Consulship, moved it was only in the Senat, as touching Sardinia and Istria, and the enemies to both those Provinces, who there had levied war. But the morrow after, the Embassadors of the Sardinians being referred over to the new Magistrats, and L. Minutius Thermus who had been Lieutenant to the Consul Manlius in Istria, entered into the Senat-house. By them the Senat was informed how dangerous the wars were in those Provinces. Moved likewise were the Senators by the embassies of the Latine allies, who in the end were admitted into the Senat, after they had importuned the Censors and Consuls of the former year: the sum of their complaint was this, That their own Citizens being once enrolled at Rome, were most of them departed and removed thither to dwell: which it might be suffered, within few reviews and cessings it would come to pass, that their Cities should be dispeopled and desolat, their villages and fields desart and waste, and able to set out no souldiers for the wars. Semblably the Samnites and Pelignians complained, that four thousand households were gone from them, and retired to Fregella: and yet neither the one nation or the other, were set at a less proportion of souldiers in all their levies. Two cautious means and devices were brought up, whereby men changed thus their Cities at pleasure. The Law granted this indulgence to the allies of the Latine nation, as many as yet issue of their race behind them in their house, That they should be reputed Citizens of Rome. By abusing this Law, some did injury to their allies, other wronged the people of Rome: for, both they that were to leave such issue at home, gave their children, as it were, in villenage to some Roman Citizen K or other whom they liked of; with condition to manumite and make them free, that they might be Tribes or enfranchised Citizens. And they also who wanted issue to leave behind them, were held as Citizens of Rome. But in process of time without any of these colourable pretences of right, without regard of law and respect of issue, they crept in and had the benefit of the Burgessie and freedom of Rome, by their transmigration thither to inhabit, by enrolment in the reviews. To meet with these practices, the embassadors craved a remedy for the time to come: as also that they would peremptorily command all their allies to repair again to their own Cities: with an express inhibition, that no man should receive any other to be his vassal and villain, and to alienate him, with intention by that means to change the City wherein he lived: and that, who-soever became Citizens of Rome after that manner, should not be counted for a Citizen. These petitions were granted by the Senat. Then were decrees passed for those provinces of Istria and Sardinia which were in arms to wit, for the enrolling of two legions into Sardinia, having either of them five thousand and two hundred foot, and three hundred horse, besides twelve thousand footmen, and 600 horsemen of the Latine allies; and ten quinquiremes or galleaces, with five banks of oars, in case the Generall would warp them out of the arsenal. The like number as well of the Infantry as Cavalry, was assigned for Istria. The Consuls also were enjoined to send to M. Titinius in Spain, one legion with three hundred horse, besides 5000 footmen of allies, and 250 horsemen.

Before that the Consuls cast lots for their Provinces, certain prodigies were reported. Namely, that in the territory of Crustumium, there fell from heaven a stone in the lake of Mars: That in the territory of Rome there was an infant born like a very stump, without head, feet, or hands: and a snake or serpent seen four-footed. That in the market-place of Capua, many houses were smitten with thunderbolts and lightning. Also at Puteoli two ships were set on fire by lightning, and burnt. While these prodigious wonders were by others related, there was seen a wolf also in the day time at Rome, which having entered at the gate Collina, after much couring and hunting, with much ado and noise of them that followed the chase, escaped away from them all, and passed through the Esquiline gate. In regard of these strange tokens, the Consuls killed greater beasts for sacrifice: and for one whole day, a solemn supplication and prayers were made at all the shrines and altars of the gods. These sacrifices done and past, accordingly as it appertained, the Consuls cast lots for their provinces: and to Claudius, bel fell Istria, to Sempronius, Sardinia. N

After this, C. Claudius published a Law by virtue of an ordinance of the Senat, in favour of allies and proclaimed. That those allies, and namely, of the Latine nation, who either themselves or their ancestors, had been enrolled among the Latine allies, during the Censorship of Marcus Claudius, and Titus Quintius, or any time afterwards, should make return every man into his own City, before the first day of November next ensuing. And Lucius Mummius the Prator had in commission to enquire and search for those that returned not accordingly. To this Law and Edict above said of the Consul, an act also of the Senat was adjoined, That the Dictator, Consul, Interregent, Censor, and Lord chief Justice in the Common Pleas for the time being, should endeavour and take order, that who-soever were manumitted and made free, should take an oath, that he who manumitted or enfranchised him, did it not with an intent, for to exchange the City wherein he was: and look who would not thus swear, him they thought not worthy to be manumitted. But his charge and jurisdiction was afterwards committed to C. Claudius the Consul.

While these affairs passed at Rome, M. Junius and A. Manlius, who had been Consuls the year before, having wintered in Aquileia, in the beginning of the Spring entered with an army into the frontiers of Istria. Where, as they made waste and spoil far and near as they went, the Istrians entered into a commotion and took arms, rather upon grief of heart and indignation to see their goods thus pillaged and ransacked, than for any assured hope that they had of their influence, to make head against two armies. Having therefore raised a commotion of their abeyance from all their Cities and States, they assembled in haste a sudden and tumultuary army, which at the first gave battell, and fought more in heat of courage than with pertinence of resolution. In conflict there were slain of them to the number of four thousand: the rest abandoned all war, and fled here and there into their Cities. From thence they sent embassadors first into the Roman camp to crave peace, and then the hostages which were demanded. After intelligence given at Rome of these news by the letters of the Pro-Consuls, C. Claudius the Consul learning that this occurrence might put him by the government of his Province, and the conduct of the army, without long B lemn prayers and vows made, without his Lictors clad in their coats of arms, departed thither, but only his Collegue. His voyage thither was not so rash and inconsiderate, but his courage there where after he had very uneasomely reproached Manlius for his running away out of the camp, (to the great discontentment of the souldiers, who were chief that tied) and with opprobrious terms shaken up M. Junius also for taking part in this difference with his commotion in the end he commanded them both to avoid out of the Province, whereupon the souldiers made answer again and said, That they would then obey the Consuls commandment which according to the ancient custome of their fore-fathers, he had made his totem vows within the Capitol; and then taken his leave and departed out of the City, as accompanied with his Officers, rich coats of arms, warlike. Hereat he was so far engaged with anger, that he hated upon the treasures deeply belonging to Manlius for chains and gyres, and menaced to send Junius and Manlius both bound to Rome. But the deputy likewise made as little reckoning of the Consuls commandment: and the more animated he was to disobey the Consul, by reason that he was backed by the whole host round about him; who as they supported the cause of their Captains and Leaders, so they hated the Consul at the heart. In conclusion, the Consul being laden and wearied with the tumultuous and railing behaviour of every one in particular, and with the trumps and laughing stock of him) he went his waies again to Aquileia.

From thence he wrote unto his Collegue by an Edict, to charge those new souldiers who were enrolled for Istria to meet at Aquileia: to the end that no business should keep him at Rome, but that with all speed he might depart from the City in his coat of arms, and after he had conceived and pronounced his vows accordingly. His companion in office was well content and did all these things requisite full willingly: and a short day was assigned for the assembling of the souldiers at his first coming; he made an Oration in the public audience of the people as touching the demeanor of Manlius and Junius: and having staid no longer than three daies at Rome, he set out with his Lictors formally in their out-attour, when he had made his vows solemnly in the Capitol and to departed into his Province again with as much celerity and haste (if not more) as he E came from thence.

Some few daies before, Junius and Manlius began to animadvert by all forcible means the town Nesutium into which the principall persons of the Istrians and Adriatic kind were retired, Claudius, with his two new legions, perceived him before the town; and after he had discharged the old armies and their commanders, laid siege unto it, and intended to besiege it with mantles and engines of battery. The overflow of the river which ran along beside the walls, and not only impached the assaults, but yielded water unto the besieged, he diverted into another new channel and bestowed many daies work thereabout. This mightily grieved the barbarous people to see how they were cut off from water; howbeit they never thought open for all this, but fell in hand to kill their wives and children; and when they had so done, became they would F present to the view of their enemies, so horrible a sight and terrible spectacle; they mimicked them upon the walls openly in their fight, and then threw them headlong down. While the silly women and poor infants (amidst their pitious and lamentable cries) were thus cruelly murdered, the Roman souldiers mounted over their walls and entered into the City. Their King when he once perceived (by the terrible outcomes of those who fled) that the town was lost; for fear he should be taken alive flabbed himself with his dagger to the heart. All the rest were either taken prisoners or killed. After this two other towns, Munda and Exeria, were won by assault and rased. The pillage was greater than a man would have looked for in so poor a nation: which was bestowed every whit upon the souldiers. Five thousand and six hundred and two and thirty persons were sold out-right in port-aule under the guideline. The Captains of this war were first engaged with G rods and then executed. Thus Istria by the ruin of three towns and the death of their King, was appeased: and all the Cities and States thereof from every quarter, came in with their hostages, made submission, and did fealty and homage to the Romans.

The Istrians war was no sooner ended but the Liguans began to complot for to take arms and enter into rebellion. T. Claudius the Pro-Consul, (who the former year had been Prator) was governor and commander at that time of Pise with a garrison of one legion. The Senat being advertised thereof by his letters, thought good to send the very same letters to C. Claudius (for the other

labouring beasts which they had discharged of their load; and willed the horsemen to take up behind them every one a young lusty footman; shewing what an honour it would be to the third legion, for to regain by their valour the camp, which had been lost by the cowardice and fear of those in the second; and easily (say they) may it be won again, if the Barbarians, whilst they are encumbered with the pillage, might be surprised at unawares, and be taken themselves, like as they overtook others before. This exhortation was received with great alacrity and contentment of the soldiers. Aloft were the ensigns born and advanced apace, neither staid the port-ensigns one whit for the soldiers. Howbeit the Col, and those companies which were brought from the sea, came first to the rampier. L. Atrius a principall Centurion of the second legion, not only encouraged the soldiers, but made remonstrance unto them. That if the Ithrians these victories, had ever meant to guard and keep the camp with the same force of arms by which they had won it, they would at the first have pursued the enemies to the sea, so soon as they had turned them out of their tents; and afterwards have let a good corps de guard stay awhile before the rampier and the avenues thereof; but like enough it is (saith he) that with guzzling wine they were dead asleepe like beasts. And herewith he commanded As Baculus his own ensign-bearer, a man of approved valour and singular prowess, to advance his banner forward, saying, that I shall (quoth he) full soon, if you will follow me alone that the thing may be done more quickly. With that he forced his whole strength and having flung the ensign over the trench into the camp, he was the first himself that entered at the campgate. On another part likewise T. and C. both Albi, and Colonels of the third legion, were come with their Cavalry; then presently followed those also whom they had horsed two by two upon the labouring jades and wagons of carriage, and after them the Col, with his whole army. But of the Ithrians some few there were (such as were not stark drunk) whose wits and memory served them to run away; the rest were dead asleepe indeed, and never awoke again. So the Romans recovered all their goods, save only the wine and victuals which was devoured and consumed. The Roman soldiers who were crazy and sick and had been left in the camp, after they perceived their own fellows within the rampier found their hands again caught up weapons, and made a great laughter and execution. But above all others C. Popilius, furnished Sabellus a Gentleman and Cavalier of Rome, bare himself most bravely that day, who being left in the camp (because he was hurt and maimed in one of his feet) slew the greatest number of the enemies by far. Eight thousand Ithrians fell upon the edge of the sword, and not one taken prisoner alive; for the choleric and spitefull indignation of the soldiers was such, as they had no mind at all of prizes and booties. Howbeit, the Col, of the Ithrians, drunk as he was, had to good fortune as to be taken from the very boord where he sat, and hastily mounted on horseback by his men, and so fled away and escaped. Of the winners there perished in all two hundred thirty seven soldiers: and of them, more died in their morning flight than in the recovery of their camp. Now it chanced, that Cn. and L. both named Gaulis, new Colonels and inhabitants of Aquila, as they came with victuals, had like to have tumbled ignorantly upon the camp, when it was taken and possessed by the Ithrians. They being retired back in great haste to Aquila, leaving their carriage behind them, set all on a fright and uproar not only at Aquila, but also at Rome within few daies after: for thither was the rumour run. That not only the camp was forced by the enemies, and (which was true indeed) the Romans put to flight, but that all was lost, and the army utterly defeated. Whereupon, as the manner was in all sudden tumults and alarms, writs went forth for musters and levies of soldiers extraordinarily, not in the City only, but also throughout all Italy. Two legions of Roman Citizens were enrolled, and the Latine allies were commanded to set out 10000 foot with 100 horse. M. Junius the Col, had commandment to pass over into Gallia, and to levy of the Cities and States of that Province, as many as they were able to make and furnish. It was ordained withal, that T. Claudius the Prætor should make proclamation, that the soldiers of the fourth legion, and of the Latine allies five thousand foot and two hundred and fifty horse, should meet together at Pisa; and that in the absence of the Col, he should defend that Province: also that M. Titinius the Prætor should appoint the Rendezvous at Ariminum; that the first legion and the like number of allies, as well foot as horse, should there assemble. Then Nero took his journey, clad in his rich coat of arms toward Pisa his Province. And Titinius having to Ariminum Caius C. Julius a Colonel, to take the conduct of the legion there, took marches at Rome. M. Junius the Col, passed out of Liguria into Gaul, and arrived at Aquila, having levied aid-soldiers as he went of all the Cities of Gaul, and the Colonies, to be in readinesse out of hand. There he was certified that the army was safe and sound: whereupon he dispatched his letters to Rome to advertise them that they should not trouble themselves any more in this false alarm, and himself after he had discharged the Gauls of those aids which he had imposed upon them, went to his companion in government, Great was the joy at Rome, coming thus as it did unlooked for. The musters were laid aside, the soldiers discharged who were enrolled and had taken their military oath, and the army visited with the plague at Ariminum was diminished and sent home. The Ithrians albeit they were encamped with a great strength of armed men, not far from the Col, his camp after they heard once that the Consul was come with a new army, disbanded and slipped every man away on all sides to their severall Cities, and the Consuls retired with their legions to Aquila thence to winter.

When the troubles of Italy were thus at length appeased, there went forth an act of the Senat, That the Col, should agree between themselves, whether of them twain was to return to Rome for

A for to hold the assembly for election of Magistrates. At what time as A. Licinius Nervæ, and C. Papirius Turanus, two Tribunes of the Commons, in all their Orations to the people inveigled bitterly against M. Junius in his absence, and promulged a Law to this effect, That after the Ides of continue no longer in place, to the end that it should be out of his office, he might presently be called to his answer judicially. Quintus Ælius, one of their Collegues, withstood this bill by them propoed, and after much debate and contention prevailed so much, that it passed not.

About the same time Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, and L. Posthumus Albinus, being returned out of Spain to Rome, had audience given them by the Prætor M. Titinius in the Temple of Bellona, there to discourse of the acts by them achieved, to demand their deserved honors. To the end that praise and thanksgiving also should be rendered to the immortal gods. Moreover, at the very same time intelligence was given by letter from T. Eburnus the Prætor, which his son brought and shewed to the Senat, of great troubles in Sardinia: Namely, that the Ithians which his son brought and made head against them with so feeble an army as he had, so the same waies neither was he able to winch the perfistence. The same news related the Embassadors likewise of the Sardinians, making humble suit to the Senat, to relieve and succour their Cities at leastwise, for that their villages and country towns were already past help. This embassage, with all other matters concerning Sardinia, the Lycians, who complained grievously of the Rhodians, unto whom they had been annexed and made subjects by L. Coracilius S. Spon. Indeed (say they) we lived some time under the tyranny of K. Antiochus, but that servitude of ours under the Col, compured to this present state and condition wherein we now are seemed unto us an excellent liberty: for not only are we now yoked and kept under publicke authority in generally, by taxes, levies and impositions: but every one in particular endureth meer bondage and slavery. Our selves are abused, yes, and our wives and children suffer villanies before our eyes: upon our bodies, our backs and dest they work upon and discharge their humour of: meety in our good name (an indignity unpardonable) we are detained, depraved, and deamed: yea, openly in the face of the world, they create not to commit outrages against us, even to usurp and extend their authority over us, and to try matters upon us with extremity: to the end that we Lycians might be put of all doubt, that there is no difference between us and slaves bought and sold for filch in open market. The Senat moved that it was no part of their meaning and intent, that the Lycians should be slaves to the Rhodians: that any, or that any other born free, should be enthralled by any person: but their will was, that the both States the one as well as the other, might range and frame themselves like good citizens under the Dominion and Empire of Rome.

After this followed two triumphs over Spain, one immediately upon another: first, Sempronius Gracchus over the Celtiberians: and the morrow after, L. Posthumus Albinus over the Lusitanians and other Spaniards of those parts. Tib. Gracchus carried in shew 40000 pound weight of silver: and Albinus twenty thousand. Both of them divided among their soldiers twenty five Denarii apiece, to each Centurion the same double, and treble to every horseman. Thus did they also by allies as well as by Romans.

It followed about that time, that M. Junius the Consul, came out of Spain to Rome, by occasion of the election which was to be holden: and when the two Tribunes of the Commons, Papirius and Licinius, had in the presence of the Senat baited and wearied him with interrogatories, as touching the affairs passed in Spain, they brought him forth also before the body of the people, to which questions after that the Consul had answered, how he had not been above 11 daies in the Province: and as for the things that hapned in his absence, he knew no otherwise than they did, only by the common bruit and report: then they went on urging him fill, and asking how it came to pass, that A. Mælius rather came not to Rome, to give account unto the State, why he passed out of Gaul (which was his allotted Province) into Spain: and to shew, when it was that either the Senat deceived, or the people of Rome granted by their voices to enterprize that war? But haply it may be said (quoth he) that albeit the war was undertaken upon his own head: yet no doubt, executed it was right worthily with policy and valour. Nay, I wis, but far contrariwise: and hard it is to say whether it were begun more wisely, than managed inconspicuously. Two entire corps de guards were on a sudden at unawares surprized by the Ithrians: the Roman camp was forced & taken with all the strength of horse and foot that was therein: the rest scattered without arms, and the Col, himself was the foremost man that ran away to the sea side into the ships: and surely he should render an account of all these matters, when he is a private person again since that he should not do it being Col. This storm past, the generall assembly for the Magistrates election was holden: wherein were created Coll. C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. The next day following were the Prætors chosen: to wit, P. Ælius Tubero the second time, C. Quintus, L. Cæcilius, C. Numius, C. Mummius, Cn. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Valerius Leptinus. The civil jurisdiction of the City fell to Tubero, the sortain to Quintus. The government of Sicily was allotted to Numius: of Sardinia to Mummius. Howbeit, this Province by reason of the great war therein became the charge of the Col. And by lot it fell to Gracchus: but but Ifratio and Claudius his Colleague. Gaul was divided into two Provinces; whereof Scipio by lot obtained one, and Laevinus the other.

Upon the Ides of March, on which day Sempronius and Claudius entered their Consulship, moved it was only in the Senat, as touching Sardinia and Ifratia, and the enemies to both those Provinces, who there had levied war. But the morrow after, the Embassadors of the Sardinians being referred over to the new Magistrates, and L. Minutius Thermus who had been Lieutenant to the Consul Manlius in Ifratia, entered into the Senat-house. By them the Senat was informed how the dangerous wars were in those Provinces. Moved likewise were the Senators by the embassages of the Latine allies, who in the end were admitted into the Senat, after they had importuned the Consuls and Consuls of the former year: the sum of their complaint was this, That their the Consuls and Consuls of the former year: the sum of them departed and removed thither to their own Citizens being once enrolled at Rome, were most of them departed and removed thither to dwell: which it might be suffered, within few reviews and cessings it would come to pass, that their Cities should be dispeopled and desolat, their villages and fields desart and waste, and able to set out no soldiers for the wars. Semblably the Samnites and Pelignians complained, that four to four hundred households were gone from them, and retired to Fregella; and yet neither the one nation or the other, were set at a less proportion of soldiers in all their levies. Two cautious means and devices there were brought up, whereby men changed thus their Cities at pleasure. The Law granted this indulgence to the allies of the Latine nation, as many as left issue of their race behind them in their house, that they should be reputed Citizens of Rome. By abusing this Law, some did injury to their allies, other wronged the people of Rome: for both they that were to leave such issue at home, gave their children, as it were, in villenage to some Roman Citizen; or other whom they liked of, with condition to manumite and make them free, that they might be Tribes or enfranchised Citizens. And they also who wanted issue to leave behind them, that held as Citizens of Rome. But in process of time without any of these colourable pretences of right, without regard of law and respect of issue, they crept in and had the benefit of the Burgessie and freedom of Rome, by their transmigration thither to inhabit, by enrolment in the reviews. To meet with these practices, the embassadors craved a remedy for the time to come: as also that they would peremptorily command all their allies to repair again to their own Cities: with an express inhibition, that no man should receive any other to be his vassal and villain, and so to alienate him, with intention by that means to change the City wherein he lived: and that, who so ever became Citizens of Rome after that manner, should not be counted for a Citizen. These laws were granted by the Senat. Then were decrees passed for those provinces of Ifratia and Sardinia which were in arms to wit, for the enrolling of two legions into Sardinia, having either of them five thousand, and two hundred foot, and three hundred horse, besides twelve thousand footmen, and 600 horsemen of the Latine allies; and ten quingitremes or gallexes, with five banks of oars, in case the Generall would warp them out of the arsenal. The like number as well of the Infantry as Cavalry, was assigned for Ifratia. The Consuls also were enjoined to send to M. Titinius in Spain, one legion with three hundred horse, besides 5000 footmen of allies, and 250 horsemen.

Before that the Consuls cast lots for their Provinces, certain prodigies were reported. Namely, that in the territory of Crispianum, there fell from heaven a stone in the lake of Mart: that in the territory of Rome there was an infant born like a very stump, without head, feet, or hands: and a snake or serpent seen four-footed. That in the market-place of Capua, many houses were smitten with thunderbolts and lightning. Also at Puteoli two ships were set on fire by lightning, and burnt. While these prodigious wonders were by others related, there was seen a wolf also in the day time at Rome, which having entered at the gate Collina, after much courting and hunting, with much ado and noise of them that followed the chase, escaped away from them all, and passed through the Esquiline gate. In regard of these strange tokens, the Consuls killed greater beasts for sacrifice: and for one whole day, a solemn supplication and prayers were made at all the shrines and altars of the gods. These sacrifices done and past, accordingly as it appeared, the Consuls cast lots for their provinces: and to Claudius, fell Ifratia; to Sempronius, Sardinia.

After this, C. Claudius published a Law by virtue of an ordinance of the Senat, in favour of allies and proclaimed. That those allies, and namely, of the Latine nation, who either themselves or their ancestors, had been enrolled among the Latine allies, during the Consulship of Marcus Claudius, and Titus Quintius, or any time afterwards, should make return every man into his own City, before the first day of November next ensuing. And Lucius Mammilius the Prator had in commission to enquire and search for those that returned not accordingly. To this Law an Edict aboveadd of the Consul, an act also of the Senat was adjoynted, That the Dictator, Consul, Interregent, Censor, and Lord chief Justice in the Common Pleas for the time being, should endeavour and take order, that whosoever were manumitted and made free, should take an oath, That he who manumitted or enfranchised him, did it not with an intent, to overthrow the City wherein he was: and look who would not thus swear, him they thought not worthy to be manumitted. But his charge and jurisdiction was afterwards committed to C. Claudius the Consul.

While these affairs passed at Rome, M. Junius and A. Manlius, who had been Consuls the year before, having wintered in Aquileia, in the beginning of the Spring entered with an army into the frontiers of Ifratia. Where, as they made waste and spoil far and near as they went, the

A Ifratians entered into a commotion and took arms, rather upon grief of heart and indignation to see their goods thus pilled and ransacked, than for any assured hope they had of other succour, to make head against two armies. Having therefore raised a commotion of their able youth, to man their Cities and States, they assembled in haste a sudden and tumultuary army, which at the first gave battell, and fought more in heat of courage than with pertinence of resolution. In conflict there were slain of them to the number of four thousand: the rest abandoned all war, and fled here and there into their Cities. From thence they sent embassadors first into the Roman camp to crave peace, and then the hostages which were demanded. After intelligence given at Rome of these news by the letters of the Pro-Consuls, C. Claudius the Consul learning left this occurrence might put him by the government of his Province and the conduct of the army, without solemn prayers and vows made, without his Lictors clad in their coats of arms, departed suddenly in great haste (all of the head) by night towards his Province, and made no man privy thereto, where after he had very unseasonably reproached Manlius for his running away out of the camp, (to the great discontentment of the soldiers, who were the first that fled) and with opprobrious terms shaken up M. Junius also for taking part in this dishonour with his companion: in the end he commanded them both to avoid out of the Province. Whereupon the soldiers made answer again and said, That they would then obey the Consuls commandment when according to the ancient custom of their fore-fathers, he had made his solemn vows within the Capitol, and then taken his leave and departed out of the City, accompanied with his Lictors in their rich coats of arms, warlike, hereat he was so far enraged with anger, that he caused upon the treasures depyly belonging to Manlius for chains and gyres, and menaced to send Junius and Manlius both bound to Rome. But the deputy likewise made as little reckoning of the Consuls commandment: and the more animated he was to disobey the Consul, by reason that he was backed by the whole host round about him; who as they supported the rule of their Captains and Leaders, so they hated the Consul at the heart. In conclusion the Consul being laden and wearied with the contumacious and railing behaviour of every one in particular, and with the trumps and taunts of the multitude in general (for they stuck not over and besides to mock him and make a laughing stock of him) he went his waies again to Aquileia, in the same ship wherein he came. D From thence he wrote unto his Colleague by an Edict, to charge those new soldiers who were enrolled for Ifratia to meet at Aquileia: to the end that no business should keep him at Rome, but that with all speed he might depart from the City in his coat of arms, and after he had conceived and pronounced his vows accordingly. His companion in office was well content and did all these things requisite full willingly: and a short day was assigned for the assembling of the soldiers at the Red-woods above-mentioned. But Claudius was at Rome well-near as soon as his letters: where, at his first coming, he made an Oration in the publick audience of the people as touching the demeanour of Manlius and Junius: and having staid no longer than three daies at Rome, he set out with his Lictors formally in their coat of arms, when he had made his vows solemnly in the Capitol and to departed into his Province again with as much celerity and haste (if not more) as he came from thence.

Some few daies before, Junius and Manlius began to animadvert by all possible means the town Nesumum into which the principall portions of the Ifratians, and also their King, were retired. Claudius, with his two new legions, perceived him do so before the town: and after he had discharged the old armies and their commanders, laid siege unto it, and intended to set it with mantlets and engines of battery. The course also of the river which ran along by the walls, and not only encompassed the assailants but yielded water unto the besieged, he diverted into another new channell and belowed many daies work the about. This might have frightened the barbarous people to see how they were cut off from water. Howbeit they never thought of expecting for this, but fell in hand to kill their wives and children: and when they had no more thought of this, they went prent to the view of their enemies, so horrible a sight and terrible spectacle they imagined they would upon the walls openly in their fight, and then threw them headlong down. While the silly women and poor infants amidst their piteous and lamentable cries were thus cruelly murdered, the Roman soldiers mounted over their walls and entered into the City. Their King when he once perceived (by the full outcries of those who fled) that the town was lost, for fear he should be taken alive flung himself with his dagger to the heart. All the rest were either taken prisoners or killed. After this two other towns, Manlia and Fregeria, were won by assault and raled. The pillage was greater than a man would have looked for in so poor a nation: which was flowed every whit upon the soldiers. Five thousand six hundred and two and thirty persons were sold out right in port-lane under the guindall. The Captains of this war were first scourged with rods and then beheaded. Thus Ifratia by the ruin of three towns and the death of their King, was made submission, and did fealty and homage to the Romans.

The Ifratians war was no sooner ended but the Ligurians began to conspire to take arms and enter into rebellion. *C. He made a fool of himſelf, and mocked others likewise: ſuch was his inordinate and arrogant muſiſcence. To men of honor ſtanding highly upon their worth and reputation his manner was to bellow childiſh trifles, as ſugar-plums to eat or to play withal, toys and gewgaws inſtead of great and pretious preſents: others again that looked for nothing, thoſe he enriched. And therefore ſome deemed, that he knew not what he did: others gave it out, that he did al in plain mockage: and there were again that let not to ſay, how he was out of his right wits, and clean beſides himſelf. Yet in two things, which were both great and laudable, he carried with him a Princely and Royal mind indeed to wit, in adorning Cities with ſtately gifts, and honouring the Gods with divine worſhip. He promiſed the Megapolitans in Arcadia to raiſe a wall about their City: and in truth the better part of the money to defray the charges thereof, he lent unto them. He went in hand to build a magnificent Theatre of marble at Tegara: at Cizicum, K he gave freely to the Prytanæum (a fair hall by it ſelf in the heart of the City, whereat the common charges, certain had their diet office-ceſt) by way of honourable reward, a cupbord of golden plate ſufficient for the furniture and ſervice of one table. As for the Rhodians, I cannot ſay, what one ſpecial gift ſingular above the reſt, he beſtowed upon them: ſo liberally minded was he to them-ward and his hand ever open to give them of all ſorts whatſoever they needed or required. Now, his magnificence in honoring the Gods, what it was (if there were nothing elſe) the Temple of Jupiter Olympius begun by him in Athen (ſo univerſally in the whole world) may teſtify ſufficiently. Moreover, he beautified Delos with goodly ſea-enſigns, and with a great number of ſtatues and images. Likewise he promiſed to edify at Antiochia a ſtately Temple in the honor of Jupiter Capitulinus, not only arched above-head with a golden embowed roof, but ſealed allover the wall ſides with plates of gold: beſides many other things in divers places, which by reaſon that he reigned but a very ſhort time, he could not finiſh and perform. In magnificence alſo of plays, publick ſhews, and pageants of every ſort, he over-went al the Kings his progenitors before him, as well in regard of Grecian actors and gameſters, whereof he had many about him, as of the reſt who were acquainted with the faſhions of his own country. He repreſented the fight of ſword-players at the ſharp with unrebated delight of men, who were not uſed to behold ſuch fights: but afterwards by often exhibiting the ſame, in ſuch manner, as ſometimes they drew blood one of another, yea and otherwhiles gave not over lo, but fought to the uttermoſt, even to death, he made it a familiar exerciſe & a pleaſant ſpectacle to the eyes: and thereby ſet an edge upon the courage of many young gallants, and emboldened them to embrace chivalry and follow feats of arms. So as in proceſs of time, he that was wont at the beginning to ſend as far as Rome for theſe ſenſers, and to hire them for great wages and reward, now with his own * * * L. Cornelius Scipio (had the juſtification) over ſortainers, To M. Atilius the Pretor, the government of Sardinia by law was fallen, but he was enjoyned to paſs over into Corſica with the new legion which the Conſuls had enrolled, conſiſting of 5000 foot and 300 horſe. And during the time that he ſhould be employed there in, the wars, Cornelius had commiſſion to continue in his charge and place of command, within Sardinia. Unto Cn. Servilius Cæpio for low Spain; & P. Furius Philus for the higher, were aſſigned 3000 Roman footmen and an 150 horſe: but of Latine allies, 5000 of the one and 300 of the other. N As for L. Claudius, he was appointed to Sicily without any ſupply at all. Moreover, the Conſuls had commiſſion to enrol two legions beſides, with the full number as well of foot as horſe and to charge the [Latine] allies, with the ſetting out and maintenance of a 1000 footmen & 600 horſe. This levy and taking of muſters, the Conſuls went through with, in more difficulty, by reaſon of a great mortality, which beginning the year before with a murrain of kine & oxen, turned this year into peſtilent epidemical diſeaſes of men. Look who fell ſick once, lightly they died before the ſeventh day: and thoſe that overlied and eſcaped that crife, lay long ſick by it, and commonly of the quartan ague. The moſt that went of this malady were ſlaves, whoſe breathleſs carcaſſes lay ordinarily along every ſtreet unburied: and more than that, * men were not able to inter ſo much as the dead bodies of free perſons they died ſo thick: in ſuch ſort, as they purified and rotted above ground: for neither hungry dog nor greedy gripe, would once touch them. And for certain it was known and noted, that neither al that year nor in the former, during the mortality of man and beaſt, there was not a vultur or gripe any where to be ſeen. Divers Prelats and Priests of State dropt away of this plague, and namely, Cn. Servilius Cæpio a Biſhop, the father of the Pretor: Tib. Sempronius Longus the ſon of Titus one of the Decemvirs for ſacred rites and divine ſervice: P. Ælius Patus the Augur: Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, C. Ateilius Æmilius the chief ſuperintendent

* Libitina non ſufficient.

A of all the pariſh-prieſts, and M. Scmp. Tuditanus a Biſhop. Theſe were ſubſtituted Biſhops in place of the dead to wit, C. Sulpitius Galba in ſtead of Tuditanus. * For Augers were ſubordinated, T. Veturius Crasſus Sempronianus in the room of Gracchus; Q. Ælius Patus for P. Ælius. Decemvirs over holy rites were elected, C. Scmp. Longus, and C. Scribonius ſurnamed Curio, ſupplied the want of the grand ſuperintendent aforeſaid. Still continued the peſtilence: whereupon the Senat^r ordained, That the Decemvirs ſhould have recourſe to the books of Sylla: by whole order and direction, publick ſupplications held for one day long: and after a devout manner, the people conceived and made a ſolemn vow in the common place, according to that form of words which Q. Marcius Philippus induceth and prompted unto them to this effect: That if this malady and peſtilent diſeaſe, were removed out of the territory of Rome, they would for two daies paſe a ſolemne vow a feaſt-go in proceſſion and pour out their prayers with al devotion. In the Veientian^r country a man child was born with two heads; and another at Stimula but with one hand. At Ostia, a maid child came into the world with teeth in the head and over the Temple of Saturnus (ſtanding in the market place of Rome) there was ſeen in the ſkie a bow full bent al the day long, if the air were clear and the weather fair: and at one time there ſhone out three ſuns. Alſo in one night, there evidently appeared many flaming lights and fire drakes floating along in the air. The men of Lanuvium and Cere affirmed plainly, That within their Town they ſaw a Serpent with a creſt and mane, yea, and the ſame marked al over with yellow ſpots like gold: and it was head for certain, that in the territory of Capua an oxen ſpake.

Now were the Embaſſadors returned out of Affrick by the * Names of Jure, thoſe I mean who went to Carthage, after they had been with King Maſſiſſa, and ſpoken with him. But better & more certain intelligence they had by this King than from the Carthaginians themſelves, as touching the affairs that had paſſed in Carthage. Howbeit ſo much they reported upon their aſſured knowledge, that Embaſſadors came from King Perſus, and had audience in the Senat^r ſecretly by night within the Temple of Æſculapius. Alſo both the King, ſhined ſtarry, and the Carthaginians themſelves but faintly denied, that Embaſſadors likewise had been ſent from Carthage unto Macedony. Whereupon the Senat^r was of advice and resolved to diſpatch their Embaſſ^r alſo into Macedony. And theſe three were ſent to wit, C. Lælius, M. Volterius M. ſtulus, and Sex. Digintus.

During this time Perſus by occaſion that certain Dolopians obeyed him not, and of ſome matters in controversy, had diſſerent^r referred the audience, and decision to the Romans, and reſtored the arbitrement of the King led forth an army againſt them, and reduced the whole nation under his obedience and juſtification. From thence he paſſed over the Oetean mountains, and upon certain religious motions ariſing in his mind, he went up to Delphos for to viſit the Oracle. Being thus on a ſudden ſeen in the very heart and midſt of Greece, he ſtruck a terror not only into the cities next adjoining, but alſo the bruit of this tumultuous alarm was blown aſſur as to K. Eumenes. After he had ſtaied at Delphos not above 3 daies, he returned into his own realm, by the way of Phibetia, Achaia and Theſſaly, without any damage done or wrong offered to the territories through which he paſſed. Neither thought he it ſufficient thus only to win the love and favor of thoſe Cities & ſtates through which he was to journey, but he addreſſed either Embaſſadors or wrote his letters, praying them to bear no longer in mind the enmities which had been between them and his father, for almuch as they were not ſo bitter and deadly, but they might well enough, yea, and ought to end and die with him: as for himſelf, he ſaw no let or hindrance in the world to embrace them for entertaining a faithfull amity with him. But above al others he ſought means to be reconciled to the Achæans, and to reenter into grace and favor with them. This nation alone of all Greece, together with the City of Athen, were grown into theſe terms of deſpight and malice againſt the Macedonians, that they debared them from once ſetting foot within their confines. And hereupon it came that when certain ſlaves fled out of Achaia, they retired into Macedony for refuge, and there remained: and becauſe the Achæans had forbidden the Macedonians to come within their liberties, they durſt not likewise for their parts enter into the marches and frontiers of his Kingdom to recover their bondmen. Which when Perſus perceived he cauſed al thoſe fugitive ſlaves to be apprehended, and he diſpatched his letters into the Achæans, wherein he wrote,

F That he would right courteouſly ſend back their ſlaves home again, although they were run away from them unto him: adviſing and adviſing them to beware and look well unto it, that there were no more any ſuch eſcapes and runnings away of their bond ſervants hereafter. When theſe letters were read by Xenarchus their Pretor, who fought to curry ſome favor and to wind himſelf into grace with the King moſt of them that were preſent judged the letters to have been written right graciouſly and with great government and moderation, but principally thoſe perſons, who beyond their hope were to recover and receive their ſlaves whom they had loſt. But Callicrates one of them who were fully perſwaded, that the ſafety of their whole eſtate depended upon the loiall obſervance and inviolable maintenance of the accord contracted with the Romans, ſpoke thus or to this effect following, "It may ſeem to ſome here (ſay he) my maſters of Achaia, that we are in queſtion at this preſent of a ſmall matter and of mean importance: but for my part am of opinion, that we are not now in hand to treat but have already debated, and after a fort concluded, one of the greateſt affairs and of moſt conſequence that we know. For we who have intereſted the KK. of Macedony and the Macedonians to come within our borders, and have decreed that this edict may ſtand firm and irrevocable, and that for this intent eſpecially, becauſe we would admit neither Embaſſadors nor meſſengers from the KK. for fear left by enterourſe

of Archid.

"of them, the hearts of some among us might be solicited and tempted to novelty and alteration: For we now are content to hear the King, although absent in person, preaching in some sort to us, yea, and more than that (God send us good luck) approve and applaud his Oration. And whereas the very wild beasts refuse (for the most part) the meat which is laid for a bait to deceive and hurt them, yea, and have the wit to shun and avoid the same, we, blind beetles that we are, suffer our selves to be caught and fed with the vain appearance and colorable shew of a little kindness, and for hope to recover some poor slaves (a matter of small worth & reckoning) suffer our own freedom to be undermined, and in danger of subversion. For who leeth not, that the overture is made, and the way laid open for entrance into confederacy with the King, only to violate and break out association with the Romans, wherein standeth all our weal and welfare? Unless some man peradventure will make a question, whether the Romans must levy war against I P. Perseus (no doubt thereof) now after Philip is dead, which in his life time was expelled, and by his death only interrupted? Two sons, ye know full well, K. Philip had, Demetrius and Perseus. For nobleness of parentage by the mothers side, for virtue, for wit, for the love and affection of the Macedonians, Demetrius far surpassed his brother. But for that the father intended ever & meant, that whether of his two sons hated the Romans, he should have the crown after him for recompence he caused Demetrius to be murdered, for no other crime in the world that could be laid to his charge, save only that he was entred into amity with the Romans: but Perseus he made the King, whom he knew that the people of Rome judged more worthy to suffer punishment than to inherit a Kingdom. And this P. Perseus, what other thing hath he done else after his fathers decease but made preparation for war: First and foremost, he procured the Bithynians, to the terror of all the world for to invade Dasdania: who if they had it ruled there, Greece should have had more troublesome neighbors of them than Asia hath of the Galatians. And albeit he was disappointed of this hope yet he gave not over to design and plot for war; nay, if we will speak a truth, he hath already begun the war. Delos he hath subdued by force of arms & could not abide to hear that the determination of certain provinces which were debatable and litigious should be referred to the award of the people of Rome. From thence having passed over the mountain Olympos, that all upon a sudden he might shew himself in the very centre of Greece, he ascended up to Delphi. And to what end, think ye, hath he taken this diswonted voyage and unaccustomed expedition? After this he made his progress all over Thessaly: And what if he annoyed and hurt none of them all, whom he hated in his heart? I fear me so much the more this manner of dealing, and that it is a bait to catch them whither. Then, forsooth, he sendeth his letters unto us, with a goodly shew of a bon-prefect, and willet us to think of no means how to prevent (from henceforth, that we never had need again of the like bounty of his. What is that, but to enlure and repel that edict of ours, wherein the Macedonians are debarr'd from setting foot within Peloponnesus? and to bring about, that we may have again the Kings Embassadors to come unto us, that we may entertain mutual hospitality between their Princes and ours? and anon after, see the Macedonian armies, yea, and the King also in person to cross from Delphi (for a small arm of the Sea lieth between) (straight over into Peloponnesus) and finally, that we band and combine with the Macedonians, when they shall take aims against the Romans? As for me, this is mine advice: to make no new ordinance, but to let all alone in their entire order, as they now stand until such time as we are come to some certain terms. Whether we have cause to be afraid, or fear only our own shadows? If the league shall continue firm and sure between the Romans & the Macedonians, then may we have intercourse of friendship, of commerce and traffick with them. But for this present to think & consider hereof in my simple judgment is a nice and ticklish point, & besides out of season, untimely, and somewhat with the foolishness. When he had thus said, Archidamus brother to Xenarchus the Pretor discours'd in this manner following. "Callicrates" (quod) he hath caus'd both me and all of us besides, who are of contrary opinion to him, for to find the more difficulty in speaking our minds to the cause in question. For whiles in maintenance of the association which we have with the Romans, he saith that it is disturbed and troubled, & (albeit there be no man about either to disturb or trouble it) he hath wrought cunningly and contrived, that whatsoever seemeth to gain say him may be thought to oppose and let himself against the Romans. In the first place, as if he had been a man, not converting here among us, but one come from the Senat of Rome, or some inward secretary and of the privy council to the KK, he knoweth forsooth and uttereth all that in great secrecy hath been done. Nay, he foretelleth like a wise man what would have ensued, in case Philip had lived longer: & namely, how it came about, that The Perseus thus inherited the crown: what the Macedonian designs are: and what the Romans intend to do. But we, who know neither for what cause nor in what manner Demetrius came by his death nor yet what Philip meant to have done if he had lived still, must accommodate & frame our counsel to those occurrences which have openly pass'd in the view of the world. We take knowledge, that Perseus, after he was invested in his throne and crowned King, repair'd to the Roman Embassadors: and we knew likewise that he was intuitivly by the people of Rome with the style of (King Perseus). We hear besides that Roman Embassadors came to the King, and were by him well received and graciously entertained. If I have any judgment, these be all signs of peace and not of war: neither can the Romans take offence if, as we follow'd them when they bare arms so we follow them now likewise, as the authors of peace. And verily I see no reason why we alone of all other Greeks, should make it mortal and inexpiable war against

"the

A "the realm of Macedony. What! is it because we are so near unto the Macedonians, and by that vicinity expos'd to all dangers from thence? or that we are the weakest of all the rest, and like to the Dolopians, whom Perseus of late hath subdued: No, I wis, it is for otherwise and clean contrary. Sure enough we are for any harm they can do us, in regard either of our own forces, (which the Gods of their goodness have vouchsaf'd us) or of the distance of place so far remote. But let case we be as much subject & as the Thessalians and Ætolians: Say we are of no more credit and authority among the Romans (albeit we have been their associates and friends) than the Ætolians be, who were their open enemies but the other day: Then, what right, what privilege, and commerce, the Ætolians, the Thessalians, the Epirots, and in one word, all Greece besides, have and use with the Macedonians, we also may have and hold the same. How is it then, that we alone like cursed and damned creatures, should thus prostitute to abandon the common law of men, and (as it were) renounce all human society. Be it that Philip (when time was) did somewhat, and gave us just cause, armed as he was and ever warring upon us, to pass this decree and edict against him: what hath Perseus detain'd? Perseus (I say) the new King, a harmless Prince that never did us injury: nay, who is willing and seeketh by contenties and good turns to cancel and rale out all former quarrels and enmities of his fathers? why are we the only enemies that he hath in the world? And yet, I might full well & truly say, that from the former Kings of Macedony we have receiv'd to great favors and benefits, that in regard thereof, we should put up and forget the wrongs of Philip alone (if haply he have done us any) at least while now after he is dead, and his head laid, indeed, at what time as the Roman fleet rid in the harbor of Cenchrea and the Consul lay encamp'd with his army before Elatus, we sat in council three daies together, debating and devising, Whether we should band with the Romans or side with Philip? And albeit the present fear of the Romans before our eyes might have made us in our opinions to incline somewhat and lean toward them: yet there was something in it doublets, that it was so long ere we could resolve and say a truth, it was the ancient acquaintance and amity that we had with the Macedonians, and the great benefits which in old time we had received from their Kings. Why then me thinks, those self same regards should be of some force and efficacy to move us. If not to be their special and bell friends, yet at least will not to be their principal and greatest enemies. Let us not (alleviate) make semblance and shew of that, which we are not in hand with, and all is no point of this present question. There is no motive made of a new society: there is no perion about to draw any capitulations of a new alliance, wherein we should rashly enwrap and entangle our selves and be tied to any inconvenience. Only let there be a mutual commerce between us, and an alternative intercourse of yielding and demanding right to and fro, as appertaineth: let us not by interdicting and forbidding them to enter and traffick within our country, debar our selves likewise from all negotiation and dealing with them in their Kingdom: that by this means our slaves may have no place of retreat and refuge to flee unto, And what prejudice is this to the Roman confederacy? Wherefore make we thus of a small thing and evident, to draw a matter and suspicion? Wherefore raise we such troubles of nothing? Wherefore seek we to draw others into jealousy and hatred with the Romans, and all this to find means of courting & flattering them? If there will be war, Perseus (ye may be sure) maketh no doubt, but that we altogether will follow the Romans: yet so long as the peace holdeth, sure and undisputed we in some sort our malice and hatred for the while: if ended for ever it may not be. When the same men who had contented to the Kings letters before, gave their accord now also to this propoale, the chief and principal persons among them took great indignation and disdain, that Perseus should seem to demand and obtain that by a few lines in writing, which he deemed was not worth the sending an embassy. Whereupon the time was deferred and no decree pass'd at this Session. Afterwards were Embassadors address'd unto them from the King, at what time as a Diet was holden in Megalopolis: but the side which was for the Romans, and feared to give them occasion of displeasure and offence, did what they could to debar them from access and entrance into the Council. And much about this time, by reason of these jars the Ætolians grew enraged among themselves, and by discharging their mutual fury in killing one another, had like to have brought the state to a final ruin and desolation. But being weary thereof, they in the end as well of the one side as the other, sent their Embassadors to Rome, and also laboured at home to have the quarrel taken up, and to be made friends and reconciled together. Howbeit this was cross'd by a new mischief that came between, which also rubb'd the former grails and fretted the old sores. For whereas certain Hypæcætes, exiled persons, and being of the faction of Proxenus, were promiscuously liberty to return home again into their country, with safe conduct also granted by Enplemus one of the chief & principal men of the City: so it was, that fourscore of them, men of mark and quality (whom to meet upon the way as they returned, Enplemus himself went out with the multitude) after they had been friendly received with courteous greetings, salutations, and shaking of hands: had no sooner enter'd within the gate of the City, but they were massacred notwithstanding they pleaded the faithful promise of protection and call'd the Gods to witness, but all in vain. By this occasion the civil war between them waxed much hotter than before, and turned in the end to a light fire. Now there arriv'd C. Valerius Lavinius, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, C. Memmius, M. Popilius and L. Caninius as sent from the Senat of Rome. Before these commissioners, the Embassadors from both factions appeared at Delphi and debated the matter with great earnestness and vehemency, where Proxenus seem'd to have the better hand as well in right of the cause, as through his eloquent tongue:

Proxenus

Proculus (I say) who within few daies after, drank a cup of poison of his wives tempering, wherof he died & she, condemned therefore, departed into exile. The like madnes hauned the Candors alio & distracted them with intestine disention. But upon the coming of Q. Minus the Lieutenant General, who was sent accompanied with a fleet of seven sail, to appeale their debates, they tell to some terms of peace and atonement. There had been a truce alio before of six months but afterwards the war flamed out much more terrible. The Lycians likewise at the same time, were incited & plagued with war by the Rhodians. But my meaning is not neither is it any part of my purpose, to describe the wars of forrain nations, nor to discoure of the circumstances how to proceede for enough I have to do, & more than I can well discharge, to write the acts only of the people of Rome.

The Celtiberians in Spain, who being tamed by force of arms had submitted to L. Gracchus, remained quiet all the time that M. Tullius the Pretor continued there in government. But immediately upon the arrival of Ap. Claudius they revolted, and began to shew themselves in open action of rebellion, by giving a suddain assault upon the Roman camp. It was about the break of day, when the sentinels upon the rampier and Corps de guard about the gates, might discerne enemies coming a far-off and so they gave the alarm. Ap. Claudius having put out the signal of battail, in few words exhorted his souldiers to fight and play the men led them forth at the free gates at once. The Celtiberians made head and opposed their forces as they issued forth. At the first the skirmish was equal on both parts: for that by reason of the streights of the passage, all the Romans could not fight: but after that one had put forward another, and followed till apace, they were all at length gotten without the trench, so as they were able now to display their battailions & to confront their enemies from one point of their battail to the other, wherewith before they were environed: and then they made it forlike a fallly upon them, that the Celtiberians were not able to endure their violence. For before the second hour of the day, they were discorered and 15000 of them either died in the place, or yielded their bodies prisoners: 32 military engines they lost and were turned out of the camp the same day: and here is an end of that war. For as many as escaped the conflict gat them home to their own towns & quietly afterwards bare the yoke of subjection.

That year were created Censors, Q. Fulvius Flaccus & A. Posthumius Albinus: who made a review of Senators and chose new. For President of the Senat they elected M. Emilius Lepidus the Archbishop. Nine they put out of the Senat-houle. The principal persons noted and disgraced, were the M. Corn. Maluginensis, who two years before had been Pretor in Spain; L. Corn. Scipio, Pretor for the time being, and L. chief Justice of the common pleas, as well among citizens as aliens; and L. Fulvius, who was whole brother to the Censor himself, & as P. Antius reproth, equal in degree of calling, and his fellow every way. The Consuls also after they had made their vows within the Capitol, went forth to their Provinces. The one of them, (to wit, M. Emilius) had in charge given him by the Senat, to appeale the sedition of the Padoans in Venice, who as their Embassadors made report, by factious siding and part-taking, were all on a fire with civil war.

The Embassadors who were gone into Æolia for to pacify the like troubles, brought word back, that it was not possible to bridle and refrain the furious rage of that nation. But the coming of the Consul made all whole among the Padoans and cured the malady: who having nothing else to do in the province, returned to Rome.

These Censors were the first that caused the streets of Rome to be paved with hard flint and pebble stone within the City: and the high waies and causeys without to be raised with gravel & the sides thereof to be wel banked and kept in reparations: alio bridges to be made in divers places: a scaffold besides for the Ædiles and Pretors to behold the games & paises. Moreover the barriers in the race, from whence the horses begin to run and the Ouales to mark and score up the number of courses * * * Over and besides the goies beyond * * * the iron gates and cages * * * and at the seats in the mount Albane for the Consuls. They took order besides all this for the paving with flint of the cliff or descent from the Capitol and from the gallery or porch before the temple of Serapis looking toward the Capitol, unto the place called Senaculum, and the court Hofstia above it. Alio the merchants Hall or bunc without the gate Tergemina they paved with stone, and fenced it about with strong flukes and posts of wood. The gallery alio Emilia they caused to be repaired: and made an ascent by stairs from the Tiber to the burie or merchants Hall afore said. Without the same gate alio, they paved with pebble stone the gallery or walking place into the Aventine * * * from the Temple of Venus. The same Censor, bargained for the making of walls about Calatia and Oxyrum: and having made alie of some publick edifices there, they employed the money raised thereof in making of shops & stalls round about both the market places. The one of them, that is to say, M. Fulvius, (for P. Posthumius said plainly, that unless it were by vertue either of an act of the Senat, or grant of the people of Rome, he would put forth no works to be made with dispende of their money) agreed upon a price for the building of a Temple to Jupiter at Piscarium & at Fund: alio make a conduit, for water to be conveyed to Pollentia and at Piscarium for a way to be paved, and Sinussa * * * In these colonies he caused also a sink or vault to be made about them, to carry away all filthines into the river: alio the market place to be enclosed with porches, galleries, and shops and three stately halls called Lani, with quaires fours or four thorough-fares, and as many fronts. For these works one of the Consuls, disbursed the money, and bargained with the Publicans and undertakers. In which regard, the inhabitants of those colonies above named gave him great thanks. These Censors were likewise severe and precise in exercising their office for the redressing and reformation of meane manners: for many Gentlemen had their horses of service taken from them, which were allowed them by the City.

A little before the years end, there was a solemn procession holden one whole day for the happy achievement of the affairs in Spain, under the conduct and good fortune of Appius Claudius the Pro-consul: and twenty head of great beasts were killed in sacrifice. And the morrow after they went in another procession with supplications, at the Temples of Ceres, Liber, and Libera: for that there was reported from the Sabines countrey, a mighty earthquake, which over-turned many houses.

After that App. Claudius was returned out of Spain to Rome, the Senat ordained, that he should enter the City with the pomp of an Ovation. And now approached the time for the election of new Consuls. Much ado there was and hard hold at this assembly, by reason of the multitude of competitors: but in the end, L. Posthumius Albinus and M. Popilius Laenas, were elected Consuls: which done, the Pretors alio were created, to wit, Cn. Fabius Buteo, M. Matienus, C. Ciceronius, M. Fur. Crassipes, A. Atilius Serranus, & C. Cluvius Saxula, these three last reheated the second time.

This buines and solemnity finished. Ap. Claudius came entring with Ovation pomp into the City for his victory of the Celtiberians, brought into the common treasury 10000 pound weight of silver, and 5000 of gold. Cn. Cornelius was consecrated the Flamin of Jupiter.

The same year there was set up a painted Table in the Temple of the goddes Minerva with this inscription, Under the conduct and happy government of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, Consul the legion and army of the people of Rome, subdued Sardinia. In which Province, there were slain and taken prisoner 80000 enemies, which Gracchus (after he had managed the affairs of state most fortunately, destroyed many captives out of bondage, and recovered the tributes and customs to the Common-wealth) brought home with him his army safe, and founds charged with an exceeding rich booty, and recovered the City of Rome, in a second triumph. In memorial of which exploits, he caused this table to be set up as a present in the honour of Jupiter.

Now this table contained the portraiture of the Island Sardinia, and the picture alio and resemblance of sundry battails. Moreover, in this year were represented to the people certain pastimes and shews of sword-players, wherof some were small and of no account: but one above the rest, exhibited by T. Flaminius, surpassed. And this he did in honour of his father deceased: with a dole of flesh among the people, a great publick feast besides, and stage-plays for four dayes together. But the principal matter in this festival solemnity was this, that in three daies space there fought at utterance with unrebrated swords, threecore and fourteen champions,

The Breviary of L. Flornus upon the two and fortieth Book.

Fulvius Flaccus the Censor, uncovered the roof of the Church of Juno Lacinia, which was slated with marble, and alio to cover a Temple which he had dedicated. But by an act of the Senat he was forced to bestow the slates there again. Eumenes the King of Asia complained in the Senat, of Pericles King of Macedonia. His injuries done to the people of Rome are here reported: for the which, defiance was sent, and war proclaimed against him. P. Licinius Crassus the Consul, unto whom the Province of Macedonia was assigned, passed over thither, and in certain light expeditions, fought sundry battails with Pericles in Thessaly, all by horse-service but with bad success. The Senat appointed a day of bearing between Mainalia and the Carthaginians, touching the territory in question. Embassadors were sent to the adjacent Cities and States, and to the confederat Kings, to request them to contribute alio and assist in friendship by reason that the Rhodians stood in doubtful arms. The Censors took a review and numbered the citizens of Rome, wherein were enrolled in the said book 257221. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate exploits against the Islanders of Corfica and the Ligurians.

The two and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

After that L. Posthumius Albinus and M. Popilius Laenas the Consuls had before all other things proposed unto the Senat as touching the government of the Provinces & conduct of the armies, ordained it was, that Liguria should be the charge as well of one of them as the other. Altho that both of them should levy new legions, (and two a peece they were allowed to have) therewith to defend the said province and keep it in obedience. Besides 10000 footmen and 600 horse of Latine allies. Moreover to enrol 3000 foot, and 200 horsemen of Romans for a supply in Spain. Last of all, commanded they were to press 1500 footmen and a 100 horse of Roman citizens: with which strength, that Pretor unto whom Sardinia fell, should pass over into Corfica, there to war, and M. Atilius the old Pretor, in mean time to see unto the government of Sardinia. This done, the Pretors went to cast lots for their provinces. A. Atilius Serranus had the place of Lord chief justice within the City, and C. Cluvius Saxula the jurisdiction decree prejudicial unto him, he would cross and revoke the same by which countenance of his he afflicted his colleagues; but the LL. were offended so much the more and stormed against both the Consuls, yea, and persisted still in their enterprise. And therefore when it was debated in council as concerning the Provinces, albeit the Coss. made means to be sent into Macedonia (because the war of Perseus was so near at hand) yet Ligurius was assigned to both of them: for the LL. protested and said, That they would not pass a decree for the government of Macedonia, unless the case of Papilius were proposed, and an act thereof entered. Afterwards, when they demanded a warrant to enrol new armies, or at least, wile to levy a supply for making up the old, both the one motion and the other was denied. The Pretors also, who required to have a supplement with them into Spain, had a nay; and namely, M. Junius into the higher province, and P. Lucretius into the farther. As for C. Elicinius Crassus, to him there fell by lot the jurisdiction within the City over citizens, and Cn. Scipio, the Consul for these causes being highly offended and angry with the LL. for that he had refused the Latine feasts and holidayes to be published against the very first day that possibly they might, with an intimation that they would go straight into their province, and not attend the managing of any affairs touching the State, but only that which directly pertained to their government.

The Oration of Emmetus

Valerius Antias writeth, that in these Consulars, Antias the brother of K. Emmetus came in embassy to Rome, to inform criminous matter against Perseus, and to give the particulars of the preparation that he made for war. But the Annals of many other writers (more worthy of credit than he) deliver unto us, that K. Emmetus presented himself in proper person where he was received with such honor, as the people of Rome thought not only meet & agreeable to his deserts, but also fit and suitable to their own favours and benefits, which they had in ample manner conferred and in great number heaped upon him. And then he had audience given him in the Senate, where he shewed the cause of his coming to Rome what it was: namely, " (besides a lamentable desire that he had to see those gods and men by whose grace & favour he enjoyed his good estate as better he durst not wish) because he gladly would advertise the Senat by word of mouth to prevent and withstand the designs of Perseus. And beginning his speech with the platforms and enterprises of Philip, he recounted withal, how it cost his son Demetrius his life, for that he stood against the war with the Romans: moreover, how he had caused the whole nation of the Balkanians to quit their own country where they were born and bred to the end that by their head he might pass over into Italy; but whiles (qd. he) these matters he projected and calt in, he knew to be the most spiteful enemy that the Romans had, And therefore Perseus having received this war (as a man would say) by way of inheritance left him by his father even together with the crown and scepter, from the very first day of his reign, doth nought else but entertain, foster, and promote the same by all the means and devices that possibly he can. Mighty and puissant he is besides in number of young lusty, and able men for service who during the time of long peace have sprung up and multiplied exceedingly. In wealth and riches a great part of the is, and besides in his flourishing years and the best time of his age, which as it is accompanied with the very strength and vigor of his body, so his spirit and mind is inured and hardened with skilfull experience and long practise of martiall feats. For from his very infancy nuzled hath he been in the field and camp, conversing ordinarily within the royal tent and pavilion of his father, acquainted with the wars, not only waged against neighbour nations, but also against the Romans; and that which more is, employed by his father in many and sundry expeditions and excursions of service. But since that himself entered upon the Kingdom, and swayed the regal scepter in his own hand, he hath exploited & accomplished many things with marvellous felicity and success, which his father Philip before him could never compass and effect, notwithstanding he tried and assayed all means as well of open force as secret fraud. To augment this greatness of his, he hath purchased already that authority and reputation in the world, which others hardly in continuance of long time, and by many labors and ample benefits attain unto: and namely, throughout the States of Greece and Asia, all men reverence his majesty. For what good turns, N for what pleasures done, for what bounty of his they should thus do and honour him so much, neither fee I, neither can I say for certainty whether it happen by a special gift and fortune that he hath of his own, or that (which I am my self afraid to speak) it be the deep malice and hatred which he hath conceived against the Romans, which is the cause that he is of that countenance and so gracious among them. Nay, with the very Kings and Princes of other nations he is highly esteemed and of passing authority. The daughter of Selvus he hath taken to wife, without any fault of his own but being earnestly wooed and requested thereunto. And to Prusias he hath given his own sister in marriage, after much seeking and instant intreaty. These two weddings were solemnized with the exceeding joy and innumerable presents of infinite embalgues: and who should be present to celebrate the Auspices and complements, yea and give thoseippoules in marriage, but the noblest and most renowned States that were? The Balkanian nation had been much solicited by Philip, yet could never be induced to draw open any covenants of accord and amity with him: but now there is to be seen a league engrossed, yea and engraven in three several conspicuous places, the one in Thesbeia, a second at Sidennum, within a most holy, sacred and renowned Temple, and the third at Delphi. What should I speak of the general Council of the Achaeans? wherein, had not the design been dashed by some there in place, who intimated and

"alleged hard the seignory and empire of the Romans, it would have gone very hard, but that he should have set forth even within Achaia. But contrariwise I assure you my durs: and deferred honors (unto whom it is hard to say, whether they be more bounden and obliged for private pleasures or publick benefits) are either forlent through retchlesse dilate and negligence, or else annulled and abolished of wilfull malice and hostile hatred. As for the Aetolians, who knoweth not, that in his civil broils, and seditions they fought to Perseus for to relieve and succure, and not to the Romans? Being thus upheld with societies and amities, he hath provided such furniture of his own, and made that preparation for war as home, as he needs none from abroad. Can himselfe he is thirty thousand strong in foot & 4000 in horse. For ten years he is stored with corn aforehand, so as for that kind of purveyance he may spare his own territories, and also for sea his enemies. As for money in ready coin, he hath such abundance, that over and above the force of naturall Macedonians, he wageth 10000 mercenary soldiers, and hath wherewith to meke pay for as many years, besides the yearly cuttomes & profits that arise out of their Kings mines. Now for armour, he hath gathered together into his arsenals and armories, sufficient to furnish three such armies. What should I speak of the youth and serviceable men of war? Set the case that Macedony failed him and were not able to find enough; all Thrace is subject unto him from whence he may serve his turn as out of his ever running fountain and living spring. The rest of his speech he knit up with an exhortation in this manner. "I relate not these things (qd. he) my selfe, as blown abroad and vented by headleffe heat and doubtfull rumors; neither have I been so ready to beleve them, as a man desirous that such criminous imputations should be verified upon my enemy; but as undoubted and certain reports upon my own knowledge, as if I had been sent by you of special purpose to be a spie: and declared that and no more, which I had seen with mine eyes and not otherwise. Neither would I have left mine own realm wherein (by your means and goodness) in glorious and magnificent State I sit warm enough, to sort to follow so large a sea as I have done and to carry vain tales and untruths to you, thereby to crack my credit with you for ever hereafter. But I tell you these chiefes of mine have sent the most renowned and noblest Cities of Asia and Greece discovering more and more from day to day, what they intend and what their meaning is: who if they be let alone and permitted to run on as they begin, would be engaged to far, as they might not possibly return again & save themselves by any repentance. Beheld I have Perseus (I say) how he consisteth not within the realm of Macedonia, but one while seizeth upon this by force of arms, another while gaineth and getteth that by favour and good will, which with violence he could never have conquered. I perceived and considered well how unequal the match and condition is, whiles he upon you prepareth a war, and you again perform to him security of peace. Although in my conceit, and so far as I could fee into it, he made no more any preparation thereof, but was already upon action and execution. For he chased Abruptus, a confederat prince and friend of yours, lord of his Kingdom. And Artaxerxes the Illyrian, another of your associates and allies, he killed outright, because he found that he had written some letters unto you. As for Eurypha & Callistates, both the bans, & two principal States of that City, for no other reason, but because in a Parliament of the Bactrians, they had spoken their mind against him too frankly, and avowed that they would repeat unto you what things had passed, he caused to be murdered. The Bizantines he persecuted against the order taken in the second: upon Dolopia he levied war; Thessaly and Doris both he invaded and overran with his army, to the end, that in some intestine and civil war, by the help of most parts he might afflict and plague the better. He shuffled all together, and made a very confusion of the State in Thessaly and Perrebia, upon the hope and cancelling all bonds and crossing out all debt books; that thus by a power and multitude of bankrupts, such as were over-debtly engaged, and whom he had obliged and bound to himselfe, he might depresse and oppress the great men and principall personages. Having wrought these practices uncontrolled, whiles you sit still looking on and loffing, all he seeing you to let him do with Greece what he list, making full account, that no man will put him on arms and make head against him, before he be passed over into Italy. How safe this may be to you, may, how this can stand with credit, fee you to that and be advised. For my selfe, I assure you, I thought it meet (thame and very villany, that Perseus your enemy should enter into Italy to make war upon you, before that I your friend and ally, came to give your warning for to take heed and stand upon your guard. Now since I have in this manner performed my devoir, done that office which I was bound upon necessity, and in some measure acquit my selfe and discharged my bounden duty and obligation of fidelity; what remaineth behind for me to do, but to be your besdman to all the gods & goddesses, to vouchsafe you that grace, that you may provide for your own Commonweal, and also for us your friends and allies, who depend wholly upon you? In this last speech he came near unto the LL. of the Senat, But for the present no man might know any thing, but only that the K. had been in the Senat, so silent were they all, & kept the council-house close that with secrecy. But after the war was brought to an end, then came abroad, both what the K. spake, and what answer was returned to him again. Some few daies after, the Senat set to give audience unto the Embassadors of King Perseus: but having their minds and ears both, poised aforehand by King Emmetus, all the defence that the Embassadors made, and all the entreaty they used, was rejected. Besides, the flouters used by Harpanus (the principal person of the embassy) moved their patience and exasperated their throats. For he said, that indeed the KK. desire & endeavour was, to be credited and beleaved in his tracks. H h h h Apology

The forlaid law proposed by the Martins the commons with a generall consent by their voices granted

At that time the Carthaginian Embassadors were at Rome, with Gulufus, the son of Mafaniffa: between whom hard hold and much debating there was in the Senat. The Carthaginians complained, that over and besides the lands (about which there had been sent commissioners from Rome before time, to view the place and to enquire into the caule) Mafaniffa within the last two years by force and arms possessed him self of more then three score and ten towns and castles within the Carthaginian dominion and territory, and an easie matter was it for him to do so, who made reckoning of nothing, nor had regard of any person; whereas the Carthaginians were to be seen and obliged by their capitulations to the good-abearing, that they held their peace; for, inhibited they were to bear arms without their own country. And albeit they knew assuredly, that they should war within their own confines, if they disiziced the Numidians of those peeces, yet feared they that one exprels article of the accord, where they were debar'd in plain terms to wage against the associates of the people of Rome. Howbeit, the Carthaginians could no longer endure this pride, cruelty, and avarice. Sent therefore they were unto the Senat as humble orators that it might please them to grant one of these three requests: to wit, That either they might debate with another different audience before them (being alike to both alike) touching the right of the one and the other; or that they would permit the Carthaginians to defend themselves by just and lawful arms, against unjust and ungodly force: or else finally (if partiall favour swayd more with them then the truth of the caule) to let down at once what their pleasure was (should be given away out of their own, to Mafaniffa). For they yet, would have longeage of their hand, and know what they gave; whereas he himself had no they, nor would ever see to make an end (so unforseeable was his lust and appetite. But in case they might obtain one of these points, and that there could be found any fault or treipsals of theirs, committed since the peace granted unto them by Scipio; then, that they rather then any other would challenge them. For rather they had to live in servitude under the signory of Romans with safety, then enjoy such a liberty as should be exposed to the injuries of Mafaniffa. And better it were for them to perish and die once for all, then to live and languish under the yoke of a most cruel and bloody butcher. At which words the tears trickled down their cheeks, and down they fell at their feet. Lying thus prostrate upon the ground, as they moved pity and compulsion to themselves, if they procured delight and malice against the King. Then thought good it was to demand of Gulufus, what he had to answer as touching these matters? or else (if he had no rather himself) to declare before, for what cause and upon what occasion he was come to Rome. Gulufus made answer, that neither was cause for him to deal in those points, where he had no commission from his father: nor for his father to give him any such charge. considering that the Carthaginians, shewed not unto him of what business they would treat, nor yet made him so much as privy of their coming to Rome. This only was known, that there was a close council holden for certain nights, by the principal States of Carthage within the Temple of Aesculapius, from whence Embassadors were dispatched to Rome with hidden messages. And this was the cause that his father had sent him to Rome, to beleeves the Senat not to give credit to the slanderous accusations that should be preferred against him by those that were common enemies as well to them as him; who hated him for no other cause but for that he had continued so constant in his fealty and allegiance to the people of Rome. The Senate having heard what they could say of both sides, sat in council as touching the demands of the Carthaginians: and at length commanded him to go into Namidia, and give his father to understand from them, that with all speed he send his Embassadors to the Senat, as concerning those complaints which the Carthaginians had made of him: also to give intimation and knowledge unto the Carthaginians, that they repair likewise thither to debate their controversies & differences between them. And if it lay in their power to effect ought for the honor of Masaniassa, they would be as willing to do it hereafter, as they had been ready heretofore. Many, to minister justice for favour and affection, that they would not do it in any wise. Willing they were that every man should know and hold his own, and keep him within compass; neither minded they to let out new limits, but to observe the old bounds. Indeed they had granted to the Carthaginians, after they were conquered, both towns to inhabit, and territories to possess; not to this end, that in time they should pluck that away by wrong and outrage, which during the wars they could not take from them by martial law and force of arms. Thus was the young prince, together with the Carthaginians, dismissed. Pretens were given both to the one and the other, according to the order, and other courtesies of hospitality were friendly observed.

Much about the same time Cn. Servilius Cæpio, App. Claudius Cæto, and T. Annius Lælius, Embassadors sent into Macedony, for to demand amends and restitution, and withal to disclaim and renounce the Kings amity, returned to Rome. Who having related in order what they had seen and heard, enflamed the Senat more against Perseus, who were already of themselves enkindled enough. They made report, "That throughout the cities of Macedony they saw preparation for war in all forcible manner; that when they came to the court, for many daies they could find no means of access to the speech of the King; and in the end, after they were departed from thence homeward, as being past all hope of parley with him, then and not afore, they were called back again out of their way, and to be brought unto his presence: that the sum of their conference and speech unto him was this, namely, to put him in mind of the league first contracted with Philip, & afterwards renewed with himself since the death of his father, wherein by express words he was inhibited to bear arms without his own frontiers, and likewise debared to levy war upon any confederate allies of the people of Rome: after this, that they had recounted and laid abroad from point to point those specialties, which they themselves had lately heard King Læmus to declare and discourse, which were all apparent truths, upon his own assured knowledge. Moreover, that the King held a secret council for many daies together, with the Embassadors of the Cities of Asia: in regard of which injuries, that the Senat thought it reason and equity that he should make satisfaction, yea, and restore back both to them and also to their associates, whatsoever he held contrary to right, continued in the accord. That the King hereupon at the first fell into a fit of choler and indignation, and gave them hard terms, reproaching at every other word the Romans for their covetousness and insolvency. And as for their Embassadors that came unto him one after another, he said they were but spies, to listen and see what he did or said; & no marvel, for they thought it meet that he should conform and frame himself in all his words and deeds, according to their beck and commandment. At the last, when he had this wife discharged his choler with high words & broad speeches for a long time, that he commanded them to repair again unto him the next morrow, for that he would give them their answer in writing; and then he delivered unto them a script to this effect as followeth. First, as touching the accord & covenant concluded with my father, that is nothing to me at all. If I suffer it to be renewed, it was not for any liking or approbation thereof, but because I being new come to the crown, and lately possessed of the Kingdom, I was to bear and endure all things whatsoever. But in case they will enter into a new league with me, requisite it is that a treaty and agreement passe first of the conditions. And if they could be content that a covenant were drawn with equal and indifferent capitulations, yet I will sleep upon it and be well advised what to do for the best, as I doubt not but they likewise will have a good regard to the profit of the Commonwealth. And herewith, that he suddenly flung away from them, and we all began to avoid one of the palace. Whereupon we proceeded according to our commission to abandon and disavow his amity and society. At which word of ours, he steared in great wrath and fury, and with a loud and shrill voice, warned us upon our own perill and hazard, to be gone out of his marches of his realm within three daies: finally, in this manner we departed and put our selves in our journey, and found neither friendly welcome at our first coming, nor any courteous entertainment while we were there, nor yet a kind farewell at our departure. When they had once done, the Thessalian and Etolian Embassadors had audience.

The Senat, to the end that they might know out of hand, what captains and commanders the commonwealth was to employ, thought good to write unto the Consuls, that the one or other of them (who first might) should repair to Rome for the creation of new magistrates. And no great matter to speak of, as concerning the state, was that year done by the Consuls. But more expedient it was thought for the commonwealth, to suppress and appease the Ligurians, whose blood was up and chafed against them, considering that the Macedonian war was in daily expectation. Moreover, the Embassadors of Asia gave occasion, that Genius also King of Ibrycum was had in jealousy: who at one time both complained of him, that now twice he had waited to their

A their country: and also made report, how the Macedonian and Illyrian Kings were all one, and to great together, that with once consent and common counsel they prepared to war upon the Romans: finally, that the Illyrians were now at Rome in thew and semblance of embassy, but indeed and very truth, no better then spies, addressed on purpose by the motive and advice of Perseus to hearken and learn wherabout they went at Rome. These Illyrians were sent for into the Senat house, and when they had said, that they were employed in embassy from King Genius, to answer unto those accusations which it might be the Illeams framed against him: it was again demanded of them, how it hapned that they went not directly nor flewed themselves in such sort to the magistrats, that according to the manner and custome, they might have had their lodging provided and presents given them, with the ordinary allowance of the City, meet for them during their abode, that thereby knowledge might have been taken, as well of their coming, as also of their business and errand? But being taken tripping and failing in their answer, they were commanded to void out of the Council-chamber. For thought it was not meet, to give them their dispatch as Embassadors, since they made no means to present themselves unto the Senat: but rather they were of advice, to dispatch Embassadors of their own to the King, to signifie unto him, which of his associates had complained unto the Senat, how he had burnt their villages within his territories: yea, and to tell you it plainly, that it was not well done of him, that he could not forbear but do wrong to his own allies. In this embassy were sent, A. Terentius Varro, C. Pleorinus, and C. Cicerinus.

Likewise those Embassadors, whose commission was visit the aforesaid Kings, returned out of Asia, and reported that in the said Asia they had communication with Enmenes; in Syria with Antiochus, and in Alexandria with Ptolemaeus: who all of them had been solicited by sundry embassies of Perseus, howbeit they perished him and felt in their professed fealty, and promised to perform whatsoever the people of Rome would command them. Also that they went to the confederate states, whom they found true and loyal enough, excepting the Rhodians only, whom they perceived to be flogging & wavering, as altogether infected & poisoned with the council of Perseus.

Now were the Rhodian Embassadors come to answer those things which they knew were commonly bruited abroad touching their City: howbeit the Senat was not of mind to give them audience, before the new Consuls entered into their office. But they were all of advice to delay no longer the preparation for war. C. Licinius the Pretor had in charge, out of the old Quinquagèmes which were laid up in the docks and harbors, to repair as many as might serve at sea; to dig also and prepare a fleet of 50 sail. But if he could not come to make up the full number, then to write unto his colleague C. Memmius in Sicily, for to repair, calk and trim those ships which were in Sicily, that with all speed possible they might be sent to Brundisium. The said Pretor C. Licinius was commanded to enroll of Roman citizens (and those, L. Peritines, such as of bondmen born, had been enfranchised) for mariners and sailors, as many as might serve 25 ships; and Cn. Licinius had commission to levy as many of Latine allies for the like number of ships; also the Pretor was enjoined to charge the Latine allies with 8000 foot, and 400 horse. A. Arilius Serranus, who had been Pretor the year before, was cholet to receive these forces at Brundisium, and to conduct them over into Macedony: and Cn. Scinius the Pretor was appointed to have the army in readiness for to be transported. As for C. Licinius the Pretor, he by authority from the Senat, wrote to C. Popilius the Consul that he should command the second legion, which had been longest employed in Liguria, and consisted of the most experienced souldiers, together with four thousand footmen and two hundred horse of the Latine allies, to be ready at Brundisium upon the 15th of February. With this fleet of ships and forces of souldiers, Cn. Scinius was commanded to keep Macedony, until one were appointed to succeed him; and for this purpose his charge of command was continued for a year longer. All these directions of the Senat were put in execution with great diligence and expedition. Eight and forty Quinquagèmes were set afloat out of their docks: and L. Porcius Licinius was ordained to conduct them to Brundisium: the other 24 were sent out of Sicily. Three Embassadors were dispatched into Apulia and Calabria, to wit, Sex. Digittus, T. Iuventinus, and M. Caelius, for to buy corn to serve the fleet and the army. Now when all things were provided and in readiness, C. Scinius the Pretor departed from the City in his warlike coat of arms, and arrived at Brundisium. About the end of the year, C. Popilius the Consul returned to Rome, some what later then the Senat had ordained; who was commanded to take the first time, and withal speed to create new magistrates, considering that so great a war approached to neer. And therefore when the Consuls discoursed in the people of Bellum as touching his exploits in Liguria, the LL of the Senat were nothing well pleased to hear him by in stead thereof, they muttered every where, and asked him oftentimes, Why he had not restored to liberty those Ligurians, who were oppressed through the wicked proceedings of his father? The election of the Consuls was holden upon the twelfth day before the Calends of March according to the writs that went out: wherein were created Consuls, Pub. Licinius Crassus and Caius Cassius Longinus. The morrow following, the Pretors were elected, to wit, Caius Sulpicius Galba, L. Furius Philus, L. Cassius Dives, C. Luccretius Gallus, C. Cicerinus Rebusius, and L. Villius Annalis. To these Pretors the provinces were assigned in this manner: that two of them should sit as LL chief justices in Rome for civil jurisdiction: three other to have the government of Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia: to as the fixt only should remain not allotted to any place, for to be employed wheresoever the Senat would think good and provide.  "found by advertisement from you that they were within Macedony) for my part, made diligent
 "search until I had them, and then I commanded them to depart out of my kingdom, yea, and ex- I "pressly forbade them for ever setting foot again within my dominions. And thus much verily "concerning the criminal matters objected unto me as a defendant pleading at the bar, Now let "us argue and debate the rest, inforced and laid against me in quality of a King, namely, which "concern and touch the accord contracted between me and you, For if the words run in this sort
 "and are thus written in the foresaid covenants of accord, That I may not be suffered to defend
 "my self and my realm, no, nor if any enemy of mine levy war against me; then I must confess
 "indeed, that the league I have broken, in that I stood upon my guard and defence by force of "arms against Abruptus, an affociat of the people of Rome, But if it were lawful for me to do
 "by warrant of the accord and allowed also by the law of nations, by force to repel force; what "should I els say, what could I else have done I pray you? When Abruptus had laid waste the K
 "frontiers of my kingdom even as far as to Amphipolis, led into captivity many persons free-
 "born, carried away a mighty number of slaves, and driven before him many thousand head of "cattell; I should I have sitten still and suffered him until he had come armed to Pella, even unto
 "my royal palace? But some man may haply say, You did well indeed and justly in making head
 "and pursuing him by force of arms, may, vanquished he should not have been neither ought he
 "to have suffered those calamities which follow men vanquished, Why if I have endured the for"tune thereof, provoked as I was to war, how can he justly complain of tasting the like, being him"self the cause and first motive of all? I will not use the same manner of defence (O Romans) ex-
 "ting, that by force of arms I have repressed the Dolopians: for if I have not done by them accor"ding to their demerits, yet I am sure I have dealt by the virtue of the right I have over them be- L
 "ing as they are of mine own kingdom, under my obedience, and made subjects to my father en"joying as they are of mine own drawing. And yet, were I, to render a reason of my proceedings against "them, I say, unto you not unto my allies, but even to those who like not of any cruel com"mand so much as over bondslaves; can I be thought to have exercised more rigor against them, "than equity and reason would bear? For Euphrator, whom I deputed governor over them, they "killed in such sort, that death is too good for them, and the least punishment of all others that "they have deserved, And as I marched forward in my progress from thence to visit the Cities of "the Larissae, Antro, & Pylaeon, I ascended up to Delphi, there for to sacrifice, to the end that I might "discharge my conscience & pay those vows which I had of long time owed, Now, to aggravate M
 "matter in this also against me it is said moreover, that I was there with my army, and intended
 "(no doubt) for to seize Cities into my hands, and put garrisons into fortresses; for which at this "present I complain of you, Call the States and Cities of Greece together to a general assembly,
 "through which I passed, Let any one man come forth & make complaint of the least harm done
 "by any of my souldiers; then will I not refuse to be reputed for one who under pretence of di"vine sacrifice, went about another thing. We sent indeed garriisons to the Aetolians and Bizan-
 "tins, yea, and with the Becotians we contracted amity, But these things, in what sort & for what "purpose they were done, my ambassadors have not only declared, but also executed offences
 "before your Senat: where I found some flimspies to hear and decide my cause, although not so "indifferent and favourable to me, ward, as your self are, O Martius, my fathers old friend and fa- N
 "miliar, For as yet Enmenes my accuser was not come to Rome, who by false suggestions, wresting
 "at his pleasure every thing to the worst, to make all suspicious and odious unto you, went about
 "to make you believe that Greece could not possibly be restored to freedom, & enjoy the fruit of "your gracions tence, so long as the kingdom of Macedony stood entire and upright, Well, the "world you shall see, will turn about; and anon one or other will be here, to make remonstrance
 "and prove, That to no purpose Antiochus is removed and confined beyond the mountains of "the Taurus; that Enmenes is become much more grievous and unsupportable to all Asia than Ar-
 "chius ever was: and that your allies cannot be at rest nor live in quiet, so long as he keepeth
 "his royal court in Pergamus, a Citadell (as it were) overlooking and commanding all the neigh"bour Cities bordering thereupon, Right well I know, O Q. Martius, and you A. Attilius, that "whatsoever either you have objected against me, or I answered for my defence & purgation, is O
 "such as the ears and affections are of the hearers; neither what I have done, nor what mind and "intention I have carried in mine actions will be so much regarded, that willingly I have not "either done or intended, Mine own conscience beareth me witness, that willingly I have not "faulted; now if for want of knowledge and foresight I have been in some error, and somewhat
 "amiss it may be corrected and amended by this present chastisement, This I am sure, my trespass
 "is not incurable, neither have I committed ought that you should deem worthy to be purified
 "by

A "by war & force of arms, And if ye do, then surely it is for nought, that there goeth this name a"broad throughout all nations of your clemency and gravity both, if I say for so light occasions
 "which hardly are worth the complaint and the reasoning about, you be ready to enter into arms
 "and levy war upon your confederat Princes, Martius for that time accorded to his speech, and "moved him to address ambassadors to Rome, being of advice and opinion himself to try all means
 "to the very last point, and to let slip nothing whereof some hope of good might arise, It remained
 "only to be debated in council, how ambassadors might pass in safety. And to this purpose, where "it was necessary for the K to request a surcease of arms, albeit Martius himself was willing and de"sireous thereof (for that his drift was to nothing else by all this conference and parley yet he seemed
 "to make a hard matter and difficulty of it, and to do a special favour and pleasure unto Perseus in "granting his petition, The truth was, the Romans yet were not ready nor thoroughly appointed at "this present for the war: they had neither army puissant enough, nor captains sufficient: where-
 "as Perseus (but that he was blinded in all his councils with a vain hope of peace) had all things "prepared and in readines, and might then have begun to wage war, as in the best and most op"portune season for himself, so the worst and unfittest of all other times for his enemies.

After this parley and the abstinence of war assured faithfully on both parts, the Roman Com"missioners were appointed and resolved to go into Bacotia, where there was begun already some "trouble and commotion, by reason that certain States of the Bacotians were departed from the "society of the common Council, ever since it was reported back, how the Roman Legats made
 "answer that it should appear and be seen, what Cities they were indeed which took no pleasure "to have any association with the King, And first, the ambassadors from Chalcis afterwards from "Thebes encountered them upon the way, who assured them that they were not present in that Di"et and Council, where this association was concluded, To these embassages no answer for this "time was made, but willed they were only to give their attendance and follow them to Chalcis.

At Thebes great variance there was, which arose by occasion of another strife and debate, In "their solemn assembly for the election of the Prator of the Bacotians that part which had the Re"public in revenge of that injury and disgrace, assembled the multitude and made a decree at Thales,
 "That the Bacotians should not be received within their Cities: ierish sort, as which I am sure
 "men they retired to Thessum: from whence (for received there they were incontinently without "any stay) being called again to Thebes upon better advice and change of mind, they made
 "an ordinance, That it to the number of twelve private persons held any conventicle or public "meeting together, they should be condemned to exile. After this, Ismerius the new Prator, a "noble personage and of great puissance, by virtue of a decree adjudged them in their absence, to "lose their lives. To Chalcis they were fled, and from thence to the Romans at Larissa they went:
 "where they declared that Ismerius was the cause of their association with King Perseus. Upon that "fore said difference, they grew to hot contention, yet ambassadors from both parts came to the "Romans, as well the banished persons and accusers of Ismerius, as also Ismerius himself. But so "soon as the Roman Legats were come to Chalcis, the States and heads of other Cities (joyce-
 "ry one by a special decree of their own had renounced association with King Perseus) joined "with the Romans; whereat they took exceeding great contentment and joy, Ismerius thought "it meet and reason that the Bacotian nation should be committed to the protection of the Ro"mans, Whereupon arose a tumultuous fray, & but that he fled into the Tribunal of the Legats to "save himself, he had escaped narrowly from being killed by the said exiled persons, with the help "of their supports and favorites.

Also the City of Thebes, which is the capital place of State within Bacotia, was in great trouble
 "and uproar; & while some drew to the K, others inclined to the Romans, Besides there was a multi"tude of Coroneans and Haliartians gathered together to maintain the ordinance and decree as "touching the association with the K. But such was the resolute persistence of the principal and "chief men, who shewed by the late calamities of Philip and Antiochus, how great the torments, and
 "how happy the fortune was of the Roman empire, that the same multitude reented, and being "overruled, passed a new decree, to reverse and cancel the former confederacy with the King; sent
 "those that were the motives and periwaders of contraiting that amity to Ch. L for to satiate
 "and content the Roman Legats; yea & to conclude were of advice to recommend the City to the "faithfull patronage of the said Commissioners, Martius & Attilius took great pleasure to hear the "Thebans sing this note they perswaded with them severally apart, and gave them counsell to send "ambassadors to Rome for the renewing of this amity: but before all things they took order for the "restoring of the banished persons: as for the authors of the confederacy contracted with the K, "they by their own decree condemned, Having thus by this means infringed and made inillat the "Diet of the Bacotians (the thing which above all they most desired) they took their journey to "Poloponnesus, together with Ser. Cornelius, whom they had sent for to Chalcis. For their takes a "Councill was holden at Argos, where they demanded nothing else of the Achaean nation but on"ly to furnish them with 1000 souldiers. This garriison was sent to the defence of Chalcis, until "the Roman army were transported into Greece, Martius and Attilius having thus dispatched all
 "the affairs that they had to do in Greece in the beginning of winter returned to Rome.

Then was there sent from thence about the same time an honourable embassie to the Isles in "Asia, These Embassadors or Legats were three in number, to wit, T. Claudius, P. Postumius, and for the Romans. And the mightier and more wealthy any City was, the more earnestly travelled they there: because the inferior States were like to frame and fort themselves suitable to the example and authority of the greater, and superior. Now of all others the Rhodians were reputed of most import and consequence every way, for that they were able not only to favor with their countenance, but also aid and maintain with their forces this war: and by the persuasion of Hergesilus they had got together a fleet of forty sail. "This Hergesilus their sovereign Magistrate (whom they call Prytanis) had by many reasons prevailed with the Rhodians to abandon the hope they had by entertaining their KK. (which they had found by often experience how vain it was) and to hold themselves to the society and alliance of the Romans, the surest hold of all others at that time in the world, as well for strength of forces as trusty assurance and fidelity. There is intended war by them (qd. he) against Perseus, and no doubt the Romans will require of us the same provision and furniture of ships and sea-forces, which they have seen in their war lately against Antiochus, and before that, against King Philip: and then you will be to seek, and forced in great haste to provide a fleet, when it were more time it should be let out and sent forth, unless ye begin betimes to repair and rig your ships, unless, I say, you let in hand to furnish the same with sailors and mariners. And with so much more endeavour ought ye thus to do, that by your deed and effectual employment, you may refuse and disprove the false imputations wherewith Eumenes hath charged you. By these remonstrances induced they were in much as at the arrival of the Roman Legats aforesaid, they were able to shew unto them an armada of 40 ships ready rigged and well appointed, that they might know and see, they looked not for to be exhorted thereto. And this embassy was of great moment and importance also to gain the hearts of the States in Asia. Only Decimius returned to Rome without any effect of his errand and commission, nay, he ran into an ill name and obloquy, upon suspicion that he had received certain bribes of the Princes in Illyrium.
 "M. Junius; They in their circuit and visitation exhorted all their allies to take arms against Perseus.

Perseus upon the conference and communication had with the Romans, retired into Macedony and sent his Embassadors to Rome, to treat about the conditions of peace begun already with Marius: to other Embassadors also of his he gave his letters to carry to Byzantium and Rhodes: the tenor of which letters was one and the same directed to them all: namely, That he had communed with the Roman Legats, but he had so placed and couched as well what he heard as what he spake, that it might seem he gave not one foot unto them, but gained the better hand in that dispute & debating with them. These Embassadors added moreover, and said unto the Rhodians, L That they hoped assuredly there would be a peace, for that they by the motion and advice of Marius and Attilius were addressed in embassy to Rome. Now if the Romans, say they, against the covenants of accord proceeded to levy war, then the Rhodians were to endeavour with all the credit and power they have, to reunite the peace again; but if with all their prayer and entreaty they might not prevail, then they were to look about and labour this one point, That the might and puissance of the whole world were not devolved into the hands of that one people. And as this imported and concerned all the rest, so the Rhodians especially, who surrounded other States in dignity and wealth, both which should be obnoxious and enthrall'd, if there were regard and respect made of none but the Romans. The letters of the King and words of the Embassadors, were entertained with friendly audience, other effect they took none to change their settled minds: for now the authority of the better part began also to carry the greater sway. But this answer was returned to them, & that by way of decree, That the Rhodians wished peace with all their hearts: but if it should come to war, their King and Master was neither to expect, nor try to exact any thing at their hands, to disjoin the ancient amity which they held with the Romans, and which they had acquired by many and great deserts, as well in war as in peace. In their return from Rhodes, they went to the Cities of Baotia, and namely, to Thebes, Coronea, and Haliartus, from whom it seemed a thing extorted forcibly against their will, that they were discombed from the King & slave to the Romans. The Thebans stood firm and immovable, although they were somewhat discontented with the Romans, both for condemning their chief and principall Citizens, and also for restoring the banished persons. But the Coroneans and Haliartians upon an imbrued and fetted labour by kind unto the Kings, sent Embassadors into Macedonia, requesting a garrison for their defence against the excessive pride of the Thebans. To this embassy the King thus answered, That a garrison he might not send, by reason of the truce made with the Romans: howbeit, he advertised them to maintain and guard themselves against the injuries of the Thebans all that ever they could: but yet so, as they gave the Romans no cause to be their heavy friends, and so to proceed in rigour against them.
